PREFACE

THE OXFORD ANTHOLOGY OF AMERICAN LITERATURE is an historical selection from the literary expression of the American people.

A man may look at writing as he chooses. We have regarded it as literature. Undoubtedly by the introduction of a social approach, an interest in the history of American letters has been enormously stimulated. This has been occasioned partly by a general concern with social matters and social history, but it has been mostly seized on with a defensive enthusiasm for one quality when the presence of another, the purely literary, was not certain. While the endowment of a novel with proletarian significance, or the identification of a essay with the deistic movement, or the recognition of the spirit of democracy in a poem may form the basis of useful estimates, they leave unanswered the stubborn question of literary values.

The writing of prose and poetry is primarily a conscious art, and for this reason an attempt has been made to express the literary life of this country. The seventeenth century has been comprehensively represented in the variety of its creative efforts; what has been generally regarded as odd will now assume validity as an American adaptation of suitable literary forms. In the nineteenth century, when America's first purely literary figures began to appear, no significant development has been ignored, and an effort has been made to represent its chief writers generously enough to permit their study as stylists and experimenters. There has been no effort to be all-inclusive, and no timidity in adjusting selections to valuations now generally accepted. Nor has there been hesitation to place on literature of the present that emphasis which its excellence demands. We have tried not to be satisfied with a puzzled gesture in this direction. These are the works which have interested literary figures of our own time, and through them the reader may understand that literature is a versatile and ever-changing art. The intent of the annotation and the somewhat informal commentary has been to show the directions of this change, and, when possible, to let men speak for themselves.

In all cases we have attempted to make use of the most satisfactory texts. Most of the colonial selection have been modernized, lest literary merit be veiled in quaintness. In such cases the change has been indicated. References have been made to the most accessible editions, though the texts do not always come from them. At the conclusion of each selection the dates of composition and of first appearance in book-form have, when known, been added.

582
- 2 How strange the sculptures that adorn these towers! 582
- 3 I enter, and I see thee in the gloom, 582
- 4 With snow-white veil and garments as of flame, 583
- 5 I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze, 583

1 The soul selects her own society, 848

2 My life closed twice before its close, 848

3 They say that 'time assuages', 848

4 Just lost when I was saved! 849

5 I taste a liquor never brewed, 849

6 I started early, took my dog, 849

7 If you were coming in the fall, 849

8 Because I could not stop for Death, 850

9 Our share of night to bear, 850

10 Alter? When the hills do, 850

11 I cannot live with you, 850

12 I'll tell you how the sun rose, 851

13 I never saw a moor, 851

14 I'm nobody! Who are you? 851

15 Surgeons must be very careful, 851

16 I found the phrase to every thought, 851

17 The last night that she lived, 851

18 I felt a funeral in my brain, 852

19 I like to see it lap the miles, 852

20 He ate and drank the precious words, 852

21 To fight aloud is very brave, 852

22 Much madness is divinest sense, 852

23 A death-blow is a life-blow to some, 852

24 It dropped so low in my regard, 852

25 He preached upon 'breadth' till it argued him narrow, 852

26 That such have died enables us, 853

27 To hear an oriole sing, 853

28 The sky is low, the clouds are mean, 853

29 A route of evanescence, 853

- 30. The thought beneath so slight a film, 853
- 31. Not with a club the heart is broken, 853
- 32. Pain has an element of blank, 853

FROM A TRUE RELATION OF SUCH OCCURRENCES AND ACCIDENTS OF NOTE AS HATH HAPPENED AT VIRGINIA

SETTLEMENT <sup>1</sup>

KIND Sir, commendations remembered, etc You shall understand that after many crosses in the Downs by tempests, we arrived safely upon the southwest part of the great Canaries, within four or five days after, we set sail for Dominica, the twenty-sixth of April, the first land we made, we fell with Cape Henry, the very mouth of the Bay of Chesapeake, which at that present we little expected, having by a cruel storm been put to the northward

Anchoring in this bay, twenty or thirty went ashore with the captain, and in coming aboard [on land], they were assaulted with certain Indians, which charged them within pistol shot, in which conflict Captain Archer and Mathew Morton were shot, whereupon Captain Newport, seconding them, made a shot at them, which the Indians little respected, but having spent their arrows retired without harm And in that place was the box opened, wherein the council for Virginia was nominated, and arriving at the place where we are now seated, the council was sworn, and the president elected, which for that year was Mr Edm. Maria Wingfield, where was made choice for our situation, a very fit place for the erecting of a great city, about which some contention passed betwixt Captain Wingfield and Captain Gosnold, notwithstanding, all our provision was brought ashore, and with as much speed as might be we went about our fortification

The two-and-twenty day of April, Captain Newport and myself with divers others, to the number of twenty-two persons, set forward to discover the river some fifty or sixty miles, finding it in some places broader and in some narrower, the country (for the most part) on each side plain high ground, with many fresh springs, the people in all places kindly entreating us, dancing, and feasting us with strawberries, mulberries, bread, fish, and other of their country provisions, whereof we had plenty, for which Captain Newport kindly required their least favors with bells, pins, needles, beads, or glasses, which so contented them that his liberality made them follow us from place to place, and ever kindly to respect us In the midway staying to refresh ourselves in a little isle, four or five savages came unto us which described unto us the course of the river, and after in our journey they often met us, trading with us for such provision as we had, and arriving at Arrohattoc, he whom we supposed to be the chief king of all the rest most kindly entertained us, giving us in a guide to go with us up the river to Powhatan, of which place their great emperor taketh his name, where he that they honored for king used us kindly But to finish this discovery, we passed on further, where within a mile we were intercepted with great craggy stones in the midst of the river, where the water falleth so rudely and with such a violence as not any boat can possibly pass, and so broad disperseth the stream as there is not past five or six foot at a low water, and to the shore scarce passage with a barge, the water floweth four foot, and the freshes by reason of the rocks have left marks of the inundations eight or nine foot The south side is plain low ground, and the north side high mountains, the rocks being of a gravelly nature, interlaced with many veins of glistering spangles

That night we returned to Powhatan, the next day (being Whitsunday after dinner) we returned to the falls, leaving a mariner in pawn with the Indians for a guide of theirs, he that they honored for king followed us by the river. That afternoon we trifled in looking upon the rocks and river (further he would not go); so there we

erected a cross, and that night taking our man at Powhatan's, Captain Newport congratulated his kindness with a gown and a hatchet, returning to Arrohattoc, and stayed there the next day to observe the height thereof, and so with many signs of love we departed

The next day the Queen of Appomattoc kindly entreated us, her people being no less contented than the rest, and from thence we went to another place (the name whereof I do not remember), where the people showed us the manner of their diving for mussels, in which they find pearls.

That night, passing by Weanoc some twenty miles from our fort, they according to their former churlish condition seemed little to affect us, but as we departed and lodged at the point of Weanoc, the people the next morning seemed kindly to content us, yet we might perceive many signs of a more jealousy in them than before, and also the hind that the King of Arrohattoc had given us altered his resolution in going to our fort, and with many kind circumstances left us there. This gave us some occasion to doubt some mischief at the fort, yet Captain Newport intended to have visited Paspahagh and Quoucohanock, but, the instant change of the wind being fair for our return, we repaired to the fort with all speed, where the first we heard was that four hundred Indians the day before had assaulted the fort and surprised it, had not God (beyond all their expectations) by means of the ships (at whom they shot with their ordnances and muskets) caused them to retire, they had entered the fort with our own men, which were then busied in setting corn, their arms being then in dryfats and few ready but certain gentlemen of their own, in which conflict most of the council was hurt, a boy slain in the pinnace, and thirteen or fourteen more hurt

With all speed we palisadoed our fort, each other day for six or seven days we had alarums by ambuscadoes, and four or five cruelly wounded by being abroad, the Indians' loss we know not, but as they report three were slain and divers hurt

Captain Newport, having set things in order, set sail for England the twenty-second of June, leaving provision for thirteen or fourteen weeks

The day before the ship's departure, the King of Pamunkey sent the Indian that had met us before in our discovery to assure us peace, our fort being then palisadoed round and all our men in good health and comfort, albeit that through some discontented humors it did not so long continue. For the President and Captain Gosnold, with the rest of the council, being for the most part discontented with one another in so much that things were neither carried with that discretion nor any business effected in such good sort as wisdom would, nor our own good and safety required, whereby and through the hard dealing of our President the rest of the council being diversely affected through his audacious command, and for Captain Martin albeit very honest and wishing the best good yet so sick and weak, and myself so disgraced through others' malice, through which disorder God (being angry with us) plagued us with such famine and sickness that the living were scarce able to bury the dead, our want of sufficient and good victuals, with continual watching, four or five each night at three bulwarks, being the chief cause. Only of sturgeon we had great store, whereon our men would so greedily surfeit as it cost many their lives, the sack, aqua vitae, and other preservatives for our health being kept only in the President's hands for his own diet and his few associates

Shortly after, Captain Gosnold fell sick and within three weeks died. Captain Ratcliffe being then also very sick and weak, and myself having also tasted of the extremity thereof, but by God's assistance being well recovered. Kendall about this time for divers reasons deposed from being of the council, and shortly after it pleased God (in our extremity) to move the Indians to bring us corn, ere it was half ripe, to refresh us, when we rather expected when they would destroy us.

About the tenth of September there was about forty-six of our men dead, at which time, Captain Wingfield having ordered the affairs in such sort that he was generally hated of all, in which respect with one consent he was deposed from his presidency, and Captain Ratcliffe according to his course was elected

Our provision being now within twenty days spent, the Indians brought us great store both of corn and bread ready made; and also there came such abundance of fowls into the rivers as greatly refreshed our weak estates, whereupon many of our weak men were presently able to go abroad.

As yet we had no houses to cover us, our tents were rotten, and our cabins worse than naught; our best commodity was iron, which we made into little chisels.

The President's and Captain Martin's sickness constrained me to be cape-merchant, and yet to spare no pains in making houses for the company, who, notwithstanding our misery, little ceased their malice, grudging, and muttering

As at this time were most of our chiefest men either sick or discontented, the rest being in such despair as they would rather starve and rot with idleness than be persuaded to do anything for their own relief without constraint, our victuals being now within eighteen days spent and the Indians' trade decreasing, I was sent to the mouth of the river, to Kecoughtan, an Indian town, to trade for corn and try the river for fish; but our fishing we could not effect by reason of the stormy weather. The Indians, thinking us near famished, with careless kindness offered us little pieces of bread and small handfulls of beans or wheat for a hatchet or a piece of copper, in like manner I entertained their kindness, and in like scorn offered them like commodities, but the children, or any that showed extraordinary kindness, I liberally contented with free gift of such trifles as well contented them

Finding this cold comfort, I anchored before the town and the next day returned to trade, but God (the absolute disposer of all hearts) altered their conceits, for now they were no less desirous of our commodities than we of their corn. Under color to fetch fresh water, I sent a man to discover the town, their corn, and force, to try their intent in that they desired me up to their houses, which well understanding, with four shot I visited them. With fish, oysters, bread, and deer they kindly traded with me and my men, being no less in doubt of my intent than I of theirs, for well I might with twenty men have freighted a ship with corn. The town containeth eighteen houses, pleasantly seated upon three acres of ground upon a plain half environed with a great bay of the great river, the other part with a bay of the other river falling into the great bay, with a little isle fit for a castle in the mouth thereof, the town adjoining to the main by a neck of land of sixty yards

With sixteen bushels of corn I returned towards our fort, by the way I encountered with two canoes of Indians, who came aboard me, being the inhabitants of Warrasqueoc, a kingdom on the south side of the river, which is in breadth five miles, and twenty mile or near from the mouth. With these I traded, who, having but their hunting provision, requested me to return to their town, where I should load my boat with corn, and with near thirty bushels I returned to the fort, the very name whereof gave great comfort to our despairing company

Time thus passing away, and having not above fourteen days' victuals left, some motions were made about our President's and Captain Archer's going for England to procure a supply, in which meantime we had reasonably fitted us with houses. And our President and Captain Martin being able to walk abroad, with much ado it was concluded that the pinnace and barge should go towards Powhatan to trade for corn

Lots were cast who should go in her, the chance was mine, and while she was a-rigging, I made a voyage to Quioucohanock, where arriving, there was but certain women and children who fled from their houses; yet at last I drew them to draw near, truck they durst not, corn they had plenty, and to spoil I had no commission

In my return to Paspahugh, I traded with that churlish and treacherous nation, having loaded ten or twelve bushels of corn, they offered to take our pieces and swords, yet by stealth, but [we] seeming to dislike it, they were ready to assault us yet, standing upon our guard, in coasting the shore, divers out of the woods would meet with us with corn and trade. But lest we should be constrained either to endure overmuch wrong or directly [to] fall to revenge, seeing them dog us from place to place, it being night and our necessity not fit for wars, we took occasion to return with ten bushels of corn.

Captain Martin after made two journeys to that nation of Paspahagh, but each time returned with eight or ten bushels.

All things being now ready for my journey to Powhatan, for the performance thereof I had eight men and myself for the barge, as well for discovery as trading, [and in] the pinnace five mariners and two landmen to take in our ladings at convenient places

The ninth of November I set forward for the discovery of the country of Chickahominy, leaving the pinnace the next tide to follow and stay for my coming at Point Weanoc, twenty miles from our fort, the mouth of this river falleth into the great river at Paspahagh, eight miles above our fort

That afternoon I stayed the ebb in the bay of Paspahagh with the Indians, towards the evening certain Indians hailed me, one of them, being of Chickahominy, offered to conduct me to his country, the Paspahagheans grudged thereat. Along we went by moonlight, at midnight he brought us before his town, desiring one of our men to go up with him, whom he kindly entertained and returned back to the barge

The next morning I went up to the town and showed them what copper and hatchets they should have for corn, each family seeking to give me most content. So long they caused me to stay that a hundred at least was expecting my coming by the river, with corn. What I liked, I bought, and lest they should perceive my too great want, I went higher up the river

This place is called Manosquosick, a quarter of a mile from the river, containing thirty or forty houses, upon an exceeding high land, at the foot of the hill towards the river is a plane wood watered with many springs, which fall twenty yards right down into the river. Right against the same is a great marsh of four or five miles' circuit, divided in two islands by the parting of the river, abounding with fish and fowl of all sorts

A mile from thence is a town called Oranocke. I further discovered the towns of Mansa, Apanaock, Werawahon, and Mamanahunt, [was] at each place kindly used, especially at the last, being the heart of the country, where were assembled two hundred people with such abundance of corn as, having laded our barge, as also I might have laded a ship

I returned to Paspahagh, and considering the want of corn at our fort, it being night, with the ebb, by midnight I arrived at our fort, where I found our pinnace run aground

The next morning I unladed seven hogsheds into our store.

The next morning I returned again; the second day I arrived at Mamanahunt, where the people, having heard of my coming, were ready with three or four hundred baskets, little and great, of which having laded my barge, with many signs of great kindness I returned

At my departure they requested me to hear our pieces, being in the midst of the river, which in regard of the echo seemed a peal of ordnance. Many birds and fowls they see us daily kill that much feared them. So desirous of trade were they that they would follow me with their canoes, and for anything give it me rather than return it back. So I unladed again seven or eight hogsheds at our fort

Having thus by God's assistance gotten good store of corn, notwithstanding, some bad spirits not content with God's providence still grew mutinous, in so much that our President, having occasion to chide the smith for his misdemeanor, he not only gave him bad language but also offered to strike him with some of his tools. For which rebellious act the smith was by a jury condemned to be hanged, but being upon the ladder, continuing very obstinate as hoping upon a rescue, when he saw no other way but death with him, he became penitent and declared a dangerous conspiracy, for which Captain Kendall, as principal, was by a jury condemned, and shot to death

This conspiracy appeased, I set forward for the discovery of the river [of] Chickahominy. This third time I discovered the towns of Mattapanient, Morinogh, Askakep, Moysenock, Righkahauk, Nechanicok, Mattalunt, Attamuspincke, and divers others, their plenty of corn I found decreased, yet lading the barge I returned to our fort

Our store being now indifferently well provided with corn, there was much ado for to have the pinnace go for England, against which Captain Martin and myself stood chiefly against it, and in fine, after many debates pro et contra, it was resolved to stay a further resolution.

This matter also quieted, I set forward to finish this discovery, which as yet I had neglected in regard of the necessity we had to take in provision whilst it was to be had. Forty miles I passed up the river, which for the most part is a quarter of a mile broad and three fathom and a half deep, exceed[ing] oozy, many great low marshes, and many high lands, especially about the midst at a place called Moysonicke, a peninsula of four miles' circuit, betwixt two rivers, joined to the main by a neck of forty or fifty yards, and forty or fifty yards from the high-water mark. On both sides in the very neck of the main are high hills and dales, yet much inhabited, the isle declining in a plain fertile corn field, the lower end a low marsh. More plenty of swans, cranes, geese, ducks, and mallards, and divers sorts of fowls, none would desire, more plain fertile planted ground in such great proportions as there I had not seen, of a light black sandy mould, the cliffs commonly red, white, and yellow-colored sand and, under, red and white clay, fish [in] great plenty, and people [in] abundance, the most of their inhabitants in view of the neck of land, where a better seat for a town cannot be desired.

At the end of forty miles this river environeth many low islands, at each high water drowned, for a mile, where it uniteth itself at a place called Appocant, the highest town inhabited.

Ten miles higher I discovered with the barge, in the midway, a great tree hindered my passage, which I cut in two. Here the river became narrower, eight, nine, or ten foot at a high water, and six or seven at a low, the stream exceeding swift, and the bottom hard channel, the ground, most part a low plain, sandy soil. This occasioned me to suppose it might issue from some lake or some broad ford, for it could not be far to the head, but rather then I would endanger the barge.<sup>1</sup> Yet to have been able to resolve this doubt, and to discharge the imputations of malicious tongues that half suspected I durst not for so long delaying, some of the company as desirous as myself, we resolved to hire a canoe and return with the barge to Appocant, there to leave the barge secure and put ourselves upon the adventure, the country only a vast and wild wilderness, and but only that town.

Within three or four miles we hired a canoe, and two Indians to row us the next day a-fowling. Having made such provision for the barge as was needful, I left her there to ride, with express charge not any [one] to go ashore till my return.

Though some wise men may condemn this too bold attempt of too much indiscretion, yet if they well consider the friendship of the Indians in conducting me, the desolateness of the country, the probability of some lake, and the malicious judges of my actions at home, as also to have some matters of worth to encourage our adventurers in England, [these] might well have caused any honest mind to have done the like, as well for his own discharge as for the public good.

Having two Indians for my guide and two of our own company, I set forward, leaving seven in the barge.

Having discovered twenty miles further in this desert, the river still kept his depth and breadth, but [was] much more cumbered with trees.

Here we went ashore (being some twelve miles higher than the barge had been) to refresh ourselves, during the boiling of our victuals. One of the Indians I took with me, to see the nature of the soil, and to cross the boughts of the river, the other Indian I left with Master Robinson and Thomas Emry, with their matches lighted and order to discharge a piece for my retreat, at the first sight of any Indian.

But within a quarter of an hour I heard a loud cry and a holloing of Indians, but no warning piece. Supposing them surprised and that the Indians had betrayed us, presently I seized him and bound his arm fast to my hand in a garter, with my pistol ready bent to be revenged on him, he advised me to fly, and seemed ignorant of what was done.

But as we went discoursing, I was struck with an arrow on the right thigh, but without harm, upon this occasion I espied two Indians drawing their bows, which I prevented in discharging a French pistol

By that I had charged again, three or four more did the like, for the first fell down and fled At my discharge, they did the like My hind I made my barricado, who offered not to strive Twenty or thirty arrows were shot at me, but short Three or four times I had discharged my pistol ere the king of Pamunkey, called Opechancanough, with two hundred men environed me, each drawing their bow, which done they laid them[selves] upon the ground, yet without shot

My hind treated betwixt them and me of conditions of peace, he discovered me to be the captain My request was to retire to the boat, they demanded my arms, the rest they said were slain, only me they would reserve

The Indian importuned me not to shoot. In retiring, being in the midst of a low quagmire and minding them more than my steps, I stepped fast into the quagmire, and also the Indian in drawing me forth

Thus surprised, I resolved to try their mercies, my arms I cast from me, till which none durst approach me

Being seized on me, they drew me out and led me to the king I presented him with a compass dial, describing by my best means the use thereof, whereat he so amazedly admired as he suffered me to proceed in a discourse of the roundness of the earth, the course of the sun, moon, stars, and planets

With kind speeches and bread he requited me, conducting me where the canoe lay and John Robinson slain, with twenty or thirty arrows in him Emry I saw not

I perceived by the abundance of fires all over the woods At each place I expected when they would execute me, yet they used me with what kindness they could

Approaching their town, which was within six miles where I was taken, only made as arbors and covered with mats, which they remove as occasion requires, all the women and children, being advertised of this accident, came forth to meet them, the king well guarded with twenty bowmen, five flank and rear, and each flank before him a sword and a piece, and after him the like, then a bowman, then I, on each hand a bowman, the rest in file in the rear, which rear led forth amongst the trees in abition, each his bow and a handful of arrows, a quiver at his back grimly painted; on each flank a sergeant, the one running always towards the front, the other towards the rear, each a true pace and in exceeding good order

This being a good time continued, they cast themselves in a ring with a dance, and so each man departed to his lodging

The captain conducting me to his lodging, a quarter of venison and some ten pound of bread I had for supper, what I left was reserved for me, and sent with me to my lodging.

Each morning three women presented me three great platters of fine bread, more venison than ten men could devour I had My gown, points and garters, my compass, and my tablet they gave me again Though eight ordinarily guarded me, I wanted not what they could devise to content me, and still our longer acquaintance increased our better affection

Much they threatened to assault our fort, as they were solicited by the king of Paspahgh, who showed at our fort great signs of sorrow for this mischance The king took great delight in understanding the manner of our ships, and sailing the seas, the earth and skies, and of our God What he knew of the dominions he spared not to acquaint me with, as of certain men clothed at a place called Ocanahonan, clothed like me, the course of our river, and that within four or five days' journey of the falls was a great turning of salt water

I desired he would send a messenger to Paspahgh with a letter I would write, by which they should understand how kindly they used me and that I was well, lest they should revenge my death This he granted and sent three men, in such weather as in reason were impossible by any naked to be endured Their cruel minds towards the fort I had diverted, in describing the ordnance and the mines in the fields, as also the revenge Captain Newport would take of them at his return Their intent, I inserted the fort, [as also of] the people of Ocanahonum and the back sea, this report they after found divers Indians that confirmed.

The next day after my letter, came a savage to my lodging with his sword, to have slain me, but being by my guard intercepted, with a bow and arrow he offered to have effected his purpose. The cause I knew not till the king, understanding thereof, came and told me of a man a-dying, wounded with my pistol, he told me also of another I had slain, yet the most concealed they had any hurt. This was the father of him I had slain, whose fury to prevent, the king presently conducted me to another kingdom, upon the top of the next northerly river, called Youghtanund.

Having feasted me, he further led me to another branch of the river, called Mattapanient, to two other hunting towns they led me, and to each of these countries, a house of the great emperor of Powhatan, whom as yet I supposed to be at the falls, to him I told him I must go, and so return to Paspahegh.

After this four or five days' march we returned to Rasawrack, the first town they brought me to, where, binding the mats in bundles, they marched two days' journey and crossed the river of Youghtanund where it was as broad as Thames, so conducting me to a place called Menapacute in Pamunkey, where the king inhabited.

The next day another king of that nation, called Kekataugh, having received some kindness of me at the fort, kindly invited me to feast at his house, the people from all places flocked to see me, each showing to content me.

By this, the great king hath four or five houses, each containing fourscore or an hundred foot in length, pleasantly seated upon an high sandy hill, from whence you may see westerly a goodly low country, the river before the which his crooked course causeth many great marshes of exceeding good ground. An hundred houses and many large plains are here together inhabited. More abundance of fish and fowl and a pleasanter seat cannot be imagined. The king with forty bowmen to guard me entreated me to discharge my pistol, which they there presented me, with a mark at six score to strike therewith, but to spoil the practice, I broke the cock, whereat they were much discontented, though a chance supposed.

From hence this kind king conducted me to a place called Rappahannock, a kingdom upon another river northward, the cause of this was that the year before a ship had been in the river of Pamunkey, who, having been kindly entertained by Powhatan their emperor, they returned thence and discovered the river of Rappahannock, where being received with like kindness, yet he slew the king and took of his people, and they supposed I were he. But the people reported him [to be] a great man that was [the] captain, and using me kindly, the next day we departed.

This river of Rappahannock seemeth in breadth not much less than that we dwell upon. At the mouth of the river is a country called Cuttatawomen, upwards is Moraughtacund, Tapohanock, Appamatuck, and Nantaughtacund, at Topmanahocks, the head issuing from many mountains.

The next night I lodged at a hunting town of Powhatan's, and the next day arrived at Werowacomoco upon the river of Pamunkey, where the great king is resident. By the way we passed by the top of another little river, which is betwixt the two, called Piankatank. The most of this country [is] through desert, yet exceeding fertile, good timber, most hills and dales, in each valley a crystal spring.

Arriving at Werowacomoco, their emperor proudly lying upon a bedstead a foot high, upon ten or twelve mats, richly hung with many chains of great pearls about his neck, and covered with a great covering of raccoon. At [his] head sat a woman, at his feet another, on each side sitting upon a mat upon the ground were ranged his chief men on each side the fire, ten in a rank, and behind them as many young women, each [with] a great chain of white beads over their shoulders, their heads painted in red, and with such a grave and majestical countenance as drave me into admiration to see such state in a naked savage.

He kindly welcomed me with good words and great platters of sundry victuals, assuring me his friendship and my liberty within four days. He much delighted in Opechancanough's relation of what I had described to him, and oft examined me upon the same.

He asked me the cause of our coming.

I told him being in fight with the Spaniards our enemy, being overpowered, near put to retreat, and by extreme weather put to this shore, where landing at Chesapeake, the people shot us, but at Kecoughtan they kindly used us, we by signs demanded fresh water, they described us up the river was all fresh water, at Paspahugh also they kindly used us, our pinnace being leaky, we were enforced to stay to mend her, till Captain Newport my father came to conduct us away

He demanded why we went further with our boat I told him in that I would have occasion to talk of the back sea, that on the other side the main, where was salt water My father had a child slain, which we supposed Monacan his enemy [had done], whose death we intended to revenge

After good deliberation, he began to describe me the countries beyond the falls, with many of the rest, confirming what not only Opechancanough and an Indian which had been prisoner to Powhatan had before told me, but some called it five days, some six, some eight, where the said water dashed amongst many stones and rocks each storm, which caused oftentimes the head of the river to be brackish

Anchanachuck he described to be the people that had slain my brother, whose death he would revenge He described also upon the same sea a mighty nation called Bocootawwonauke, a fierce nation that did eat men and warred with the people of Moyawance and Pataromerke, nations upon the top of the head of the bay, under his territories, where the year before they had slain an hundred He signified their crowns were shaven, long hair in the neck, tied on a knot, swords like pole-axes

Beyond them, he described people with short coats and sleeves to the elbows, that passed that way in ships like ours Many kingdoms he described me to the head of the bay, which seemed to be a mighty river issuing from mighty mountains betwixt the two seas. The people clothed at Ocana-howan he also confirmed, and the southerly countries also, as the rest that reported us to be within a day and a half of Mangoge, two days of Chowanoc, six from Roonock, to the south part of the back sea. He described a country called Anone, where they have abundance of brass and houses walled as ours

minions, seeing that all he knew were under his territories) in describing to him the territories of Europe, which was subject to our great king, whose subject I was, the innumerable multitude of his ships, I gave him to understand the noise of trumpets and terrible manner of fighting [that] were under Captain Newport my father, whom I entituled the Meworames, which they call the king of all the waters. At his greatness he admired and not a little feared He desired me to forsake Paspahugh and to live with him upon his river, a country called Capahowasic He promised to give me corn, venison, or what I wanted to feed us; hatchets and copper we should make him, and none should disturb us

This request I promised to perform, and thus, having with all the kindness he could devise sought to content me, he sent me home with four men—one that usually carried my gown and knapsack after me, two others loaded with bread, and one to accompany me

This river of Pamunkey is not past twelve miles from that we dwell on, his course northwest and westerly as the other Werowacomoco is upon salt water in breadth two miles, and so keepeth his course without any tarrying some twenty miles, where at the parting of the fresh water and the salt it divideth itself into two parts, the one part to Goughland, as broad as Thames, and navigable with a boat threescore or fourscore miles and with a ship fifty, exceeding crooked, and many low grounds and marshes, but inhabited with abundance of warlike and tall people The country of Youghtanund of no less worth, only it is lower, but all the soil a fat, fertile, sandy ground Above Menapucunt, many high, sandy mountains By the river is many rocks, seeming, if not, of several mines

The other branch a little less in breadth, yet extendeth not near so far, nor so well inhabited, somewhat lower, and a white sandy and a white clay soil, here is their best terra sigillata The mouth of the river, as I see in the discovery thereof with Captain Newport, is half a mile broad, and within four miles not above a musket shot, the channel exceeding good and deep, the river straight to the divisions Kiskirk the nearest nation to the entrances

Their religion and ceremony I observed was thus three or four days after my taking, seven of them in the house where I lay, each with a rattle, began at ten o'clock in the morning to sing about the fire, which they environed with a circle of meal, and after a foot or two from that at the end of each song laid down two or three grains of wheat, continuing this order till they have included six or seven hundred in a half circle, and after that, two or three more circles in like manner, a hand breadth from other That done, at each song, they put betwixt every three, two, or five grains a little stuck, so counting as an old woman her paternoster

One disguised with a great skin, his head hung round with little skins of weasels and other vermin, with a crown of feathers on his head, painted as ugly as the devil, at the end of each song will make many signs and demonstrations with strange and vehement actions Great cakes of deer suet, deer, and tobacco he casteth in the fire Till six o'clock in the evening their howling would continue ere they would depart

Each morning in the coldest frost the principal, to the number of twenty or thirty, assembled themselves in a round circle a good distance from the town, where they told me they there consulted where to hunt the next day

So fat they fed me that I much doubted they intended to have sacrificed me to the Quiyoughquosicke, which is a superior power they worship, a more uglier thing cannot be described One they have for chief sacrifices, which also they call Quiyoughquosicke. To cure the sick, a man with a rattle and extreme howling, shouting, singing, and such violent gestures and antic actions over the patient, will suck out blood and phlegm from the patient, out of their unable stomach or any diseased place, as no labor will more tire them

Tobacco they offer the water in passing in foul weather The death of any they lament with great sorrow and weeping. Their kings they bury betwixt two mats within their houses, with all his beads, jewels, hatchets, and copper, the others in graves like ours They acknowledge no resurrection

Powhatan hath three brethren and two sisters, each of his brethren succeeded other. For the crown, their heirs inherit not, but the first heirs of the sisters, and so successively the women's heirs For the kings have as many women as they will, his subjects two, and most but one.

From Werowacomoco is but twelve miles, yet the Indians trifled away that day and would not go to our fort by any persuasions, but in certain old hunting houses of Paspahagh we lodged all night

The next morning ere sunrise we set forward for our fort, where we arrived within an hour, where each man with the truest signs of joy they could express welcomed me . .

NEWS FROM VIRGINIA <sup>1</sup>

It is no idle fabulous tale, nor is it feigned news

For Truth herself is here arrived, because you should not muse

<sup>1</sup> The full title is as follows News from Virginia The Lost Flock Triumphant With the Happy Arrival of that Famous and Worthy Knight, Sir Thomas Gates, and Valiant Captain, Mr Christopher Newport, and Others into England With the Manner of their Distress in the Island of Devils (otherwise called Bermuda), where they remained 42 Weeks, and built two Pinnaces in which they returned into Virginia (London, 1610) The text has been modernized by the editors

With her both Gates and Newport come to tell report doth lie

Which did divulge unto the world that they at sea did die

'Tis true that eleven months and more, these gallant worthy wights

Was in the ship, Sea-Venture named, deprived Virginia's sight.

And bravely did they glide the main, 'n'l Neptune 'gan to frown,

As if a courser proudly backed would throw his rider down

The seas did rage, the winds did blow, distressed were they then,
 Their ship did leak, her tacklings break, in danger were her men 10 But Heaven was pilot in this storm, and to an island near,
 Bermoothawes called, conducted them, which did abate their fear

But yet these worthies forced were, oppressed with weather again,
 To run their ship between two rocks, where she doth still remain,
 And then on shore the island came,
 inhabited by hogs,
 Some fowl and tortoises there were They only had one dog

To kill these swine to yield them food, that little had to eat, Their store was spent, and all things scant, alas! they wanted meat A thousand hogs that dog did kill, their hunger to sustain,
 And with such food did in that isle two-and-forty weeks remain 20

And there two gallant pinnaces did build of cedar-tree,
 The brave Deliverance one was called, of seventy ton was she
 The other Patience had to name, her burden thirty ton,
 Two only of their men which there pale death did overcome

And for the loss of these two souls, which were accounted dear, A son and daughter then was born, and were baptized there
 The two-and-forty weeks being past, they hoist sail and away, Their ships with hogs well freighted were, their hearts with muckle joy

And so unto Virginia came, where these brave soldiers find The Englishmen oppressed with grief and discontent in mind 30 They seemed distracted and forlorn, for those two worthies' loss, Yet at their home return they joyed, amongst them some were cross

And in the midst of discontent came noble Delaware,
 He heard their griefs on either part, and set them free from care He comforts them and cheers their hearts, that they abound with joy, He feeds them full and feeds their souls with God's word every day

A discreet council he creates of men of worthy fame, That noble Gates lieutenant was the admiral had to name The worthy Sir George Somers, knight, and others of command, Master George Percy, which is brother unto Northumberland 40

Sir Ferdinando Wayneman, knight, and others of good fame, That noble lord his company, which to Virginia came And landed there, his number was one hundred seventy, then Add to the rest, and they make full four hundred able men

Where they unto their labor fall, as men that mean to thrive, Let's pray that Heaven may bless them all,
 and keep them long alive Those men that vagrants lived with us, have there deserved well, Their governor writes in their praise, as divers letters tell

And to th'adventurers thus he writes 'Be not dismayed at all, For scandal cannot do us wrong, God will not let us fall 50 Let England know our willingness, for that our work is good,
 We hope to plant a nation, where none before hath stood.

'To glorify the Lord 'tis done, and to no other end, He that would cross so good a work, to God can be no friend
 There is no fear of hunger here, for corn much store here grows, Much fish the gallant rivers yield, 'tis truth without suppose

'Great store of fowl, of venison, of grapes and mulberries, Of chestnuts, walnuts, and such like, of fruits and strawberries, There is indeed no want at all, but some, conditioned ill,
That wish the work should not go on, with words do seem to kill.' 60

And for an instant of their store, the noble
Delaware
Hath for the present hither sent, to testify his care
In managing so good a work, two gallant ships, by name
The Blessing and the Hercules, well fraught, and in the same

Two ships are these commodities: furs, sturgeon, caviar,
Black-walnut tree, and some deal boards, with such they laden are;
Some pearl, some wainscot and clapboards, with some sassafras wood,
And iron promised, for 'tis true their mines are very good.

Then maugre scandal, false report, or any opposition, Th'adventurers do thus divulge to men of good condition, 70
That he that wants shall have relief, be he of honest mind, Apparel, coin, or any thing, to such they will be kind,

To such as to Virginia do purpose to repair,
And when that they shall thither come,
each man shall have his share.
Day wages for the laborer, and for his more content, A house and garden plot shall have;
besides, 'tis further meant

That every man shall have a part, and not there be denied Of general profit, as if that he twelve pounds ten shillings paid;
And he that in Virginia shall copper coin receive,
For hire or commodities, and will the country leave 80

Upon delivery of such coin unto the governor, Shall by exchange at his return be by their treasurer Paid him in London at first sight, no man shall cause to grieve, For 'tis their general will and wish that every man should live.

The number of adventurers, that are for this plantation, Are full eight hundred worthy men, some noble, all of fashion Good, discreet, their work is good, and as they have begun, May Heaven assist them in their work; and thus our news is done.

WILLIAM BRADFORD

1590-1657

FROM OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION OF THEIR VOYAGE, AND HOW THEY PASSED THE SEA, AND OF THEIR SAFE ARRIVAL AT CAPE COD<sup>1</sup>

SEPTEMBER 6, [1620]. These troubles being blown over, and now all being compact together in one ship, they put to sea again with a prosperous wind, which continued divers days together, which was some encouragement unto them; yet according to the usual manner many were afflicted with seasickness And I may not omit here a special work of God's providence. There was a proud and very profane young man, one of the seamen, of a lusty, able body, which made him the more haughty, he would always be contemning the poor people in their sickness, and cursing them daily with grievous execrations, and did not let to tell them that he hoped to help to cast half of them overboard before they came to their journey's end, and to make merry with what they had, and if he were by any gently reproved, he would curse and swear most bitterly. But it pleased God before they

1 The selection, the text of which has been modernized by the editors, is Chapter 9 of Of Plymouth Plantation.

came half-seas over to smite this young man with a grievous disease, of which he died in a desperate manner, and so was himself the first that was thrown over-board. Thus his curses light on his own head, and it was an astonishment to all his fellows, for they noted it to be the just hand of God upon him.

After they had enjoyed fair winds and weather for a season, they were encountered many times with cross winds, and met with many fierce storms, with which the ship was shrewdly shaken, and her upper works made very leaky, and one of the main beams in the midships was bowed and cracked, which put them in some fear that the ship could not be able to perform the voyage. So some of the chief of the company, perceiving the mariners to fear the sufficiency of the ship, as appeared by their mutterings, they entered into serious consultation with the master and other officers of the ship, to consider in time of the danger, and rather to return than to cast themselves into a desperate and inevitable peril. And truly there was great distraction and difference of opinion amongst the mariners themselves, fain would they do what could be done for their wages' sake (being now half the seas over), and on the other hand they were loath to hazard their lives too desperately. But in examining of all opinions, the master and others affirmed they knew the ship to be strong and firm under water, and for the buckling of the main beam, there was a great iron screw the passengers brought out of Holland which would raise the beam into his place, the which being done, the carpenter and master affirmed that with a post put under it, set firm in the lower deck, and otherways bound, he would make it sufficient. And as for the decks and upper works, they would caulk them as well as they could, and though with the working of the ship they would not long keep staunch, yet there would otherwise be no great danger, if they did not overpress her with sails. So they committed themselves to the will of God, and resolved to proceed. In sundry of these storms the winds were so fierce, and the seas so high, as they could not bear a knot of sail, but were forced to hull, for divers days together. And in one of them, as they thus lay at hull in a mighty storm, a lusty young man (called John Howland), coming upon some occasion above the gratings, was with a seel of the ship thrown into the sea, but it pleased God that he caught hold of the topsail halyards, which hung over-board and ran out at length, yet he held his hold, though he was sundry fathoms under water, till he was hauled up by the same rope to the brim of the water, and then with a boat hook and other means got into the ship again, and his life saved, and though he was something ill with it, yet he lived many years after, and became a profitable member both in church and commonwealth. In all this voyage there died but one of the passengers, which was William Batten, a youth, servant to Samuel Fuller, when they drew near the coast. But to omit other things, that I may be brief, after long beating at sea they fell with that land which is called Cape Cod, the which being made and certainly known to be it, they were not a little joyful. After some deliberation had amongst themselves and with the master of the ship, they tacked about and resolved to stand for the southward, the wind and weather being fair, to find some place about Hudson's River for their habitation. But after they had sailed that course about half the day, they fell amongst dangerous shoals and roaring breakers, and they were so far entangled therewith as they conceived themselves in great danger, and the wind shrinking upon them withall, they resolved to bear up again for the Cape, and thought themselves happy to get out of those dangers before night overtook them, as by God's providence they did. And the next day they got into the Cape harbor where they rid in safety. A word or two by the way of this cape, it was thus first named by Captain Gosnold and his company,<sup>1</sup> Anno 1602, and after by Captain Smith was called Cape James, but it retains the former name amongst seamen. Also that point which first showed those dangerous shoals unto them, they called Point Care, and Tucker's Terror, but the French and Dutch to this day call it Malabarr, by reason of those perilous shoals and the losses they have suffered there.

Being thus arrived in a good harbor and brought safe to land, they fell upon their knees and blessed the God of heaven, who had brought them over the vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all the perils and miseries thereof, again to set their feet on the firm and stable earth, their proper element. And no marvel if they were thus joyful, seeing wise Seneca was so affected with sailing a few miles on the coast of his own Italy, as he affirmed that he had rather remain twenty years on his way by land than pass by sea to any place in a short time, so tedious and dreadful was the same unto him.

But here I cannot but stay and make a pause, and stand half amazed at this poor people's present condition, and so I think will the reader too, when he well considers the same. Being thus passed the vast ocean, and a sea of troubles before in their preparation (as may be remembered by that which went before), they had now no friends to welcome them, nor inns to entertain or refresh their weather-beaten bodies, no houses or much less towns to repair to, to seek for succor. It is recorded in Scripture as a mercy to the apostle and his shipwrecked company that the barbarians showed them no small kindness in refreshing them, but these savage barbarians, when they met with them (as after will appear) were readier to fill their sides full of arrows than otherwise. And for the season it was winter, and they that know the winters of that country know them to be sharp and violent, and subject to cruel and fierce storms, dangerous to travel to known places, much more to search an unknown coast. Besides, what could they see but a hideous and desolate wilderness, full of wild beasts and wild men? And what multitudes there might be of them they knew not. Neither could they, as it were, go up to the top of Pisgah, to view from this wilderness a more goodly country to feed their hopes, for which way soever they turned their eyes (save upward to the heavens), they could have little solace or content in respect of any outward objects. For summer being done, all things stand upon them with a weather-beaten face, and the whole country, full of woods and thickets, represented a wild and savage hue. If they looked behind them, there was the mighty ocean which they had passed, and was now as a main bar and gulf to separate them from all the civil parts of the world. If it be said they had a ship to succor them, it is true, but what heard they daily from the master and company but that with speed they should look out a place with their shallop where they would be at some near distance, for the season was such as he would not stir from thence till a safe harbor was discovered by them where they would be, and he might go without danger, and that victuals consumed apace, but he must and would keep sufficient for themselves and their return? Yea, it was muttered by some that if they got not a place in time, they would turn them and their goods ashore and leave them. Let it also be considered what weak hopes of supply and succor they left behind them, that might bear up their minds in this sad condition and trials they were under, and they could not but be very small. It is true, indeed, the affections and love of their brethren at Leyden was cordial and entire towards them, but they had little power to help them, or themselves, and how the case stood between them and the merchants at their coming away hath already been declared. What could now sustain them but the spirit of God and His grace? May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say 'Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wilderness, but they cried unto the Lord, and He heard their voice, and looked on their adversity, etc. Let them therefore praise the Lord, because He is good, and His mercies endure for ever. Yea, let them which have been redeemed of the Lord show how He hath delivered them from the hand of the oppressor. When they wandered in the desert wilderness out of the way, and found no city to dwell in, both hungry and thirsty, their soul was overwhelmed in them. Let them confess before the Lord His loving kindness, and His wonderful works before the sons of men.'<sup>1</sup>

THE SIEGE OF MA-RE MOUNT<sup>1</sup>

I

Of the Revels of New Canaan

THE inhabitants of Pasonagesst, having translated the name of their habitation from that ancient savage name to Ma-re Mount,<sup>2</sup> and being resolved to have the new name confirmed for a memorial to after-ages, did devise amongst themselves to have it performed in a solemn manner with revels and merriment after the old English custom [They] prepared to set up a Maypole upon the festival day of Philip and Jacob, and therefore brewed a barrel of excellent beer and provided a case of bottles, to be spent, with other good cheer, for all comers of that day And because they would have it in a complete form, they had prepared a song fitting to the time and present occasion And upon May Day they brought the Maypole to the place appointed, with drums, guns, pistols, and other fitting instruments for that purpose, and there erected it with the help of savages that came thither of purpose to see the manner of our revels A goodly pine tree of eighty foot long was reared up, with a pair

7 'But when we cried unto the Lord God of our fathers, the Lord heard our voice, and looked on our adversity, and on our labour, and on our oppression'

Psal 107 1 'Praise the Lord, because he is good for his mercy endureth forever

2 'Let them which have been redeemed of the Lord show how he hath delivered them from the hand of the oppressor

4 'When they wandered in the desert and wilderness out of the way, and found no city to dwell in

5 'Both hungry and thirsty, their soul faunted in them

6 'Let them therefore confess before the Lord his loving kindness, and his wonderful works before the sons of men'

of buck's horns nailed on somewhat near unto the top of it, where it stood as a fair sea-mark for directions how to find out the way to mine host of Ma-re Mount.

And because it should more fully appear to what end it was placed there, they had a poem in readiness made, which was fixed to the Maypole, to show the new name confirmed upon that plantation, which, although it were made according to the occurrences of the time, it being enigmatically composed, puzzled the Separatists most pitifully to expound it, which, for the better information of the reader, I have here inserted

The Poem

Rise, Ædipus, and, if thou canst, unfold What means Charybdis underneath the mold,

When Scylla solitary on the ground (Sitting in form of Niobe) was found, Till Amphitrite's darling did acquaint Grim Neptune with the tenor of her plaint, And caused him send forth Triton with the sound

Of trumpet loud, at which the seas were found

So full of Protean forms that the bold shore Presented Scylla a new paramour So strong as Sampson and so patient his notes as follows "The Fathers of Plymouth, Dorchester, Charlestown, &c, I suppose would not allow the name to be Ma-re-Mount, but insisted upon calling it Merry-Mount, for the same reason that the common people in England will not call gentlemen's ornamental grounds gardens, but insist upon calling them pleasure-grounds, i.e. to excite envy and make them unpopular"

'Ma-re-Mount, however, was a characteristic bit of Latin punning on Morton's part, designed to tease his more austere neighbors He himself says "The inhabitants of Pasonagesst, having translated the name of their habitation from that ancient salvage name to Ma-re-Mount the precise separatists that lived at New Plimmouth stood at defiance with the place threatening to make it a woeful mount and not a merry mount" In view of the situation of the place, Ma-re-Mount was a very appropriate name, but it may well be questioned whether it was ever so called by any human being besides Morton, or by him except in print Bradford calls it Merie-mounte' The translation of the Indian name for Mount Wollaston is probably 'at a place near the little point' Editor's note, C F Adams, Jr, ed, The New English Canaan (Boston, 1883), 14.

As Job himself, directed thus, by fate,
To comfort Scylla so unfortunate I do profess, by Cupid's beauteous mother, Here's Scogan's choice for Scylla, and none other,
Though Scylla's sick with grief, because no sign
Can there be found of virtue masculine.
Aesculapius, come, I know right well His labor's lost when you may ring her knell
The fatal sisters' doom none can withstand,
Nor Cytherea's power, who points to land With proclamation that the first of May At Ma-re Mount shall be kept holiday.

The setting up of this Maypole was a lamentable spectacle to the precise Separat-tists that lived at New Plymouth They termed it an idol, yea, they called it the calf of Horeb, and stood at defiance with the place, naming it Mount Dagon, threatening to make it a woeful mount and not a merry mount

The riddle, for want of Ædipus, they could not expound, only they made some explication of part of it and said it was meant by Sampson Job, the carpenter of the ship that brought over a woman to her husband, that had been there long before and thrived so well that he sent for her and her children to come to him, where shortly after he died, having no reason but because of the sound of those two words, whenas, the truth is, the man they applied it to was altogether unknown to the author

There was likewise a merry song made, which, to make their revels more fashionable, was sung with a chorus, every man bearing his part, which they performed in a dance, hand in hand about the Maypole, while one of the company sung and filled out the good liquor, like Ganymede and Jupiter.

The Song

Chorus

Drink and be merry, merry, merry boys; Let all your delight be in the Hymen's joys, Ið<sup>1</sup> to Hymen! now the day is come,
About the merry Maypole take a room

Make green garlands, bring bottles out,
And fill sweet nectar freely about,
Uncover thy head and fear no harm,
For here's good liquor to keep it warm.
Then drink and be merry, etc.

Ið to Hymen, etc
Nectar is a thing assigned By the deity's own mind
To cure the heart oppressed with grief,
And of good liquors is the chief.

Then drink, etc
Ið to Hymen, etc
Give to the melancholy man
A cup or two of 't now and then;
Thus physic will soon revive his blood,
And make him be of a merrier mood.

Then drink, etc
Give to the nymph that's free from scorn
No Irish stuff nor Scotch overworn Lasses in beaver coats, come away, Ye shall be welcome to us night and day.
To drink and be merry, etc.

This harmless mirth made by young men (that lived in hope to have wives brought over to them, that would save them a labor to make a voyage to fetch any over) was much distasted of the precise Separatists, that keep much ado about the tithe of munt and cummin,<sup>2</sup> troubling their brains more than reason would require about things that are indifferent, and from that time sought occasion against my honest host of Ma-re Mount to overthrow his undertakings and to destroy his plantation quite and clean But because they presumed with their imaginary gifts (which they have out of Phaon's<sup>3</sup> box) they could expound hidden mysteries, to convince them of blindness as well in this as in other matters of more consequence, I will illustrate the poem according to the true intent of the authors of these revels, so much distasted by those moles

<sup>2</sup> 'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of munt, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone' Matthew xxiii 23

<sup>3</sup> Phaon was an old ferryman who once ferried Aphrodite (in the form of an old woman) from Lesbos to the mainland She gave him in thanks a little container of costly ointment, which made him handsome and attractive

Oedipus is generally received for the absolute reader of riddles, who is invoked Scylla and Charybdis are two dangerous places for seamen to encounter, near unto Venice, and have been by poets formerly resembled to man and wife, the like license the author challenged for a pair of his nomination, the one lamenting for the loss of the other as Niobe for her children Amphitrite is an arm of the sea, by which the news was carried up and down of a rich widow, now to be taken up or laid down By Triton is the fame spread that caused the suitors to muster (as it had been to Penelope of Greece), and, the coast lying circular, all our passage to and fro is made more convenient by sea than land Many aimed at this mark, but he that played Proteus best and could comply with her humor must be the man that would carry her, and he had need have Sampson's strength to deal with a Delilah, and as much patience as Job, that should come there, for a thing that I did observe in the lifetime of the former

But marriage and hanging, they say, comes by destiny, and Scogan's choice 'tis better [than] none at all He that played Proteus (with the help of Priapus) put their noses out of joint, as the proverb is

And thus the whole company of the revellers at Ma-re Mount knew to be the true sense and exposition of the riddle that was fixed to the Maypole, which the Separatists were at defiance with Some of them affirmed that the first institution thereof was in memory of a whore, not knowing that it was a trophy erected at first in honor of Maia, the lady of learning, which they despise, vilifying the two Universities with uncivil terms, accounting what is there obtained by study is but unnecessary learning, not considering that learning does enable man's mind to converse with elements of a higher nature than is to be found within the habitation of the mole.

Of a Great Monster Supposed to be at Ma-re Mount, and the Preparation Made to Destroy it

THE Separatists, envying the prosperity and hope of the plantation at Ma-re Mount, which they perceived began to come forward and to be in a good way for gain in the beaver trade, conspired together against mine host especially, who was the owner of that plantation, and made up a party against him, and mustered up what aid they could, accounting of him as of a great monster.

Many threatening speeches were given out both against his person and his habitation, which they divulged should be consumed with fire, and taking advantage of the time when his company, which seemed little to regard their threats, were gone up into the inlands to trade with the savages for beaver, they set upon my honest host at a place called Wessaguscus, where by accident they found him The inhabitants there were in good hope of the subversion of the plantation at Ma-re Mount, which they principally aimed at, and the rather because mine host was a man that endeavored to advance the dignity of the Church of England, which they, on the contrary part, would labor to vilify with uncivil terms, inveighing against the sacred Book of Common Prayer and mine host, that used it in a laudable manner amongst his family as a practise of piety

There he would be a means to bring sacks to their mill (such is the thirst after beaver), and helped the conspirators to surprise mine host, who was there all alone, and they charged him, because they would seem to have some reasonable cause against him to set a gloss upon their malice, with criminal things, which indeed had been done by such a person, but was of their conspiracy Mine host demanded of the conspirators who it was that was author of that information that seemed to be their ground for what they now intended And because they answered they would not tell him, he as peremptorily replied that he would not say whether he had or he had not done as they had been informed.

The answer made no matter, as it seemed, whether it had been negatively or affirmatively made, for they had resolved what he should suffer, because, as they boasted, they were now become the greater number, they had shaken off their shackles of servitude, and were become masters, and masterless people

It appears they were like bears' whelps in former time, when mine host's plantation was of as much strength as theirs, but now, theirs being stronger, they, like overgrown bears, seemed monstrous. In brief, mine host must endure to be their prisoner until they could contrive it so that they might send him for England, as they said, there to suffer according to the merit of the fact which they intended to father upon him, supposing, belike, it would prove a heinous crime.

Much rejoicing was made that they had gotten their capital enemy, as they concluded him, whom they purposed to hamper in such sort that he should not be able to uphold his plantation at Ma-re Mount.

The conspirators sported themselves at my honest host, that meant them no hurt, and were so jocund that they feasted their bodies and fell to tipping as if they had obtained a great prize, like the Trojans when they had the custody of Hippeus' pine-tree horse.

Mine host feigned grief and could not be persuaded either to eat or drink, because he knew emptiness would be a means to make him as watchful as the geese kept in the Roman capitol whereon the contrary part, the conspirators, would be so drowsy that he might have an opportunity to give them a slip, instead of a tester.<sup>1</sup> Six persons of the conspiracy were set to watch him at Wessaguscus. But he kept waking, and in the dead of night (one lying on the bed for further surety) up gets mine host and got to the second door that he was to pass, which, notwithstanding the lock, he got open, and shut it after him with such violence that it affrighted some of the conspirators.

The word, which was given with an alarm, was 'Oh, he's gone, he's gone! What shall we do? He's gone!' The rest, half asleep, start up in amaze, and like rams ran their heads one at another full butt in the dark.

Their grand leader, Captain Shrimp,<sup>2</sup> took on most furiously and tore his clothes for anger to see the empty nest, and their bird gone.

The rest were eager to have torn their hair from their heads, but it was so short that it would give them no hold. Now Captain Shrimp thought in the loss of this prize, which he accounted his masterpiece, all his honor would be lost forever.

In the meantime mine host was got home to Ma-re Mount through the woods, eight miles round about the head of the river Monatoquit that parted the two plantations, finding his way by the help of the lightning (for it thundered as he went, terribly), and there he prepared powder, three pounds dried, for his present employment, and four good guns for him and the two assistants left at his house, with bullets of several sizes, three hundred or thereabouts, to be used if the conspirators should pursue him thither, and these two persons promised their aids in the quarrel, and confirmed that promise with health in good rosa solis.

Now Captain Shrimp, the first captain in the land, as he supposed, must do some new act to repair this loss and to vindicate his reputation, who had sustained blemish by this oversight, begins now to study how to repair or survive his honor. In this manner, calling of council, they conclude.

He takes eight persons more to him, and like the nine worthies of New Canaan they embark with preparation against Ma-re Mount, where this monster of a man, as their phrase was, had his den, the whole number, had the rest not been from home, being but seven, would have given Captain Shrimp a quondam drummer, such a welcome as would have made him wish for a drum as big as Diogenes' tub, that he might have crept into it out of sight.

Now the nine worthies are approached, and mine host prepared, having intelligence by a savage that hastened in love from Wessaguscus to give him notice of their intent.

One of mine host's men proved a craven, the other had proved his wits to purchase a little valor before mine host had observed his posture.

The nine worthies coming before the den of this supposed monster (thus seven-headed Hydra, as they termed him), and began, like Don Quixote against the windmill, to beat a parley and to offer quarter if mine host would yield, for they resolved to send him for England and bade him lay by his arms.

But he, who was the son of a soldier, having taken up arms in his just defense, replied that he would not lay by those arms, because they were so needful at sea if he should be sent over. Yet, to save the effusion of so much worthy blood as would have issued out of the veins of these nine worthies of New Canaan if mine host should have played upon them out at his portholes (for they came within danger like a flock of wild geese, as if they had been tailed one to another, as colts to be sold at a fair), mine host was content to yield upon quarter, and did capitulate with them in what manner it should be, for more certainty, because he knew what Captain Shrimp was.

He expressed that no violence should be offered to his person, none to his goods nor any of his household, but that he should have his arms and what else was requisite for the voyage, which their herald returns, it was agreed upon and should be performed.

But mine host no sooner had set open the door and issued out, but instantly Captain Shrimp and the rest of the worthies stepped to him, laid hold of his arms, and had him down, and so eagerly was every man bent against him (not regarding any agreement made with such a carnal man) that they fell upon him as if they would have eaten him. Some of them were so violent that they would have a slice with scabbard, and all for haste, until an old soldier ('of the Queen's', as the proverb is) that was there by accident, clapped his gun under the weapons and sharply rebuked these worthies for their unworthy practises. So the matter was taken into more deliberate consideration.

Captain Shrimp and the rest of the nine worthies made themselves, by this outrageous riot, masters of mine host of Ma-re Mount, and disposed of what he had at his plantation.

Thus they knew, in the eye of the savages, would add to their glory and diminish the reputation of mine honest host, whom they practised to be rid of upon any terms, as willingly as if he had been the very Hydra of the time.

FROM THE SIMPLE COBBLER OF AGGAWAM

ON WOMEN'S FASHIONS<sup>1</sup>

SHOULD I not keep promise in speaking a little to women's fashions, they would take it unkindly. I was loath to pester better matter with such stuff, I rather thought it meet to let them stand by themselves, like the Quae Genus in the grammar, being deficient, or redundants, not to be brought under any rule. I shall therefore make bold for this once to borrow a little of their loose-tongued liberty, and musspend a word or two upon their long-waisted but short-skirted patience. A little use of my stirrup will do no harm.

30 Ridentem dicere verum, quid prohibet?<sup>2</sup>

Gray gravity itself can well beteam That language be adapted to the theme.
He that to parrots speaks, must parrotize;
He that instructs a fool, may act th' unwise.

It is known more than enough that I am neither niggard nor cynic to the due bravery of the true gentry, if any man muslikes a bullmong drassock more than I, let him take her for his labor, I honor the woman that can honor herself with her attire, a good text always deserves a fair margin, I am not much offended if I see a trim far trimmer than she that wears it, in a word, whatever Christianity or civility will allow,

I can afford with London measure. But when I hear a nugiperous gentledame inquire what dress the Queen is in this week, what the nudustertian fashion of the court, with edge to be in it in all haste, whatever it be, I look at her as the very gizzard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cipher, the epitome of nothing, fitter to be kicked, if she were of a kickable substance, than either honored or humored

To speak moderately, I truly confess it is beyond the ken of my understanding to conceive how those women should have any true grace or valuable virtue that have so little wit as to disfigure themselves with such exotic garbs as not only dismantles their native lovely lustre but transclouts them into gant bar-geese, ill-shapen, shotten shellfish, Egyptian hieroglyphics, or at the best into French flirts of the pastry, which a proper Englishwoman should scorn with her heels, it is no marvel they wear drauls on the hinder part of their heads, having nothing as it seems in the fore part but a few squirrels' brains to help them frisk from one ill-favored fashion to another.

These whim-crowned shes, these fashion-fancying wits,
Are empty thin-brained shells and fiddling kuts

The very troublers and impoverishers of mankind, I can hardly forbear to commend to the world a saying of a lady living sometime with the Queen of Bohemia, I know not where she found it, but it is pity it should be lost.

The world is full of care, much like unto a bubble, Women and care, and care and women, and women and care and trouble

The verses are even enough for such odd pegmas. I can make myself sick at any time with comparing the dazzling splendor wherewith our gentlewomen were embellished in some former habits, with the gut-foundered goosedom wherewith they are now surcingle and debauched. We have about five or six of them in our colony, if I see any of them accidentally, I cannot cleanse my fancy of them for a month after I have been a solitary widower almost twelve years, purposed lately to make a step over to my native country for a yoke-fellow, but when I consider how women there have tripe-wifed themselves with their cladments, I have no heart to the voyage, lest their nauseous shapes and the sea should work too sorely upon my stomach I speak sadly, methinks it should break the hearts of Englishmen to see so many goodly Englishwomen imprisoned in French cages, peering out of their hood-holes for some men of mercy to help them with a little wit, and nobody relieves them.

It is a more common than convenient saying that nine tailors make a man, it were well if nineteen could make a woman to her mind, if tailors were men indeed, well furnished but with mere moral principles, they would disdain to be led about like apes by such mimic marmosets. It is a most unworthy thing for men that have bones in them to spend their lives in making fiddle-cases for futious women's fancies, which are the very pettitoes of infirmity, the giblets of perquisquian toys. I am so charitable to think that most of that mystery would work the cheerfuller while they live if they might be well discharged of the tiring slavery of mis-tiring women, it is no little labor to be continually putting up Englishwomen into outlandish casks, who, if they be not shifted anew once in a few months, grow too sour for their husbands What this trade will answer for themselves when God shall take measure of tailors' consciences is beyond my skill to imagine There was a time when

The joining of the red rose with the white Did set our state into a damask plight

But now our roses are turned to fleur-de-lis, our carnations to tulips, our gilliflowers to daisies, our city-dames to an indenominable quaemalry of overturcased things He that makes coats for the moon had need to take measure every noon, and he that makes for women, as often, to keep them from lunacy

I have often heard divers ladies vent loud feminine complaints of the wearisome varieties and chargeable changes of fashions, I marvel themselves prefer not a bill of redress I would Essex ladies would lead the chore, for the honor of their county and persons, or rather the thrice honorable ladies of the court, whom it best beseems, who may well presume of a le roy le veult from our sober King, a les seigneurs ont assensus from our prudent Peers, and the like assensus, from our considerate, I dare not say wife-worn Commons,<sup>1</sup> who I believe had much rather pass one such bill than pay so many tailors' bills as they are forced to do

Most dear and unparalleled ladies, be pleased to attempt it, as you have the precellency of the women of the world for beauty and feature, so assume the honor to give and not take law from any, in matter of attire, if ye can transact so fair a motion among yourselves unanimously, I dare say they that most reneite will least repent. What greater honor can your honors desire than to build a promontory president to all foreign ladies, to deserve so eminently at the hands of all the English gentry present and to come, and to confute the opinion of all the wise men in the world, who never thought it possible for women to do so good a work?

If any man think I have spoken rather merrily than seriously, he is much mistaken, I have written what I write with all the indignation I can, and no more than I ought. I confess I veered my tongue to this kind of language de industria though unwillingly, supposing those I speak to are incapable of grave and rational arguments.

I desire all ladies and gentlewomen to understand that all this while I intend not such as, through necessary modesty to avoid morose singularity, follow fashions slowly, a flight shot or two off, showing by their moderation that they rather draw counterpoint with their hearts than put on by their examples.

I point my pen only against the light-heeled beagles that lead the chase so fast that they run all civility out of breath, against these ape-headed pullets which invent antique fool-fangles merely for fashion and novelty's sake.

In a word, if I begin once to declaim against fashions, let men and women look well about them, there is somewhat in the business, I confess to the world I never had grace enough to be strict in that kind, and of late years I have found syrup of pride very wholesome in a due dose, which makes me keep such store of that drug by me that if anybody comes to me for a question-full or two about fashions, they never complain of me for giving them hard measure, or underweight.

But I address myself to those who can both hear and mend all if they please, I seriously fear, if the pious Parliament do not find a time to state fashions, as ancient Parliaments have done in part, God will hardly find a time to state religion or peace, they are the surquedryes of pride, the wantonness of idleness, provoking sins, the certain prodromies of assured judgment, Zeph 1 7,8

It is beyond all account how many gentlemen's and citizens' estates are deplored by their feather-headed wives, what useful supplies the pannage of England would afford other countries, what rich returns to itself, if it were not sliced out into male and female fripperies, and what a multitude of misemployed hands might be better improved in some more manly manufactures for the public weal. It is not easily credible what may be said of the preterpluralties of tailors in London, I have heard an honest man say that not long since there were numbered between Temple Bar and Charing Cross eight thousand of that trade, let it be conjectured by that proportion how many there are in and about London, and in all England they will appear to be very numerous. If the Parliament would please to mend women, which their husbands dare not do, there need not so many men to make and mend as there are. I hope the present doleful estate of the realm will persuade more strongly to some considerate course herein than I now can.

Knew I how to bring it in, I would speak a word to long hair, whereof I will say no more but this: if God proves not such a barber to it as he threatens, unless it be amended (Isa 7 20) before the peace of the State and Church be well settled, then

let my prophecy be scorned as a sound mind scorns the riot of that sin, and more it needs not If those who are termed Rattle-heads and Impuritans would take up a resolution to begin in moderation of hair, to the just reproach of those that are called Puritans and Roundheads, I would honor their manliness as much as the others' godliness, so long as I knew what man or honor meant, if neither can find a barber's shop, let them turn in to Pss 68 21, Jer 7 29; 1 Cor 11 14 If it be thought no wisdom in men to distinguish themselves in the field by the scissors, let it be thought no injustice in God not to distinguish them by the sword I had rather God should know me by my sobriety than mine enemy not know me by my vanity He is ill kept that is kept by his own sin A short promise is a far safer guard than a long lock, it is an ill distinction which God is loath to look at, and His angels cannot know His saints by Though it be not the mark of the Beast, yet it may be the mark of a beast prepared to slaughter I am sure men used not to wear such manes, I am also sure soldiers used to wear other marklets or notadoes in time of battle breast to sing its proper part, and every

FROM THE BLOODY TENENT YET MORE BLOODY

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN TRUTH AND PEACE<sup>4</sup>

Truth Dear Peace, our golden sand is out, we now must part, with an holy kiss of heavenly peace and love Mr Cotton speaks and writes his conscience, yet the Father of Lights may please to show him that what he highly esteems as a tenet washed white in the Lamb's blood is yet more black and abominable in the most pure and jealous eye of God

Plautus, Mil 3, 1, 184

<sup>3</sup> 'Any man who breaks the law because of poverty is not much of a criminal' Petronius, 133

<sup>4</sup> The selection, to which the title has been given and the text modernized by the editors, is from The Bloody Tenent yet more Bloody by Mr Cotton's Endeavor to Wash it White in the Blood of the Lamb (London, 1652), reprinted in Pub of the Narraganset Club, 1st Series, IV, 493-501

Peace The blackamoor's darkness differs not in the dark from the fairest white

Truth Christ Jesus the Sun of Righteousness hath broke forth, and daily will, to a brighter and brighter discovery of this deformed Ethiopian, and for myself I must proclaim before the Most Holy God, angels, and men that whatever other white and heavenly tenets Mr Cotton holds, yet this is a foul, a black, and a bloody tenet

A tenet of high blasphemy against the God of Peace, the God of Order, who hath of one blood made all mankind, to dwell upon the face of the earth, now all confounded and destroyed in their civil beings and subsistences by mutual flames of war from their several respective religions and consciences 40

A tenet warring against the Prince of Peace, Christ Jesus, denying His appearance and coming in the flesh to put an end to and abolish the shadows of that ceremonial and typical land of Canaan.

A tenet fighting against the sweet end of His coming, which was not to destroy men's lives for their religions, but to save them by the meek and peaceable invitations and persuasions of His peaceable wisdom's maidens

A tenet foully charging His wisdom, faithfulness, and love, in so poorly providing such magistrates and civil powers all the world over as might effect so great a charge pretended to be committed to them

A tenet lamentably guilty of His most precious blood, shed in the blood of so many hundred thousand of His poor servants by the civil powers of the world, pretending to suppress blasphemies, heresies, idolatries, superstition, etc

A tenet fighting with the spirit of love, holiness, and meekness, by kindling fiery spirits of false zeal and fury, when yet such spirits know not of what spirit they are

A tenet fighting with those mighty angels who stand up for the peace of the saints against Persia, Greece, etc., and so consequently all other nations who, fighting for their several religions and against the truth, leave no room for such as fear and love the Lord on the earth

A tenet against which the blessed souls under the altar cry loud for vengeance, this tenet having cut their throats, torn out their hearts, and poured forth their blood in all ages, as the only heretics and blasphemers in the world.

A tenet which no uncleanness, no adultery, incest, sodomy, or bestiality can equal, this ravishing and forcing (explicitly or implicitly) the very souls and consciences of all the nations and inhabitants of the world

A tenet that puts out the very eye of all true faith, which cannot but be as free and voluntary as any virgin in the world, in refusing or embracing any spiritual offer or object

A tenet loathsome and ugly (in the eyes of the God of Heaven, and serious sons of men) I say, loathsome with the palpable filths of gross dissimulation and hypocrisy, thousands of peoples and whole nations compelled by this tenet to put on the foul vizard of religious hypocrisy for fear of laws, losses, and punishments, and for the keeping and hoping for of favor, liberty, worldly commodity, etc.

A tenet woefully guilty of hardening all false and deluded consciences (of whatsoever sect, faction, heresy, or idolatry, though never so horrid and blasphemous) by cruelties and violences practiced against them, all false teachers and their followers (ordinarily) contracting a brawny and steely hardness from their sufferings for their consciences

A tenet that shuts and bars out the gracious prophecies and promises and discoveries of the most glorious Sun of Righteousness, Christ Jesus, that burns up the Holy Scriptures, and forbids them, upon the point, to be read in English, or that any trial or search, or truly free disquisition be made by them, when the most able, diligent, and conscionable readers must pluck forth their own eyes, and be forced to read by the (whichever predominant) clergy's spectacles

A tenet that seals up the spiritual graves of all men, Jews and Gentiles, and consequently stands guilty of the damnation of all men, since no preachers nor trumpets of Christ himself may call them out but such as the several and respective nations of the world themselves allow of

A tenet that fights against the common principles of all civility, and the very civil being and combinations of men in nations, cities, etc., by commixing (explicitly or implicitly) a spiritual and civil state together, and so confounding and overthrowing the purity and strength of both

A tenet that kindles the devouring flames of combustions and wars in most nations of the world, and (if God were not infinitely gracious) had almost ruined the English, French, the Scotch and Irish, and many other nations, German, Polonian, Hungarian, Bohemian, etc

A tenet that bows down the backs and necks of all civil states and magistrates, kings and emperors, under the proud feet of that man and monster of sin and pride the pope, and all popish and proud clergymen, rendering such laics and seculars (as they call them) but slavish executioners (upon the point) of their most imperious synodical decrees and sentences.

A tenet that renders the highest civil magistrates and ministers of justice (the fathers and gods of their countries) either odious or lamentably grievous unto the very best subjects by either clapping or keeping on the iron yokes of cruelest oppression No yoke or bondage comparably so grievous, as that upon the soul's neck of men's religion and consciences

A tenet all besprinkled with the bloody murders, stabs, poisonings, pistolings, powder-plots, etc., against many famous kings, princes, and states, either actually performed or attempted, in France, England, Scotland, Low Countries, and other nations

A tenet all red and bloody with those most barbarous and tiger-like massacres of so many thousand and ten thousands formerly in France, and other parts, and so lately and so horribly in Ireland, of which, whatever causes be assigned, this chiefly will be found the true, and while this continues (to wit, violence against conscience), this bloody issue sooner or later must break forth again (except God wonderfully stop it) in Ireland and other places too

A tenet that stunts the growth and flourishing of the most likely and hopefulest commonweals and countries, while consciences the best and the best-deserving subjects are forced to fly (by enforced or voluntary banishment) from their native countries, the lamentable proof whereof England hath felt in the flight of so many worthy English into the Low Countries and New England, and from New England into Old again and other foreign parts

A tenet whose gross partiality denies the principles of common justice, while men weigh out to the consciences of all others that which they judge not fit nor right to be weighed out to their own, since the persecutor's rule is to take and persecute all consciences, only himself must not be touched

A tenet that is but Machiavellism, and makes a religion but a cloak or stalking horse to policy and private ends of Jero-boam's crown, and the priest's benefice, etc.

A tenet that corrupts and spoils the very civil honesty and natural conscience of a nation, since conscience to God, violated, proves (without repentance) ever after a very jade, a drug, loose and unconscionable in all converse with men

Lastly, a tenet in England most unseasonable, as pouring oil upon those flames which the high wisdom of the Parliament (by easing the yokes on men's consciences) had begun to quench

In the sad consideration of all which, dear Peace, let heaven and earth judge of the washing and color of this tenet. For thee, sweet heavenly guest, go lodge thee in the breasts of the peaceable and humble witnesses of Jesus, that love the truth in peace! Hide thee from the world's tumults and combustions, in the breasts of thy truly noble children, who profess and endeavor to break the irony and insupportable yokes upon the souls and consciences of any of the sons of men

Peace Methinks, dear Truth, if any of the least of these deep charges be found against this tenet, you do not wrong it when you style it bloody, but since, in the woeful proof of all ages past since Nimrod (the hunter or persecutor before the Lord), these and more are lamentably evident and undeniable, it gives me wonder that so many and so excellent eyes of God's servants should not espy so foul a monster, especially considering the universal opposition this tenet makes against God's glory, and the good of all mankind

Truth There hath been many foul opinions with which the old Serpent hath infected and bewitched the sons of men (touching God, Christ, the Spirit, the Church, against holiness, against peace, against civil obedience, against chastity), in so much that even sodomy itself hath been a tenet maintained in print by some of the very pillars of the Church of Rome; but this tenet is so universally opposite to God and man, so pernicious and destructive to both (as hath been declared), that like the powder-plot it threatens to blow up all religion, all civility, all humanity, yea, the very being of the world and the nations thereof at once

Peace He that is the father of lies, and a murderer from the beginning, he knows this well, and this ugly blackamoor needs a mask or vizard.

Truth Yea, the bloodiness and inhumanity of it is such that not only Mr Cotton's more tender and holy breast but even the most bloody Bonners and Gardiners have been forced to arm themselves with the fair shows and glorious pretences of the glory of God, and zeal for that glory, the love of His truth, the gospel of Christ Jesus, love and pity to men's souls, the peace of the Church, uniformity, order, the peace of the commonweal, the wisdom of the State, the king's, queen's and parliament's proceedings, the odiousness of sects, heresies, blasphemies, novelties, seducers, and their insections, the obstinacy of heretics, after all means, disputations, examinations, synods, yea, and after conviction in the poor heretic's own conscience, add to these the flattering sound of those glozing titles—the godly magistrate, the Christian magistrate, the nursing fathers and mothers of the Church, Christian kings and queens But all other kings and magistrates (even all the nations of the world over, as Mr Cotton pleads) must suspend and hold their hands, and not meddle in matters of religion, until they be informed, etc

Peace The dreadful righteous hand of God, the eternal and avenging God, is pulling off these masks and vizards, that thousands and the world may see this bloody tenet's beauty

Truth But see, my heavenly sister and true stranger in this sea-like restless, raging world, see here what fires and swords are come to part us! Well, our meetings in the heavens shall not thus be interrupted, our kisses thus distracted, and our eyes and cheeks thus wet, unwiped For me, though censured, threatened, persecuted, I must profess while heaven and earth lasts that no one tenet that either London, England, or the world doth harbor is so heretical, blasphemous, seditious, and dangerous to the corporal, to the spiritual, to the present, to the eternal good of all men, as the bloody tenet (however washed and whited), I say, as is the bloody tenet of persecution for cause of conscience

A LETTER TO THE TOWN OF PROVIDENCE<sup>1</sup>

THAT ever I should speak or write a tittle that tends to such an infinite liberty of conscience is a mistake, and which I have ever disclaimed and abhorred. To prevent such mistakes, I shall at present only propose this case. There goes many a ship to sea, with many hundred souls in one ship, whose weal and woe is common, and is a true picture of a commonwealth or a human combination or society. It hath fallen out sometimes that both papists and Protestants, Jews and Turks may be embarked in one ship, upon which supposal I affirm that all the liberty of conscience that ever I pleaded for turns upon these two hinges—that none of the papists, Protestants, Jews, or Turks be forced to come to the ship's prayers or worship, nor compelled from their own particular prayers or worship, if they practice any. I further add that I never denied that, notwithstanding this liberty, the commander of this ship ought to command the ship's course, yea, and also command that justice, peace, and sobriety be kept and practiced, both among the seamen and all the passengers. If any of the seamen refuse to perform their services, or passengers to pay their freight, if any refuse to help, in person or purse, towards the common charges or defence, if any refuse to obey the common laws and orders of the ship concerning their common peace or preservation, if any shall mutiny and rise up against their commanders and officers, if any should preach or write that there ought to be no commanders or officers, because all are equal in Christ, therefore no masters nor officers, no laws nor orders, nor corrections nor punishments—I say, I never denied but in such cases, whatever is pretended, the commander or commanders may judge, resist, compel, and punish such transgressors, according to their desserts and merits. This, if seriously and honestly minded, may, if it so please the Father of Lights, let in some light to such as willingly shut not their eyes

I remain studious of your common peace and liberty

FROM DAILY MEDITATIONS

JULY 21. THE 7TH DAY

Meditat 9

MAN's life is like a rose that in the spring Begins to blossom, fragrant smells to bring Within a day or two, behold Death's sent,
A public messenger of discontent

Lord grant, that when my rose begins to fade,

I may behold an everlasting shade.

ALAS, what is the world? A sea of glass!
Alas, what's earth? It's but an hourglass!
The sea dissolves, the glass is quickly run, Behold, with speed man's life is quickly done

Let me so swim in this sea, that I may With Thee live happy in another day.

HAD I as many days to live, as I See drops are in the sea, yet I must die
Each day a drop would carry away a day,
And so my life would swiftly pass away Jehovah great, humbly I Thee beseech
The number of my days me for to teach.

EVERY day do see that here below Is nothing permanent, away they go

Friends and relations, every thing that I Do cast my eyes upon is vanity

Give me a portion then, even in that place

Where still I may behold Thy blessed face

I now lie down to rest, but do not know Where by the morning God will me bestow.

ETERNITY! O soul-amazing thought, That never to my senses yet was brought Rightly to understand it Oh, the height, The breadth, the length, the depth of what I slight!

Help, Son of David, mercy on me have.
Thus is a-coming, I must to the grave.

THE time will be when we shall be No more.
Where will the world be then? 'Twill be
No more

Where will our comforts be? They'll be

Where will our friends be then? They'll be

Lord, grant me then thy grace, lest that

Do seize upon me, and I be No more.

FROM MEDITATIONS DIVINE AND MORAL

FOR MY DEAR SON SIMON BRADSTREET <sup>1</sup>

PARENTS perpetuate their lives in their posterity, and their manners in their imitation Children do naturally rather follow the failings than the virtues of their predecessors, but I am persuaded better things of you You once desired me to leave something for <sup>1</sup> The texts of both prose and poetry have been modernized by the editors

you in writing that you might look upon when you should see me no more I could think of nothing more fit for you, nor of more ease to myself, than these short meditations following Such as they are I bequeath to you: small legacies are accepted by true friends, much more by dutiful children I have avoided encroaching upon others' conceptions, because I would leave you nothing but mine own, though in value they fall short of all in this kind, yet I presume they will be better prized by you for the author's sake. The Lord bless you with grace here, and crown you with glory hereafter, that I may meet you with rejoicing at that great day of appearing, which is the continual prayer of

Your affectionate mother,

THIRTY-THREE MEDITATIONS

1

THERE is no object that we see, no action that we do, no good that we enjoy, no evil that we feel or fear, but we may make some spiritual advantage of all, and he that makes such improvement is wise, as well as pious

2

Many can speak well, but few can do well We are better scholars in the theory than the practical part, but he is a true Christian that is a proficient in both

3

Youth is the time of getting, middle age of improving, and old age of spending, a negligent youth is usually attended by an ignorant middle age, and both by an empty old age He that hath nothing to feed on but vanity and lies must needs lie down in the bed of sorrow.

4

A ship that bears much sail, and little or no ballast, is easily overset, and that man whose head hath great abilities, and his heart little or no grace, is in danger of foundering

5

It is reported of the peacock that, priding himself in his gay feathers, he ruffles them up, but, spying his black feet, he soon lets fall his plumes so he that glories in his gifts and adornings should look upon his corruptions, and that will damp his high thoughts.

6

The finest bread hath the least bran; the purest honey, the least wax, and the sincerest Christian, the least self-love.

7

The hireling that labors all the day comforts himself that when night comes he shall both take his rest and receive his reward:

the painful Christian that hath wrought hard in God's vineyard and hath born the heat and drougt of the day, when he perceives his sun apace to decline, and the shadows of his evening to be stretched out, lifts up his head with joy, knowing his refreshing is at hand.

8

Downy beds make drowsy persons, but hard lodging keeps the eyes open. A prosperous state makes a secure Christian, but adversity makes him consider

9

Sweet words are like honey a little may refresh, but too much gluts the stomach

10

Diverse children have their different natures some are like flesh which nothing but salt will keep from putrefaction, some again like tender fruits that are best preserved with sugar Those parents are wise that can fit their nurture according to their nature

11

That town which thousands of enemies without hath not been able to take, hath been delivered up by one traitor within, and that man which all the temptations of Satan without could not hurt, hath been foiled by one lust within

12

Authority without wisdom is like a heavy axe without an edge, fitter to bruise than polish

13

The reason why Christians are so loath to exchange this world for a better is because they have more sense than faith they see what they enjoy, they do but hope for that which is to come

14

If we had no winter, the spring would not be so pleasant if we did not sometimes taste of adversity, prosperity would not be so welcome

16

That house which is not often swept makes the cleanly inhabitant soon loathe it, and that heart which is not continually purifying itself is no fit temple for the spirit of God to dwell in

He that will undertake to climb up a steep mountain with a great burden on his back will find it a wearisome, if not an impossible task: so he that thinks to mount to heaven clogged with the cares and riches of this life, 'tis no wonder if he faint by the way.

19

Corn, till it have passed through the mill and been ground to powder, is not fit for bread God so deals with his servants He grinds them with grief and pain till they turn to dust, and then are they fit manchet for His mansion

23

The skilful fisher hath his several baits for several fish, but there is a hook under all Satan, that great angler, hath his sundry baits for sundry tempers of men, which they all catch greedily at, but few perceive the hook till it be too late

25

An aching head requires a soft pillow, and a drooping heart a strong support.

31

Iron till it be thoroughly heat is incapable to be wrought so God sees good to cast some men into the furnace of affliction, and then beats them on His anvil into what frame He pleases.

32

Ambitious men are like hops that never rest climbing so long as they have any thing to stay upon, but take away their props, and they are of all the most dejected

34

Dim eyes are the concomitants of old age, and shortsightedness, in those that are eyes of a republic, foretells a declining state

35

We read in Scripture of three sorts of arrows—the arrow of an enemy, the arrow of pestilence, and the arrow of a slanderous tongue, the two first kill the body, the last

the good name, the two former leave a man when he is once dead, but the last mangles him in his grave

Sore laborers have hard hands, and old sinners have brawny consciences.

38

Some children are hardly weaned although the teat be rubbed with wormwood or mustard, they will either wipe it off or else suck down sweet and bitter together So is it with some Christians let God embitter all the sweets of this life that so they might feed upon more substantial food, yet they are so childishly sottish that they are still hugging and sucking these empty breasts, that God is forced to hedge up their way with thorns, or lay affliction on their loins, that so they might shake hands with the world before it bid them farewell

45

We often see stones hang with drops, not from any innate moisture, but from a thick air about them So may we sometimes see marble-hearted sinners seem full of contrition, but it is not from any dew of grace within, but from some black clouds that impend them, which produce these sweating effects.

50

Sometimes the sun is only shadowed by a cloud that we cannot see his luster, although we may walk by his light, but when he is set we are in darkness till he arise again So God doth sometimes veil His face but for a moment, that we cannot behold the light of His countenance as at some other time, yet He affords so much light as may direct our way, that we may go forwards to the city of habitation; but when He seems to set and be quite gone out of sight, then must we needs walk in darkness and see no light, yet then must we trust in the Lord, and stay upon our God, and when the morning (which is the appointed time) is come, the Sun of Righteousness will arise with healing in His wings.

He that is to sail into a far country, although the ship, cabin, and provision be all convenient and comfortable for him, yet he hath no desire to make that his place of residence, but longs to put in at that port where his business lies. A Christian is sailing through this world unto his heavenly country, and here he hath many conveniences and comforts, but he must beware of desiring to make this the place of his abode, lest he meet with such tossings that may cause him to long for shore before he sees land. We must, therefore, be here as strangers and pilgrims, that we may plainly declare that we seek a city above, and wait all the days of our appointed time till our change shall come.

61

Corn is produced with much labor (as the husbandman well knows), and some land asks much more pains than some other doth to be brought into tilth, yet all must be ploughed and harrowed, some children (like sour land) are of so tough and morose a disposition, that the plough of correction must make long furrows on their back, and the harrow of discipline go often over them, before they be fit soil to sow the seed of morality, much less of grace in them. But when by prudent nurture they are brought into a fit capacity, let the seed of good instruction and exhortation be sown in the spring of their youth, and a plentiful crop may be expected in the harvest of their years.

62

As man is called the little world, so his heart may be called the little commonwealth. His more fixed and resolved thoughts are like to inhabitants, his slight and flitting thoughts are like passengers that travel to and fro continually, here is also the great court of justice erected, which is always kept by conscience, who is both accuser, excuser, witness, and judge, whom no bribes can pervert, nor flattery cause to favor, but as he finds the evidence, so he absolves or condemns, yea, so absolute is this court of judicature, that there is no appeal from it—no, not to the court of heaven itself, for if our conscience condemn us, He also, who is greater than our conscience, will do it much more, but he that would have boldness to go to the throne of grace to be accepted there, must be sure to carry a certificate from the court of conscience, that he stands right there.

67

All the works and doings of God are wonderful, but none more awful than His great work of election and reprobation, when we consider how many good parents have had bad children, and again how many bad parents have had pious children, it should make us adore the sovereignty of God, who will not be tied to time nor place, nor yet to persons, but takes and chooses when and where and whom He pleases, it should also teach the children of godly parents to walk with fear and trembling, lest they, through unbelief, fall short of a promise, it may also be a support to such as have or had wicked parents, that, if they abide not in unbelief, God is able to graft them in, the upshot of all should make us, with the Apostle, to admire the justice and mercy of God, and say, how unsearchable are His ways, and His footsteps past finding out.

70

All men are truly said to be tenants at will, and it may as truly be said that all have a lease of their lives—some longer, some shorter—as it pleases our great Landlord to let. All have their bounds set, over which they cannot pass, and till the expiration of that time, no dangers, no sickness, no pains nor troubles shall put a period to our days; the certainty that that time will come, together with the uncertainty how, where, and when, should make us so to number our days as to apply our hearts to wisdom, that when we are put out of these houses of clay, we may be sure of an everlasting habitation that fades not away.

77

God hath by His providence so ordered that no one country hath all commodities within itself, but what it wants another shall supply, that so there may be a mutual commerce through the world. As it is with countries, so it is with men: there was never yet any one man that had all excellences, let his parts, natural and acquired, spiritual and moral, be never so large, yet he stands in need of something which another man hath (perhaps meaner than himself); which shows us perfection is not below, as also that God will have us beholden one to another.

If what I do prove well, it won't advance; They'll say it's stol'n, or else it was by chance

THE PROLOGUE

I

To sing of wars, of captains, and of kings,
Of cities founded, commonwealths begun,
For my mean pen are too superior things, Or how they all, or each, their dates have run,

Let poets and historians set these forth, My obscure lines shall not so dim their

2

But when my wond'ring eyes and envious heart
Great Bartas sugared lines do but read o'er,
Fool, I do grudge the muses did not part
'Twixt him and me that overfluent store. 10 A Bartas can do what a Bartas will,
But simple I according to my skill

3

From schoolboy's tongue no rhet'ric we expect,
Nor yet a sweet consort from broken strings,
Nor perfect beauty where's a main defect My foolish, broken, blemished Muse so sings,
And this to mend, alas, no art is able,
'Cause nature made it so irreparable.

4

Nor can I, like that fluent, sweet-tongued Greek
Who lisped at first, in future times speak plain. 20
By art he gladly found what he did seek,
A full requital of his striving pain Art can do much, but this maxim's most sure A weak or wounded brain admits no cure.

5

I am obnoxious to each carping tongue
Who says my hand a needle better fits,
A poet's pen all scorn I should thus wrong,
For such despite they cast on female wits.

6

But sure the antique Greeks were far more mild,
Else of our sex why feignèd they those nine,
And Poesy made Calliope's own child?
So 'mongst the rest they placed the arts divine,
But this weak knot they will full soon untie:
The Greeks did nought but play the fools and lie

7

Let Greeks be Greeks, and women what they are,
Men have precedency and still excel
It is but vain unjustly to wage war, Men can do best, and women know it well.
Preeminence in all and each is yours, 40 Yet grant some small acknowledgement of ours

8

And O ye high-flown quills that soar the skies,
And ever with your prey still catch your praise,
If e'er you deign these lowly lines your eyes,
Give thyme or parsley wreath, I ask no bays
This mean and unrefined ore of mine Will make your glistening gold but more to shine.

THE FLESH AND THE SPIRIT

IN secret place where once I stood Close by the banks of lacrim flood, I heard two sisters reason on Things that are past and things to come.
One Flesh was called, who had her eye On worldly wealth and vanity,
The other Spirit, who did rear Her thoughts unto a higher sphere.
'Sister,' quoth Flesh, 'what liv'st thou on—Nothing but meditation? 10 Doth contemplation feed thee, so Regardlessly to let earth go?
Can speculation satisfy Notion without reality?

Dost dream of things beyond the moon,
And dost thou hope to dwell there soon?
Hast treasures there laid up in store, That all in th' world thou count'st but poor?

Art fancy sick, or turned a sot,
To catch at shadows which are not? 20 Come, come, I'll show unto thy sense Industry hath its recompense What canst desire but thou mayst see True substance in variety?
Dost honor like? Acquire the same,
As some to their immortal fame,
And trophies to thy name erect Which wearing time shall ne'er deject For riches dost thou long full sore?
Behold enough of precious store, 30 Earth hath more silver, pearls, and gold Than eyes can see or hands can hold Affect'st thou pleasure? Take thy fill, Earth hath enough of what you will.
Then let not go what thou mayst find For things unknown, only in mind '
Spirit 'Be still, thou unregenerate part; Disturb no more my settled heart,
For I have vowed (and so will do) Thee as a foe still to pursue, 40 And combat with thee will and must Until I see thee laid in th' dust Sisters we are, yea, twins we be,
Yet deadly feud 'twixt thee and me;
For from one father are we not:
Thou by old Adam wast begot,
But my arise is from above, Whence my dear Father I do love Thou speak'st me fair but hat'st me sore; Thy flattering shows I'll trust no more. 50 How oft thy slave hast thou me made When I believed what thou hast said,
And never had more cause of woe Than when I did what thou bad'st do I'll stop mine ears at these thy charms
And count them for my deadly harms.
Thy sinful pleasures I do hate, Thy riches are to me no bait, Thine honors do nor will I love,
For my ambition lies above My greatest honor it shall be When I am victor over thee And triumph shall, with laurel head, When thou my captive shalt be led.
How I do live thou need'st not scoff, For I have meat thou know'st not of,
The hidden manna I do eat,
The word of life it is my meat

My thoughts do yield me more content Than can thy hours in pleasure spent. 70 Nor are they shadows which I catch, Nor fancies vain at which I snatch;
But reach at things that are so high,
Beyond thy dull capacity Eternal substance I do see,
With which enriched I would be,
Mine eye doth pierce the heavens, and see What is invisible to thee
My garments are not silk nor gold Nor such like trash which earth doth hold,
But royal robes I shall have on 80
More glorious than the glist'ring sun
My crown not diamonds, pearls, and gold,
But such as angels' heads infold
The city where I hope to dwell There's none on earth can parallel,
The stately walls both high and strong Are made of precious jasper stone,
The gates of pearl both rich and clear,
And angels are for porters there, 90
The streets thereof transparent gold, Such as no eye did e'er behold,
A crystal river there doth run, Which doth proceed from the Lamb's throne,
Of life there are the waters sure,
Which shall remain forever pure, Nor sun nor moon they have no need,
For glory doth from God proceed,
No candle there, nor yet torchlight,
For there shall be no darkness night 100
From sickness and infirmity For evermore they shall be free, Nor withering age shall e'er come there,
But beauty shall be bright and clear
This city pure is not for thee, For things unclean there shall not be.
If I of heaven may have my fill, Take thou the world, and all that will.'

EPITAPH ON A PATRIOT <sup>1</sup>

WITHIN this tomb a patriot lies That was both pious, just, and wise,
To truth a shield, to right a wall,
To sectaries a whip and maul,
A magazine of history,
A prize of good company,

<sup>1</sup> The poem, to which the title has been given by the editors, is the concluding epitaph of Mrs Bradstreet's poem, 'To the Memory of my Dear and ever Honored Father, Thomas Dudley, Esq'

In manners pleasant and severe,
 The good him loved, the bad did fear
 And when his time with years was spent,
 If some rejoiced, more did lament. 10 1653 1678

TO MY DEAR AND LOVING HUSBAND

If ever two were one, then surely we.
 If ever man were loved by wife, then thee.
 If ever wife was happy in a man, Compare with me, ye women, if you can I prize thy love more than whole mines of gold,
 Or all the riches that the East doth hold.
 My love is such that rivers cannot quench, Nor ought but love from thee give recompense Thy love is such I can no way repay,
 The heavens reward thee manifold, I pray.
 Then, while we live, in love let's so persevere, 11
 That when we live no more we may live ever 1678

BEFORE THE BIRTH OF ONE OF HER CHILDREN

ALL things within this fading world hath end,
 Adversity doth still our joys attend, No ties so strong, no friends so dear and sweet,
 But with death's parting blow is sure to meet
 The sentence past is most irrevocable, A common thing, yet oh, inevitable How soon, my dear, death may my steps attend, How soon 't may be thy lot to lose thy friend
 We both are ignorant, yet love bids me
 These farewell lines to recommend to thee, That when that knot's untied that made us one, 11
 I may seem thine, who in effect am none
 And if I see not half my days that's due, What nature would, God grant to yours and you,
 The many faults that well you know I have,
 Let be interred in my oblivion's grave,
 If any worth or virtue were in me,
 Let that live freshly in thy memory,

And when thou feel'st no grief, as I no harms, Yet love thy dead, who long lay in thine arms 20
 And when thy loss shall be repaid with gains,
 Look to my little babes, my dear remains.
 And if thou love thyself, or loved'st me,
 These O protect from stepdame's injury And if chance to thine eyes shall bring this verse,
 With some sad sighs honor my absent hearse,
 And kiss this paper for thy love's dear sake, Who with salt tears this last farewell did take 1678

CONTEMPLATIONS

I

SOME time now past in the autumnal tide, When Phoebus wanted but one hour to bed,
 The trees all richly clad, yet void of pride,
 Were gilded o'er by his rich golden head, Their leaves and fruits seemed painted, but was true,
 Of green, of red, of yellow, mixed hue, Rapt were my senses at this delectable view.

2

I wist not what to wish 'Yet sure,' thought I,
 'If so much excellence abide below,
 How excellent is He that dwells on high? 10 Whose power and beauty by His works we know!
 Sure He is goodness, wisdom, glory,
 light,
 That hath this underworld so richly light.'
 More heaven than earth was here, no winter and no night

3

Then on a stately oak I cast mine eye, Whose ruffling top the clouds seemed to aspire,
 'How long since thou wast in thine infancy?
 Thy strength and stature, more thy years admire Hath hundred winters passed since thou wast born,

Or thousand since thou brak'st thy shell of horn? 20
 If so, all these as nought eternity doth scorn'

4

Then higher on the glistering sun I gazed, Whose beams was shaded by the leafy tree,
 The more I looked the more I grew amazed,
 And softly said, 'What glory's like to thee?
 Soul of this world, this universe's eye,
 No wonder some made thee a deity, Had I not better known, alas, the same had I.

5

'Thou as a bridegroom from thy chamber rushes
 And, as a strong man, joys to run a race 30 The morn doth usher thee with smiles and blushes,
 The earth reflects her glances in thy face.
 Birds, insects, animals, with vegetative, Thy heart from death and dullness doth revive,
 And in the darksome womb of fruitful nature dive

6

'Thy swift annual and diurnal course, Thy daily straight and yearly oblique path, Thy pleasing fervor and thy scorching force,
 All mortals here the feeling knowledge hath Thy presence makes it day, thy absence night, 40
 Quaternal seasons caused by thy might Hail, creature, full of sweetness, beauty, and delight!

7

'Art thou so full of glory that no eye Hath strength thy shining rays once to behold?
 And is thy splendid throne erect so high
 As to approach it can no earthly mould?
 How full of glory then must thy Creator be,
 Who gave this bright light luster unto thee!
 Admired, adored forever be that majesty!

8

Silent, alone, where none or saw or heard, 50
 In pathless paths I led my wand'ring feet,

My humble eyes to lofty skies I reared;
 To sing some song my mazed Muse thought meet,
 My great Creator I would magnify,
 That nature had thus decked liberally.
 But ah, and ah, again, my imbecility!

9

I heard the merry grasshopper then sing,
 The black-clad cricket bear a second part,
 They kept one tune and played on the same string, Seeming to glory in their little art 60 Shall creatures abject thus their voices raise,
 And in their kind resound their Maker's praise,
 Whilst I, as mute, can warble forth no higher lays?

10

When present times look back to ages past,
 And men in being fancy those are dead,
 It makes things gone perpetually to last And calls back months and years that long since fled,
 It makes a man more aged in conceit Than was Methuselah or 's grandsire great While of their persons and their acts his mind doth treat 70

11

Sometimes in Eden fair he seems to be,
 Sees glorious Adam there made lord of all,
 Fancies the apple dangle on the tree
 That turned his sovereign to a naked thrall, Who like a miscreant's driven from that place
 To get his bread with pain and sweat of
 A penalty imposed on his backsliding race.

12

Here sits our grandame in retired place,
 And in her lap her bloody Can new-born;
 The weeping imp oft looks her in the face, Bewails his unknown hap and fate forlorn His mother sighs to think of paradise, 82
 And how she lost her bliss to be more wise, Believing him that was, and is, father of lies.

13

Here Can and Abel come to sacrifice, Fruits of the earth and fatlings each do bring,

On Abel's gift the fire descends from skies,
But no such sign on false Cain's offering,
With sullen hateful looks he goes his ways, Hath thousand thoughts to end his brother's days, 90

Upon whose blood his future good he hopes to raise.

14

There Abel keeps his sheep, no ill he thinks,
His brother comes, then acts his fratricide, The virgin earth of blood her first draught drinks,
But since that time she often hath been cloyed
The wretch with ghastly face and dreadful mind Thinks each he sees will serve him in his kind, Though none on earth but kindred near then could he find

15

Who fancies not his looks now at the bar, His face like death, his heart with horror fraught? 100
Nor malefactor ever felt like war When deep despair with wish of life hath fought Branded with guilt and crushed with treble woes,
A vagabond to land of Nod he goes,
A city builds, that walls might him secure from foes

16

Who thinks not oft upon the fathers' ages?
Their long descent, how nephews sons they saw,
The starry observations of those sages, And how their precepts to their sons were law,
How Adam sighed to see his progeny 110 Clothed all in his black sinful livery, Who neither guilt nor yet the punishment could fly?

17

Our life compare we with their length of days,
Who to the tenth of theirs doth now arrive?
And though thus short, we shorten many ways,
Living so little while we are alive,

In eating, drinking, sleeping, vain delight
So unawares comes on perpetual night And puts all pleasures vain unto eternal flight

18

When I behold the heavens as in their prime, 120
And then the earth, though old, still clad in green,
The stones and trees insensible of time—Nor age nor wrinkle on their front are seen,
If winter come, and greenness then do fade, A spring returns, and they more youthful made But man grows old, lies down, remains where once he's laid

19

By birth more noble than those creatures all,
Yet seems by nature and by custom cursed, No sooner born but grief and care makes fall,
That state obliterate he had at first 130 Nor youth nor strength nor wisdom spring again,
Nor habitations long their names retain,
But in oblivion to the final day remain.

20

Shall I then praise the heavens, the trees, the earth,
Because their beauty and their strength last longer?
Shall I wish there or never to had birth, Because they're bigger and their bodies stronger?
Nay, they shall darken, perish, fade, and die,
And when unmade so ever shall they lie.
But man was made for endless immortality. 140

21

Under the cooling shadow of a stately elm Close sat I by a goodly river's side, Where gliding streams the rocks did overwhelm,
A lonely place, with pleasures dignified.
I once that loved the shady woods so well Now thought the rivers did the trees excel,
And if the sun would ever shine, there would I dwell.

While on the stealing stream I fixed mine eye, Which to the longed-for ocean held its course,
 I marked nor crooks nor rubs that there did lie 150 Could hinder aught, but still augment its force
 'O happy flood,' quoth I, 'that holds thy race
 Till thou arrive at thy beloved place, Nor is it rocks or shoals that can obstruct thy pace'

23

'Nor is't enough that thou alone mayst slide,
 But hundred brooks in thy clear waves do
 meet,
 So hand in hand along with thee they glide To Thetis' house, where all embrace and greet Thou emblem true of what I count the best,
 O could I lead my rivulets to rest! 160
 So may we press to that vast mansion ever blest

24

'Ye fish which in this liquid region bide, That for each season have your habitation, Now salt, now fresh, where you think best to glide,
 To unknown coasts to give a visitation, In lakes and ponds you leave your numerous fry,
 So nature taught, and yet you know not why,
 You wat'ry folk that know not your felicity

25

'Look how the wantons frisk to taste the air, Then to the colder bottom straight they dive, 170
 Eftsoon to Neptune's glassy hall repair
 To see what trade they, great ones, there do drive,
 Who forrage o'er the spacious sea-green field
 And take the trembling prey before it yield, Whose armor is their scales, their spreading fins their shield.'

26

While musing thus with contemplation fed,
 And thousand fancies buzzing in my brain,
 The sweet-tongued Philomel perched o'er my head
 And chanted forth a most melodious strain,
 Which rapt me so with wonder and delight,
 I judged my hearing better than my sight, And wished me wings with her a while to take my flight 182

'O merry bird,' said I, 'that fears no snares, That neither toils nor hoards up in thy barn,
 Feels no sad thoughts nor cruciating cares To gain more good or shun what might thee harm, Thy clothes ne'er wear, thy meat is everywhere,
 Thy bed a bough, thy drink the water clear, Reminds not what is past, nor what's to come doth fear

'The dawning morn with songs thou dost prevent, 190
 Sets hundred notes unto thy feathered

 So each one tunes his pretty instrument And warbling out the old, begin anew And thus they pass their youth in summer season,
 Then follow thee into a better region, Where winter's never felt by that sweet airy legion'

Man at the best a creature frail and vain, In knowledge ignorant, in strength but weak,
 Subject to sorrows, losses, sickness, pain, Each storm his state, his mind, his body break; 200
 From some of these he never finds cessation,
 But day or night, within, without, vexation, Troubles from foes, from friends, from dearest, near'st relation

30

And yet this sinful creature, frail and vain, This lump of wretchedness, of sin and sorrow,

This weather-beaten vessel wracked with pain,
 Joys not in hope of an eternal morrow,
 Nor all his losses, crosses, and vexation,
 In weight, in frequency and long duration, Can make him deeply groan for that divine translation. 210

The mariner that on smooth waves doth

 Sings merrily and steers his bark with ease,
 As if he had command of wind and tide,
 And now become great master of the seas,
 But suddenly a storm spoils all the sport And makes him long for a more quiet port Which 'gainst all adverse winds may serve

 That's full of friends, of honor, and of Fond fool, he takes this earth ev'n for

 But sad affliction comes and makes him see Here's neither honor, wealth, nor safety, Only above is found all with security

O time, the fatal wrack of mortal things,
 That draws oblivion's curtains over kings, Their sumptuous monuments, men know them not,
 Their names without a record are forgot, Their parts, their ports, their pomp's all laid in th' dust, Nor wit nor gold nor buildings 'scape

AS WEARY PILGRIM, NOW AT REST

As weary pilgrim, now at rest,
 Hugs with delight his silent nest,
 His wasted limbs now lie full soft That many steps have trodden oft, Blesses himself to think upon His dangers past and travails done,
 The burning sun no more shall heat, Nor stormy rains on him shall beat,
 The briars and thorns no more shall scratch,
 Nor hungry wolves at him shall catch, 10
 He erring paths no more shall tread Nor wild fruits eat instead of bread,
 For waters cold he doth not long,
 For thirst no more shall parch his tongue,
 No rugged stones his feet shall gall,
 Nor stumps nor rocks cause him to fall;
 All cares and fears he bids farewell And means in safety now to dwell
 A pilgrim I on earth, perplexed With sins, with cares and sorrows vexed, By age and pains brought to decay, 21
 And my clay house mould'ring away.
 Oh! how I long to be at rest
 And soar on high among the blest!
 This body shall in silence sleep,
 Mine eyes no more shall ever weep,
 No fainting fits shall me assail, Nor grinding pains, my body frail;
 With cares and fears ne'er cumbered be,
 Nor losses know, nor sorrows see 30
 What though my flesh shall there consume?
 It is the bed Christ did perfume,
 And when a few years shall be gone,
 This mortal shall be clothed upon,
 A corrupt carcass down it lies,
 A glorious body it shall rise,
 In weakness and dishonor sown,
 In power 'tis raised by Christ alone
 Then soul and body shall unite
 And of their maker have the sight, 40
 Such lasting joys shall there behold
 As ear ne'er heard nor tongue e'er told.
 Lord, make me ready for that day!
 Then come, dear bridegroom, come away!

FROM NEW ENGLAND'S RARITIES DISCOVERED

A DESCRIPTION OF AN INDIAN SQUAW <sup>1</sup>

Now, gentle reader, having trespassed upon your patience a long while in the perusing of these rude observations, I shall, to make you amends, present you by way of diversion or recreation with a copy of verses made some time since upon the picture of a young and handsome gypsy, not improperly transferred upon the Indian squaw, or female Indian, tricked up in all her bravery

The men are somewhat horse-faced and generally faucious, i.e., without beards, but the women, many of them, have very good features, seldom without a come-to-me, or cos amoris, in their countenance, all of them black-eyed, having even, short teeth, and very white, their hair black, thick, and long, broad-breasted, handsome, straight bodies, and slender, considering their constant loose habit, their limbs cleanly, straight, and of a convenient stature, generally as plump as partridges, and, saving here and there, one of a modest deportment

Their garments are a pair of sleeves of deer or moose skin, dressed and drawn with lines of several colors into Asiatic works, with buskins of the same, a short mantle of trading-cloth, either blue or red, fastened with a knot under the chin, and girt about the middle with a zone wrought with white and blue beads into pretty works. Of these beads they have bracelets for their neck and arms, and links to hang in their ears, and a fair table, curiously made up with beads likewise, to wear before their breast. Their hair they comb backward and tie it up short, with a border about two handfuls broad, wrought in works, as the other, with their beads. But enough of this

WHETHER white or black be best,
Call your senses to the quest,
And your touch shall quickly tell
The black in softness doth excel
And in smoothness, but the car—
What! can that a color hear?
No, but 'tis your black one's wit
That doth catch and captive it.
And, if slut and fair be one,
Sweet and fair there can be none, Nor can aught so please the taste
As what's brown and lovely dressed And who'll say that that is best To please one sense, displease the rest?
Maugre, then, all that can be said In flattery of white and red, Those flatterers themselves must say That darkness was before the day And such perfection here appears, It neither wind nor sunshine fears

MARY ROWLANDSON

FROM A NARRATIVE OF THE CAP- TIVITY AND RESTORATION OF MRS MARY ROWLAND- SON <sup>2</sup>

ON the tenth of February 1676, came the Indians with great numbers upon Lancas-

ter. Their first coming was about sunrising, hearing the noise of some guns, we looked out, several houses were burning, and the smoke ascending to heaven. There were five persons taken in one house, the father and the mother and a sucking child they knocked on the head, the other two they took and carried away alive. There were two others who, being out of their garrison upon some occasion, were set upon, one was knocked on the head, the other escaped. Another there was who running along was shot and wounded, and fell down, he begged of them his life, promising them money (as they told me), but they would not hearken to him but knocked him in head, and stripped him naked, and split open his bowels. Another, seeing many of the Indians about his barn, ventured and went out, but was quickly shot down. There were three others belonging to the same garrison who were killed, the Indians, getting up upon the roof of the barn, had advantage to shoot down upon them over their fortification. Thus these murderous wretches went on, burning and destroying before them.

At length they came and beset our own house, and quickly it was the dolefullest day that ever mine eyes saw. The house stood upon the edge of a hill, some of the Indians got behind the hill, others into the barn, and others behind any thing that could shelter them, from all which places they shot against the house, so that the bullets seemed to fly like hail, and quickly they wounded one man among us, then another, and then a third. About two hours (according to my observation, in that amazing time) they had been about the house before they prevailed to fire it, which they did with flax and hemp which they brought out of the barn, and there being no defence about the house, only two flankers at two opposite corners and one of them not finished. They fired it once, and one ventured out and quenched it, but they quickly fired it again, and that took. Now is the dreadful hour come that I have often heard of (in time of war, as it was the case of others), but now mine eyes see it. Some in our house were fighting for their lives, others wallowing in their blood, the house on fire over our heads, and the bloody heathen ready to knock us on the head if we stirred out. Now might we hear mothers and children crying out for themselves and one another, 'Lord, what shall we do?' Then I took my children (and one of my sisters, hers) to go forth and leave the house, but as soon as we came to the door and appeared, the Indians shot so thick that the bullets rattled against the house as if one had taken a handful of stones and thrown them, so that we were fain to give back. We had six stout dogs belonging to our garrison, but none of them would stir, though another time, if any

Indian had come to the door, they were ready to fly upon him and tear him down. The Lord hereby would make us the more to acknowledge His hand, and to see that our help is always in Him. But out we must go, the fire increasing and coming along behind us, roaring, and the Indians gaping before us with their guns, spears, and hatchets to devour us. No sooner were we out of the house, but my brother-in-law (being before wounded, in defending the house, in or near the throat) fell down dead, whereat the Indians scornfully shouted and hallooed, and were presently upon him, stripping off his clothes. The bullets flying thick, one went through my side, and the same (as would seem) through the bowels and hand of my dear child in my arms. One of my elder sister's children, named William, had then his leg broken, which the Indians perceiving, they knocked him on head. Thus were we butchered by those merciless heathen, standing amazed, with the blood running down to our heels. My eldest sister being yet in the house and seeing those woeful sights, the infidels haling mothers one way and children another, and some wallowing in their blood, and her elder son telling her that her son William was dead and myself was wounded, she said, 'And, Lord, let me die with them!'—which was no sooner said, but she was struck with a bullet, and fell down dead over the threshold. I hope she is reaping the fruit of her good labors, being faithful to the service of God in her place. In her younger years she lay under much trouble upon spiritual accounts, till it pleased God to make that precious Scripture take hold of her heart, 2 Cor 12 9 'And he said unto me, my grace is sufficient for thee.' More than twenty years after, I have heard her tell how sweet and comfortable that place was to her. But to return the Indians laid hold of us, pulling me one way and the children another, and said, 'Come, go along with us.' I told them they would kill me; they answered, if I were willing to go along with them they would not hurt me.

Oh, the doleful sight that now was to behold at this house! 'Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He has made in the earth.' Of thirty-seven persons who were in this one house, none escaped either present death or a bitter captivity, save only one, who might say as he, Job 1 15 'And I only am escaped alone to tell the news' There were twelve killed, some shot, some stabbed with their spears, some knocked down with their hatchets When we are in prosperity, oh! the little that we think of such dreadful sights, and to see our dear friends and relations lie bleeding out their heart-blood upon the ground There was one who was chopped into the head 10 with a hatchet, and stripped naked, and yet was crawling up and down It is a solemn sight to see so many Christians lying in their blood, some here, and some there, like a company of sheep torn by wolves, all of them stripped naked by a company of hell-hounds, roaring, singing, ranting, and insulting, as if they would have torn our very hearts out Yet the Lord by His almighty power preserved a number of us from death, for there were twenty-four of us 20 taken alive and carried captive

I had often before thus said that, if the Indians should come, I should choose rather to be killed by them than taken alive, but when it came to the trial, my mind changed, their glittering weapons so daunted my spirit, that I chose rather to go along with those (as I may say) ravenous beasts, than that moment to end my days, and that 30 I may the better declare what happened to me during that grievous captivity, I shall particularly speak of the several removes we had up and down the wilderness

THE FIRST REMOVE

Now away we must go with those barbarous creatures, with our bodies wounded and bleeding, and our hearts no less than our bodies About a mile we went that night, up upon a hill within sight of the town, where they intended to lodge There was hard by a vacant house (deserted by the English before, for fear of the Indians) I asked them whether I might not lodge in the house that night, to which they answered 'What! Will you love Englishmen still?' This was the dolefullest night that ever my eyes saw Oh, the roaring, and singing, and dancing, and yelling of those black creatures in the night, which made 50 the place a lively resemblance of hell! And as miserable was the waste that was there made of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, calves, lambs, roasting pigs, and fowl (which they had plundered in the town), some roasting, some lying and burning, and some boiling to feed our merciless enemies, who were joyful enough though we were disconsolate.

 To add to the dolefulness of the former day and the dismalness of the present night, my thoughts ran upon my losses and sad, bereaved condition All was gone, my husband gone (at least separated from me, he being in the Bay, and to add to my grief, the Indians told me they would kill him as he came homeward), my children gone, my relations and friends gone, our house and home and all our comforts within door and without—all was gone except my life, and I knew not but the next moment that might go too There remained nothing to me but one poor wounded babe, and it seemed at present worse than death that it was in such a pitiful condition, bespeaking compassion, and I had no refreshing for it, nor suitable things to revive it Little do many think what is the savageness and brutishness of this barbarous enemy, ay, even those that seem to profess more than others among them when the English have fallen into their hands

Those seven that were killed at Lancas-30 ter the summer before upon a Sabbath day, and the one that was afterward killed upon a week day, were slain and mangled in a barbarous manner, by One-eyed John and Marlborough's Praying Indians, which Captain Mosely brought to Boston, as the Indians told me.

THE THIRD REMOVE

The morning being come, they prepared to go on their way One of the Indians got up upon a horse, and they set me up behind him, with my poor sick babe in my lap A very wearisome and tedious day I had of it, what with my own wound and my child's being so exceeding sick and in a lamentable condition with her wound It may be easily judged what a poor feeble condition we were in, there being not the least crumb of refreshing that came within either of our mouths from Wednesday night to Saturday night, except only a little cold water This day in the afternoon, about an hour by sun, we came to the place where they intended, viz, an Indian town called Wenimesset, northward of Quabaug When we were come, oh, the number of pagans (now merciless enemies) that there came about me, that I may say as David, Psal 27 13. 'I had fainted, unless I had believed, etc.' The next day was the Sabbath, I then remembered how careless I had been of God's holy time, how many Sabbaths I had lost and misspent, and how evilly I had walked in God's sight, which lay so close unto my spirit that it was easy for me to see how righteous it was with God to cut off the thread of my life and cast me out of His presence for ever Yet the Lord still showed mercy to me, and upheld me, and as He wounded me with one hand, so He healed me with the other This day there came to me one Robert Pepper, a man belonging to Roxbury, who was taken in Captain Beers his fight and had been now a considerable time with the Indians, and up with them almost as far as Albany to see King Philip, as he told me, and was now very lately come into these parts Hearing, I say, that I was in this Indian town, he obtained leave to come and see me He told me he himself was wounded in the leg at Captain Beers his fight, and was not able some time to go, but as they carried him, and as he took oaken leaves and laid to his wound, and through the blessing of God he was able to travel again Then I took oaken leaves and laid to my side, and with the blessing of God it cured me also, yet before the cure was wrought, I may say, as it is in Psal 38. 5,6 'My wounds stunk and are corrupt, I am troubled, I am bowed down greatly, I go mourning all the day long' I sat much alone with a poor wounded child in my lap, which moaned night and day, having nothing to revive the body or cheer the spirits of her, but instead of that sometimes one Indian would come and tell me one hour that 'your master will knock your child in the head,' and then a second, and then a third, 'your master will quickly knock your child in the head.'

This was the comfort I had from them, 'miserable comforters are ye all,' as he said Thus nine days I sat upon my knees, with my babe in my lap, till my flesh was raw again, my child being even ready to depart this sorrowful world, they bade me carry it out to another wigwam (I suppose because they would not be troubled with such spectacles) Whither I went with a very heavy heart, and down I sat with the picture of death in my lap About two hours in the night, my sweet babe like a lamb departed this life, on February 18, 1675, it being about six years and five months old It was nine days from the first wounding in this miserable condition, without any refreshing of one nature or other except a little cold water I cannot but take notice how at another time I could not bear to be in the room where any dead person was, but now the case is changed, I must and could lie down by my dead babe, side by side all the night after I have thought since of the wonderful goodness of God to me, in preserving me in the use of my reason and senses in that distressed time, that I did not use wicked and violent means to end my own miserable life In the morning, when they understood that my child was dead, they sent for me home to my master's wigwam, by my master in this writing must be understood Quanopin, who was a sagamore, and married King Philip's wife's sister, not that he first took me, but I was sold to him by another Narragansett Indian, who took me when first I came out of the garrison I went to take up my dead child in my arms to carry it with me, but they bid me let it alone, there was no resisting, but go I must and leave it When I had been at my master's wigwam, I took the first opportunity I could get to go look after my dead child; when I came, I asked them what they had done with it Then they told me it was upon the hill, then they went and showed me where it was, where I saw the ground was newly digged, and there they told me they had buried it There I left that child in the wilderness, and must commit it, and myself also in this wilderness-condition, to Him who is above all . . .

THE EIGHTH REMOVE

On the morrow morning we must go over the river, i e., Connecticut, to meet with King Philip Two canoes full they had carried over, the next turn I myself was to go, but as my foot was upon the canoe to step in, there was a sudden outcry among them, and I must step back; and instead of going over the river, I must go four or five miles up the river farther northward Some of the Indians ran one way, and some another

The cause of this rout was, as I thought, their espying some English scouts who were thereabout. In this travel up the river about noon the company made a stop and sat down, some to eat and others to rest them. As I sat amongst them, musing of things past, my son Joseph unexpectedly came to me, we asked of each other's welfare, bemoaning our doleful condition and the change that had come upon us. We had husband and father, and children and sisters, and friends, and relations, and house, and home, and many comforts of this life, but now we may say, as Job: 'Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return.' The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord. I asked him whether he would read, he told me he earnestly desired it. I gave him my Bible, and he lighted upon that comfortable scripture, Psal 118 17, 18: 'I shall not die but live, and declare the works of the Lord.' The Lord hath chastened me sore, yet He hath not given me over to death. 'Look here, Mother,' says he, 'did you read this?' And here I may take occasion to mention one principal ground of my setting forth these lines: even as the Psalmist says, to declare the works of the Lord, and His wonderful power in carrying us along, preserving us in the wilderness while under the enemy's hand, and returning of us in safety again, and His goodness in bringing to my hand so many comfortable and suitable Scriptures in my distress. But to return: we travelled on till night, and in the morning we must go over the river to Philip's crew. When I was in the canoe, I could not but be amazed at the numerous crew of pagans that were on the bank on the other side. When I came ashore, they gathered all about me, I sitting alone in the midst. I observed they asked one another questions, and laughed, and rejoiced over their gains and victories. Then my heart began to fail, and I fell a weeping, which was the first time to my remembrance that I wept before them. Although I had met with so much affliction, and my heart was many times ready to break, yet could I not shed one tear in their sight, but rather had been all this while in a maze, and like one astonished, but now I may say, as Psal 137 1: 'By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down: yea, we wept when we remembered

Zion.' There one of them asked me why I wept, I could hardly tell what to say, yet I answered they would kill me. 'No,' said he, 'none will hurt you.' Then came one of them and gave me two spoonfuls of meal to comfort me, and another gave me half a pint of peas, which was more worth than many bushels at another time. Then I went to see King Philip, he bade me come in and sit down, and asked me whether I would smoke it (a usual compliment nowadays amongst saints and sinners), but this no way suited me. For though I had formerly used tobacco, yet I had left it ever since I was first taken. It seems to be a bait the devil lays to make men lose their precious time. I remember with shame how formerly, when I had taken two or three pipes, I was presently ready for another, such a bewitching thing it is, but I thank God He has now given me power over it. Surely there are many who may be better employed than to lie sucking a stinking tobacco pipe.

Now the Indians gather their forces to go against Northampton, overnight one went about yelling and hooting to give notice of the design. Whereupon they fell to boiling of groundnuts and parching of corn (as many as had it) for their provision, and in the morning away they went. During my abode in this place, Philip spake to me to make a shirt for his boy, which I did, for which he gave me a shilling, I offered the money to my master, but he bade me keep it, and with it I bought a piece of horse flesh. Afterwards he asked me to make a cap for his boy, for which he invited me to dinner. I went, and he gave me a pancake, about as big as two fingers, it was made of parched wheat, beaten, and fried in bear's grease, but I thought I never tasted pleasanter meat in my life. There was a squaw who spake to me to make a shirt for her sannup, for which she gave me a piece of bear. Another asked me to knit a pair of stockings, for which she gave me a quart of peas. I boiled my peas and bear together, and invited my master and mistress to dinner, but the proud gossip, because I served them both in one dish, would eat nothing, except one bit that he gave her upon the point of his knife. Hearing that my son was come to this place, I went to see him, and found him lying flat upon the ground. I asked him how he could sleep so, he answered me that he was not asleep but at prayer, and lay so that they might not observe what he was doing I pray God he may remember these things now he is returned in safety At this place, the sun now getting higher, what with the beams and heat of the sun and the smoke of the wigwams, I thought I should have been blind I could scarce discern one wigwam from another There was here one Mary Thurston of Medfield, who, seeing how it was with me, lent me a hat to wear, but as soon as I was gone, the squaw who owned that Mary Thurston came running after me and got it away again Here was the squaw that gave me one spoonful of meal. I put it in my pocket to keep it safe, yet, notwithstanding, somebody stole it, but put five Indian corns in the room of it, which corns were the greatest provisions I had in my travel for one day

The Indians returning from Northampton brought with them some horses and sheep and other things which they had taken, I desired them that they would carry me to Albany upon one of those horses and sell me for powder, for so they had sometimes discoursed I was utterly hopeless of getting home on foot, the way that I came I could hardly bear to think of the many weary steps I had taken to come to this place

THE ELEVENTH REMOVE

The next day in the morning they took their travel, intending a day's journey up the river, I took my load at my back, and quickly we came to wade over the river, and passed over tiresome and wearisome hills One hill was so steep that I was fain to creep up upon my knees, and to hold by the twigs and bushes to keep myself from falling backward My head also was so light that I usually reeled as I went, but I hope all these wearisome steps that I have taken are but a forewarning to me of the heavenly rest 'I know, O Lord, that Thy judgments are right, and that Thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me,' Psal 119 71

THE TWENTIETH REMOVE

It was their usual manner to remove when they had done any mischief, lest they should be found out, and so they did at this time We went about three or four miles, and there they built a great wigwam, big enough to hold an hundred Indians, which they did in preparation to a great day of dancing They would say now amongst themselves that the Governor would be so angry for his loss at Sudbury that he would send no more about the captives, which made me grieve and tremble. My sister being not far from the place where we now were, and hearing that I was here, desired her master to let her come and see me, and he was willing to it, and would go with her, but she, being ready before him, told him she would go before, and was come within a mile or two of the place, then he overtook her and began to rant as if he had been mad, and made her go back again in the rain, so that I never saw her till I saw her in Charlestown But the Lord requited many of their ill doings, for thus Indian her master was hanged afterward at Boston The Indians now began to come from all quarters against their merry dancing day. Among some of them came one Goodwife Kettle, I told her my heart was so heavy that it was ready to break 'So is mine too,' said she, but yet said, 'I hope we shall hear some good news shortly' I could hear how earnestly my sister desired to see me, and I as earnestly desired to see her, and yet neither of us could get an opportunity My daughter was also now about a mile off, and I had not seen her in nine or ten weeks, as I had not seen my sister since our first taking I earnestly desired them to let me go and see them, yea, I entreated, begged, and persuaded them but to let me see my daughter, and yet so hard-hearted were they that they would not suffer it. They made use of their tyrannical power whilst they had it, but through the Lord's wonderful mercy, their time was now but short.

On a Sabbath day, the sun being about an hour high in the afternoon, came Mr. John Hoar (the Council permitting him, and his own forward spirit inclining him) together with the two fore-mentioned Indians, Tom and Peter, with their third letter from the Council When they came near, I was abroad, though I saw them not, they presently called me in, and bade me sit down and not stir Then they caught up their guns and away they ran, as if an enemy had been at hand, and the guns went off apace. I manifested some great trouble, and they asked me what was the matter I told them I thought they had killed the Englishman (for they had in the meantime informed me that an Englishman was come), they said no, they shot over his horse and under, and before his horse, and they pushed him thus way and that way, at their pleasure, showing what they could do; then they let them come to their wigwams I begged of them to let me see the Englishman, but they would not. But there was I fain to sit their pleasure. When they had talked their fill with him, they suffered me to go to him. We asked each other of our welfare, and how my husband did, and all my friends. He told me they were all well, and would be glad to see me. Amongst other things which my husband sent me, there came a pound of tobacco, which I sold for nine shillings in money, for many of the Indians for want of tobacco smoked hemlock and ground ivy. It was a great mistake in any who thought I sent for tobacco, for through the favor of God that desire was overcome. I now asked them whether I should go home with Mr Hoar. They answered no, one and another of them, and it being night, we lay down with that answer, in the morning Mr Hoar invited the sagamores to dinner, but when we went to get it ready, we found that they had stolen the greatest part of the provision Mr Hoar had brought, out of his bags, in the night. And we may see the wonderful power of God in that one passage, in that when there was such a great number of the Indians together, and so greedy of a little good food, and no English there but Mr Hoar and myself, that there they did not knock us in the head and take what we had, there being not only some provision but also trading-cloth, a part of the twenty pounds agreed upon, but instead of doing us any mischief, they seemed to be ashamed of the fact, and said it were some Matchut Indian that did it. Oh, that we could believe that there is no thing too hard for God! God showed His power over the heathen in this, as He did over the hungry lions when Daniel was cast into the den. Mr Hoar called them betune to dinner, but they ate very little, they being so busy in dressing themselves and getting ready for their dance, which was carried on by eight of them, four men and four squaws, my master and mistress being two. He was dressed in his holland shirt, with great laces sewed at the tail of it, he had his silver buttons, his white stockings, his garters were hung round with shillings, and he had girdles of wampum upon his head and shoulders. She had a kersey coat, and covered with girdles of wampum from the loins upward, her arms from her elbows to her hands were covered with bracelets, there were handfuls of necklaces about her neck, and several sorts of jewels in her ears. She had fine red stockings and white shoes, her hair powdered and face painted red, that was always before black. And all the dancers were after the same manner. There were two others, singing and knocking on a kettle for their music. They kept hopping up and down one after another, with a kettle of water in the midst, standing warm upon some embers, to drink of when they were dry. They held on till it was almost night, throwing out wampum to the standers by. At night I asked them again if I should go home. They all as one said no, except my husband would come for me. When we were lain down, my master went out of the wigwam, and by and by sent in an Indian called James the Printer, who told Mr Hoar that my master would let me go home tomorrow if he would let him have one pint of liquor. Then Mr Hoar called his own Indians, Tom and Peter, and bid them go and see whether he would promise it before them three, and if he would, he should have it, which he did, and he had it. Then Philip smelling the business called me to him, and asked me what I would give him to tell me some good news and speak a good word for me. I told him, I could not tell what to give him, I would anything I had, and asked him what he would have. He said two coats and twenty shillings in money, and half a bushel of seed corn, and some tobacco. I thanked him for his love, but I knew the good news as well as the crafty fox. My master, after he had had his drink, quickly came ranting into the wigwam again and called for Mr Hoar, drinking to him and saying he was a good man, and then again he would say, 'Hang him rogue!' Being almost drunk, he would drink to him, and yet prescntly say he should be hanged. Then he called for me. I trembled to hear him, yet I was fain to go to him, and he drank to me, showing no incivility. He was the first Indian I saw drunk all the while I was amongst them. At last his squaw ran out, and he after her, round the wigwam, with his money jingling at his knees, but she escaped him. But having an old squaw, he ran to her. And so, through the Lord's mercy, we were no more troubled that night . . .

I can remember the time when I used to sleep quietly without workings in my thoughts whole nights together, but now it is other ways with me. When all are fast about me, and no eye open but His who ever waketh, my thoughts are upon things past, upon the awful dispensation of the Lord towards us, upon His wonderful power and might in carrying of us through so many difficulties, in returning us in safety, and suffering none to hurt us. I remember in the night season how the other day I was in the midst of thousands of enemies, and nothing but death before me. It was then hard work to persuade myself that ever I should be satisfied with bread again. But now we are fed with the finest of the wheat, and, as I may say, with honey out of the rock, instead of the husk, we have the fatted calf. The thoughts of these things in the particulars of them, and of the love and goodness of God towards us, make it true of me what David said of himself, Psal 65 'I watered my couch with my tears.' Oh! the wonderful power of God that mine eyes have seen, affording matter enough for my thoughts to run in that when others are sleeping mine eyes are weeping.

I have seen the extreme vanity of this world, one hour I have been in health, and wealth, wanting nothing, but the next hour in sickness and wounds, and death, having nothing but sorrow and affliction.

Before I knew what affliction meant, I was ready sometimes to wish for it. When I lived in prosperity, having the comforts of the world about me, my relations by me, my heart cheerful, and taking little care for anything, and yet seeing many, whom I preferred before myself, under many trials and afflictions, in sickness, weakness, poverty, losses, crosses, and cares of the world, I should be sometimes jealous lest I should have my portion in this life, and that scripture would come to my mind, Heb 12 6 'For whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth.' But now I see the Lord had His time to scourge and chasten me. The portion of some is to have their afflictions by drops, now one drop and then another, but the dregs of the cup, the wine of astonishment, like a sweeping rain that leaveth no food, did the Lord prepare to be my portion. Affliction I wanted, and affliction I had full measure (I thought) pressed down and running over. Yet I see, when God calls a person to anything, and through never so many difficulties, yet He is fully able to carry them through and make them see and say they have been gainers thereby. And I hope I can say in some measure, as David did 'It is good for me that I have been afflicted.' The Lord hath showed me the vanity of these outward things—that they are the vanity of vanities, and vexation of spirit, that they are but a shadow, a blast, a bubble, and things of no continuance, that we must rely on God Himself, and our whole dependence must be upon Him. If trouble from smaller matters begin to arise in me, I have something at hand to check myself with, and say, 'Why am I troubled?' It was but the other day that, if I had had the world, I would have given it for my freedom, or to have been a servant to a Christian. I have learned to look beyond present and smaller troubles, and to be quieted under them, as Moses said, Exod. 14 13 'Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord.'

FROM THE DAY OF DOOM

THE COMING TO JUDGMENT <sup>1</sup>

I

STILL was the night, serene and bright, when all men sleeping lay, Calm was the season, and carnal reason thought so 'twould last for aye
'Soul, take thine ease, let sorrow cease, much good thou hast in store ' This was their song, their cups among, the evening before.

Wallowing in all kind of sin, vile wretches lay secure,
The best of men had scarcely then their lamps kept in good ure Virgins unwise, who through disguise amongst the best were numbered, Had closed their eyes, yea, and the wise through sloth and frailty slumbered

Like as of old, when men grew bold God's threat'nings to contemn, Who stopt their ear, and would not hear when Mercy warnèd them, But took their course, without remorse, till God began to pour Destruction the world upon, in a tempestuous shower,

4

Who put away the evil day, and drowned their cares and fears, Till drowned were they, and swept away by vengeance unawares, So at the last, whilst men sleep fast in their security, Surprised they are in such a snare as cometh suddenly

For at midnight breaks forth a light which turns the night to day,

And speedily an hideous cry doth all the world dismay Sinners awake, their hearts do ache, trembling their loins surpriseth, Amazed with fear by what they hear, each one of them ariseth

6

They rush from beds with giddy heads, and to their windows run, Viewing this light, which shines more bright than doth the noonday sun Straightway appears (they see't with tears)
the Son of God most dread, Who with His train comes on amain to judge both quicke and dead

Before His face the heav'ns give place, and skies are rent asunder With mighty voice and hideous noise more terrible than thunder His brightness damps heav'ns glorious lamps and makes them hide their heads, As if afraid and quite dismayed, they quit their wonted steads

8

Ye sons of men that durst contemn the threat'nings of God's Word, How cheer you now? Your hearts, I trow, are thrilled as with a sword Now atheist blind, whose brutish mind a God could never see, Dost thou perceive, dost now believe, that Christ thy Judge shall be?

The Judge draws nigh, exalted high upon a lofty throne, Amidst the throng of angels strong, lo, Israel's Holy One!
The excellence of whose presence and awful majesty Amazeth nature, and every creature doth more than terrify.

The mountains smoke, the hills are shook, the earth is rent and torn

<sup>1</sup> The text has been modernized, and the titles to the various sections have been supplied by the editors
The original text contained marginal commentary and citation of parallel biblical passages

As if she should be clear dissolved or from her center borne The sea doth roar, forsakes the shore, and shrinks away for fear,
 The wild beasts flee into the sea, so soon as He draws near,

16

Whose glory bright, whose wond'rous might,
 whose power imperial,
 So far surpass whatever was in realms terrestrial, That tongues of men (nor angel's pen) cannot the same express, And therefore I must pass it by, lest speaking should transgress

Before His throne a trump is blown, proclaiming th' Day of Doom, Forthwith He cries, 'Ye dead arise and unto judgment come!' No sooner said, but 'tis obeyed, sepulchers opened are,
 Dead bodies all rise at His call, and's mighty power declare

20

His wingèd hosts fly through all coasts, together gathering Both good and bad, both quick and dead, and all to judgment bring Out of their holes those creeping moles, that hid themselves for fear, By force they take, and quickly make before the Judge appear

Thus every one before the throne of Christ the Judge is brought, Both righteous and impious, that good or ill hath wrought A separation and diff'ring station by Christ appointed is (To sinners sad) 'twixt good and bad, 'twixt heirs of woe and bliss

54

There Christ demands at all their hands a strict and straight account Of all things done under the sun, whose number far surmount Man's wit and thought, they all are brought unto this solemn trial,

And each offense with evidence, so that there's no denial

55

There's no excuse for their abuse, since their own consciences More proof give in of each man's sin, than thousand witnesses Though formerly this faculty had grossly been abusèd (Men could it stifle, or with it trifle, when as it them accusèd),

56

Now it comes in, and every sin unto men's charge doth lay, It judgeth them and doth condemn, though all the world say nay.
 It so stingeth and tortureth, it worketh such distress, That each man's self against himself, is forcèd to confess

57

It's vain moreover for men to cover the least iniquity, The Judge hath seen, and privy been to all their villainy He unto light and open sight the work of darkness brings,
 He doth unfold both new and old, both known and hidden things.

66

Thus He doth find of all mankind that stand at His left hand, No mother's son but hath misdones, and broken God's command All have transgressed, even the best, and merited God's wrath, Unto their own perdition and everlasting scath

THE TRIAL OF HYPOCRITES

68

Nevertheless, they all express (Christ granting liberty) What for their way they have to say, how they have lived, and why.
 They all draw near and seek to clear themselves by making pleas, There hypocrites, false-hearted wights, do make such pleas as these

69

'Lord, in Thy name, and by the same,
 we devils dispossessed,
 We raised the dead and minist'red Succor to the distressed Our painful teaching and pow'rful preaching by Thine own wondrous might Did throughly win to God from sin many a wretched wight '

70

'All this,' quoth He, 'may granted be,
 and your case little bettered, Who still remain under a chain and many irons fettered You that the dead have quickened, and rescued from the grave, Yourselves were dead, yet ne'er needèd a Christ your souls to save

71

'You that could preach, and others teach what way to life doth lead, Why were you slack to find that track and in that way to tread?
 How could you bear to see or hear of others freed at last From Satan's paws, whilst in his jaws yourselves were held more fast?

72

'Who though you knew Repentance true and Faith is My great name, The only mean to quit you clean from punishment and blame, Yet took no pain true faith to gain, such as might not deceive, Nor would repent with true intent your evil deeds to leave.

73

'His Master's will how to fulfil the servant that well knew, Yet left undone his duty known, more plagues to him are due.
 You against light perverted right, wherefore it shall be now For Sidon and for Sodom's land more easy than for you '

74

'But we have in Thy presence been, say some, 'and eaten there

Did we not eat Thy Flesh for meat, and feed on heav'nly cheer?
 Whereon who feed shall never need,
 as Thou Thyself dost say, Nor shall they die eternally, but live with Christ for aye.

75

'We may allege, Thou gav'st a pledge of Thy dear love to us, In wine and bread, which figurèd Thy grace bestowèd thus Of strength'ning seals, of sweetest meals,
 have we so oft partaken, And shall we be cast off by Thee, and utterly forsaken?'

76

To whom the Lord, thus in a word, returns a short reply
 'I never knew any of you that wrought iniquity.
 You say you've been My presence in, but then, how came you there With raiment vile that did defile and quite disgrace My cheer?

77

'Durst you draw near without due fear unto My holy table?
 Durst you profane and render vain, so far as you were able,
 Those mysteries, which whoso prize and carefully improve Shall savèd be undoubtedly, and nothing shall them move?

78

'How durst you venture bold guests to enter in such a sordid hue, Amongst My guests unto those feasts that were not made for you?
 How durst you eat for spir'tual meat your bane, and drink damnation, Whilst by your guile you render'd vile so rare and great salvation?

79

'Your fancies fed on heav'nly bread your hearts fed on some lust, You loved the creature more than th'Creator, your souls clove to the dust.

And think you by hypocrisy and cloaked wickedness, To enter in laden with sin to lasting happiness?

80

'This your excuse shows your abuse of things ordained for good, And doth declare you guilty are of My dear flesh and blood Wherefore those seals and precious meals you put so much upon As things divine, they seal and sign you to perdition'

THE ERROR OF GOOD WORKS

Then were brought nigh a company of civil honest men, That loved true dealing and hated stealing, ne'er wronged their bretheren, Who pleaded thus 'Thou knowest us that we were blameless liveres, No whoremongers, no murderers, no quarrelers nor strivers.

93

'Idolaters, adulterers, church-robbers we were none, Nor false dealers, nor cozeners, but paid each man his own Our way was fair, our dealing square, we were no wasteful spenders, No lewd toss-pots, no drunken sots, no scandalous offenders

94

'We hated vice and set great price, by virtuous conversation,
And by the same we got a name and no small commendation God's laws express that righteousness is that which He doth prize, And to obey, as He doth say, is more than sacrifice

95

'Thus to obey hath been our way, let our good deeds, we pray, Find some regard and some reward with Thee, O Lord, this day And whereas we transgressors be,
of Adam's race were none,

No, not the best, but have confessed themselves to have misdone.'

96

Then answerèd unto their dread, the Judge 'True piety God doth desire and eke require, no less than honesty Justice demands at all your hands perfect obedience,
If but in part you have come short,
that is a just offense.

'On earth below, where men did owe a thousand pounds and more, Could twenty pence it recompense?
Could that have cleared the score?

Think you to buy felicity with part of what's due debt?
Or for desert of one small part,
the whole should off be set?

98

'And yet that part whose great desert
you think to reach so far,
For your excuse doth you accuse, and will your boasting mar However fair, however square your way and work hath been Before men's eyes, yet God espies iniquity therein

99

'God looks upon th'affection and temper of the heart, Not only on the action, and the external part Whatever end vain men pretend,
God knows the verity,
And by the end which they intend their words and deeds doth try.

100 'Without true faith, the Scripture saith,

God cannot take delight In any deed that doth proceed from any sinful wight And without love all actions prove but barren empty things, Dead works they be and vanity, the which vexation brings.

101

'Nor from true faith, which quencheth wrath,
hath your obedience flown, Nor from true love, which wont to move believers, hath it grown Your argument shows your intent in all that you have done, You thought to scale heav'n's lofty wall by ladders of your own

102 'Your blinded spirit hoping to merit by your own righteousness, Needed no Saviour but your behavior, and blameless carriages

You trusted to what you could do, and in no need you stood,
Your hearty pride laid Me aside, and trampled on My blood

103

'All men have gone astray, and done that which God's laws condemn, But My purchase and offered grace all men did not condemn.
The Ninevites and Sodomites had no such sin as this, Yet as if all your sins were small, you say, "All did amiss "

104

'Again you thought and mainly sought a name with men t' acquire, Pride bare the bell that made you swell, and your own selves admire Mean fruit it is, and vile, I wis, that springs from such a root, Virtue divine and genuine wonts not from pride to shoot.

105

'Such deeds as your are worse than poor; they are but sins gilt over With silver dross, whose glist'ring gloss can them no longer cover
The best of them would you condemn, and ruin you alone, Although you were from faults so clear, the other you had none.

106

'Your gold is brass, your silver dross, your righteousness is sin,

And think you by such honesty eternal life to win?
You much mistake, if for its sake you dream of acceptation, Whereas the same deserveth shame and meriteth damnation '

THE JUDGMENT

182

Thus all men's pleas the Judge with ease doth answer and confute, Until that all, both great and small, are silenced and mute Vain hopes are cropt, all mouths are stopt, sinners have naught to say, But that 'tis just and equal most they should be damned for aye

THE SATISFACTION OF THE ELECT

219

The saints behold with courage bold and thankful wonderment To see all those that were their foes thus sent to punishment Then do they sing unto their King a song of endless praise, They praise His name and do proclaim that just are all His ways

220

Thus with great joy and melody to heav'n they all ascend, Him there to praise with sweetest lays,
and hymns that never end, Where with long rest they shall be blest, and naught shall them annoy, Where they shall see as seen they be,
and whom they love enjoy.

Oh, glorious place! where face to face Jehovah may be seen, By such as were sinners while here, and no dark veil between!
Where the sunshine and light divine of God's bright countenance Doth rest upon them every one, with sweetest influence!

222

Oh, blessed state of the renate!
Oh, wond'rous happiness,

To which they're brought beyond what thought can reach or words express!<sup>1</sup> Grief's watercourse and sorrow's source are turned to joyful streams, Their old distress and heaviness are vanished like dreams

223

For God above in arms of love doth dearly them embrace, And fills their sprights with such delights and pleasures in His grace As shall not fail, nor yet grow stale, through frequency of use, Nor do they fear God's favor there to forfeit by abuse

224

For there the saints are perfect saints, and holy ones indeed, From all the sin that dwelt within their mortal bodies freed, Made kings and priests to God through Christ's
dear love's transcendancy, There to remain and there to reign with him eternally.

GOD'S CONTROVERSY WITH NEW ENGLAND

WRITTEN IN THE TIME OF THE GREAT DROUGHT, ANNO 1662

BY A LOVER OF NEW ENGLAND'S PROSPERITY

THE WARNING OF THE LORD<sup>1</sup>

Our temp'ral blessings did abound, But spiritual good things Much more abounded, to the praise
Of that great King of kings God's throne was here set up, here was His tabernacle pight, This was the place and these the folk In whom He took delight

110

Our morning stars shone all day long,
Their beams gave forth such light As did the noonday sun abash And's glory dazzle quite Our day continued many years

<sup>1</sup> The text has been modernized, and the sub-title supplied by the editors

And had no night at all, Yea, many thought the light would last
And be perpetual

120

Such, O New England, was thy first,
Such was thy best estate,
But, lo! a strange and sudden change My courage did amate
The brightest of our morning stars Did wholly disappear,
And those that tarried behind With sackcloth covered were.

Moreover, I beheld and saw Our welkin overcast,
And dismal clouds for sunshine late O'erspread from east and west.
The air became tempestuous;
The wilderness 'gan quake,
And from above with awful voice Th'Almighty thund'ring spake.

130

Are these the men that erst at My command Forsook their ancient seats and native soil,
To follow Me into a desert land, Contemning all the travel and the toil,
Whose love was such to purest ordinances As made them set at nought their fair inheritances?

140

Are these the men that prized liberty To walk with God according to their light,
To be as good as He would have them be,
To serve and worship Him with all their might,
Before the pleasures which a fruitful field,
And country flowing-full of all good things, could yield?

Are these the folk whom from the British Isles,
Through the stern billows of the wat'ry main,
I safely led so many thousand miles,
As if their journey had been through a plain,
Whom having from all enemies protected, And through so many deaths and dangers well directed,

150

I brought and planted on the western shore, Where nought but brutes and savage wights did swarm

(Untaught, untrained, untamed by virtue's lore)

That sought their blood, yet could not do them harm,

My fury's flail them threshed, My fatal broom

Did sweep them hence, to make My people elbow-room 160

Are these the men whose gates with peace I crowned,

To whom for bulwarks I salvation gave, Whilst all things else with rattling tumults
sound,

And mortal frays send thousands to the grave?

Whilst their own brethren bloody hands embrewed

In brothers' blood, and fields with carcasses bestrewed?

Is thus the people blest with bounteous store,

By land and sea full richly clad and fed, Whom plenty's self stands waiting still before,

And poureth out their cups well temperèd? 170

For whose dear sake an howling wilderness
I lately turned into a fruitful paradise?

Are these the people in whose hemisphere Such bright-beamed, glist'ring, sun-like stars I placed,

As by their influence did all things cheer,
As by their light blind ignorance defaced,
As errors into lurking holes did fray, As turned the late dark night into a lightsome day?

Are these the folk to whom I milkèd out, And sweetness streamed from consolation's breast, 180

Whose souls I fed and strengthened throughout

With finest spiritual food most finely dressed?

On whom I rained living bread from heaven,

Withouten error's bane, or superstition's leaven?

With whom I made a covenant of peace,
And unto whom I did most firmly plight
My faithfulness, if whilst I live I cease

To be their guide, their God, their full delight,

Since them with cords of love to Me I drew, Enwrapping in My grace such as should them ensue? 190

Are these the men, that now Mine eyes behold,

Concerning whom I thought, and whilom spake,

First heaven shall pass away together scrolled,

Ere they My laws and righteous ways forsake,

Or that they slack to run their heavenly race?

Are these the same? or are some others come in place?

If these be they, how is it that I find Instead of holiness, carnality, Instead of heavenly frames, an earthly
mind,

For burning zeal, luke-warm indifference, 200

For flaming love, key-cold deadheartedness,

For temperance (in meat, and drink, and clothes), excess?

Whence cometh it that pride, and luxury, Debate, deceit, contention, and strife, False-dealing, covetousness, hypocrisy, (With such like crimes) amongst them are so rife,

That one of them doth over-reach another?
And that an honest man can hardly trust his brother?

How is it that security and sloth Amongst the best are common to be found? 210

That grosser sins, instead of grace's growth,

Amongst the many more and more abound?

I hate dissembling shows of holiness Or practice as you talk, or never more profess.

Judge not, vain world, that all are hypocrites

That do profess more holiness than thou,

All foster not dissembling, guileful sprites,

Nor love their lusts, though very many do Some sin through want of care and constant watch, Some with the sick converse till they the sickness catch 220

Some, that maintain a real root of grace, Are overgrown with many noisome weeds, Whose heart, that those no longer may take place,
The benefit of due correction needs
And such as these, however gone astray, I shall by stripes reduce into a better way

Moreover some there be that still retain Their ancient vigor and sincerity, Whom both their own and others' sins constrain To sigh, and mourn, and weep, and wail, and cry, 230
And for their sakes I have forborne to pour My wrath upon revolvers to this present hour

To praying saints I always have respect,
And tender love, and pitiful regard,
Nor will I now in any wise neglect Their love and faithful service to reward, Although I deal with others for their folly, And turn their mirth to tears that have been too jolly

For think not, O backsliders, in your heart,
That I shall still your evil manners bear, Your sins Me press as sheaves do load a cart, 241
And therefore I will plague you for this gear
Except you seriously, and soon, repent, I'll not delay your pain and heavy punishment

And who be those themselves that yonder show?
The seed of such as name My dreadful Name!
On whom while 'ere compassion's skirt I threw Whilst in their blood they were, to hide their shame!
Whom My preventing love did ne'er Me
take!

Whom for Mine own I marked, lest they should Me forsake! 250

I looked that such as these to virtue's lore (Though none but they) would have inclined their ear;
That they at least Mine image should have bore,
And sanctified My name with awful fear Let pagan's brats pursue their lusts, whose meed Is death For Christian's children are an holy seed

But hear, O heavens! Let earth amazed stand!
Ye mountains melt, and hills come flowing down!
Let horror seize upon both sea and land!
Let nature's self be cast into a stone! 260 I children nourished, nurtured, and upheld,
But they against a tender Father have rebelled

What could have been by Me performed more?
Or wherein fell I short of your desire?
Had you but asked, I would have oped My store,
And given what lawful wishes could require
For all this bounteous cost I looked to see Heaven-reaching hearts and thoughts, meekness, humility

But lo! a sensual heart all void of grace, An iron neck, a proud presumptuous hand, 270
A self-conceited, stiff, stout, stubborn race, That fears no threats, submits to no command,
Self-willed, perverse, such as can bear no yoke,
A generation even ripe for vengeance stroke.

Such were that carnal brood of Israelites That Joshua and the Elders did ensue, Who growing like the cursèd Canaanites Upon themselves My heavy judgments drew
Such also was that fleshly generation Whom I o'erwhelmed by water's deadly inundation 280

They darker light and lesser means misused,
 They had not such examples them to warn,
 You clearer rules and precepts have abused,
 And dreadful monuments of others' harm My Gospel's glorious light you do not prize,
 My Gospel's endless, boundless grace you clean despise

My painful messengers you disrespect, Who toil and sweat and swill themselves
     away,
 Yet nought at all with you can take effect,
     Who hurry headlong to your own decay 290
 In vain the founder melts, and taketh pains, Bellows and lead's consumed, but still your dross remains

What should I do with such a stiff-necked race?
 How shall I ease Me of such foes as they?
 What shall befall despisers of My grace?
     I'll surely bear their candlestick away,
 And lamps put out Their glorious noonday light I'll quickly turn into a dark Egyptian night

Oft have I charged you by My ministers To gird yourselves with sackcloth, and repent 300
 Oft have I warned you by My messengers,

That so you might My wrathful ire prevent But who among you hath this warning taken?
 Who hath his crooked ways and wicked works forsaken?

Yea, many grow to more and more excess, More light and loose, more carnal and prophane
 The sins of Sodom, pride and wantonness, Among the multitude spring up amain Are these the fruits of pious education, To run with greater speed and courage to damnation? 310

If here and there some two or three shall steer
 A wiser course than their companions do, You make a mock of such, and scoff and jeer
 Because they will not be so bad as you Such is the generation that succeeds The men whose eyes have seen My great and awful deeds

Now therefore hearken and incline your ear,
 In judgment I will henceforth with you plead,
 And if by that you will not learn to fear,
     But still go on a sensual life to lead, 320
 I'll strike at once an all-consuming stroke, Nor cries nor tears shall then My fierce intent revoke.

BENJAMIN TOMPSON

1642-1714

FROM NEW ENGLAND'S CRISIS

THE PROLOGUE <sup>1</sup>

THE times wherein old Pompion was a saint,
 When men fared hardly yet without complaint
 On vilest cates, the dainty Indian maize Was eat with clamshells out of wooden trays

<sup>1</sup> The texts of Tompson's poems have been modernized by the editors

Under thatched huts without the cry of rent,
 And the best sauce to every dish, content, When flesh was food, and hairy skins made coats,
 And men as well as birds had chirping notes;
 When sinners were accounted noble blood Among the tribes of common herbage food, 10
 Of Ceres' bounty formed was many a knack,

Enough to fill Poor Robin's Almanac—

These golden times (too fortunate to hold)
Were quickly sinned away for love of gold 'Twas then, among the bushes, not the street,

If one in place did an inferior meet
'Good morrow, brother, is there aught you want?

Take freely of me what I have you ha'nt.
Plain 'Tom' and 'Dick' would pass as current now

As ever since 'Your servant, sir,' and bow Deep-skirted doublets, puritanic capes, 21 Which now would render men like upright apes,

Was comelier wear, our wiser fathers
thought,

Than the cast fashions from all Europe brought

'Twas in those days an honest grace would hold

Till an hot pudding grew at heart a cold,
And men had better stomachs to religion Than I to capon, turkey-cock, or pigeon When honest sisters met to pray, not prate, About their own and not their neighbor's state, 30

During Plain Dealing's reign, that worthy stud

Of th' ancient planters' race before the flood—

These times were good, merchants cared not a rush

For other fare than jonakin and mush Although men fared and lodgèd very hard, Yet innocence was better than a guard
'Twas long before spiders and worms had drawn

Their duncy webs or hid with cheating lawn

New England's beauties, which still seemed to me

Illustrious in their own simplicity 40
'Twas ere the neighboring Virgin-land had broke

The hogsheds of her worse than hellish smoke

'Twas ere the Islands sent their presents in,
Which but to use was counted next to sin

'Twas ere a barge had made so rich a freight As chocolate, dust-gold, and bits of eight Ere wines from France and muscovado too, Without the which the drink will scarcely do, From western isles, ere fruits and delicacies

Did rot maid's teeth and spoil their handsome faces 50 Or ere these times did chance, the noise of war

Was from our towns and hearts removèd far

No bugbear comets in the crystal air
To drive our Christian planters to despair.
No sooner pagan malice peepèd forth But valor snibbed it, then were men of worth,

Who by their prayers slew thousands, angel-like—

Their weapons are unseen with which they strike

Then had the churches rest, as yet the coals Were covered up in most contentious souls 60

Freeness in judgment, union in affection, Dear love, sound truth—they were our grand protection

These were the twins which in our councils sate,

These gave prognostics of our future fate
If these be longer-lived, our hopes increase,
These wars will usher in a longer peace,
But if New England's love die in its youth,
The grave will open next for blessed Truth

This theme is out of date, the peaceful hours When castle's needed not but pleasant bowers 70

Not ink but blood and tears now serve the turn

To draw the figure of New England's urn
New England's hour of passion is at hand, No power except divine can it withstand Scarce hath her glass of fifty years run out, But her old prosperous steeds turn heads about,

Tracking themselves back to their poor beginnings,

To fear and fare upon their fruits of sinnings,

So that the mirror of the Christian world Lies burnt to heaps in part, her streamers furled, 80

Grief reigns, joys flee, and dismal fears surprise

Not dastard spirits only but the wise.

Thus have the fairest hopes deceived the eye

Of the big-swoll'n expectant standing by.
Thus the proud ship after a little turn Sinks into Neptune's arms to find its urn.

Thus hath the heir to many thousands born
Been in an instant from the mother torn Even thus thine infant cheeks begin to pale,
 And thy supporters through great losses fail 90

This is the prologue to thy future woe,
 The epilogue no mortal yet can know 1676

 A FORTIFICATION AT BOSTON BEGUN BY WOMEN

DUX FEMINA FACTI<sup>1</sup>

A GRAND attempt some Amazonian dames Contrive, whereby to glorify their names,
 A ruff for Boston Neck of mud and turf, Reaching from side to side, from surf to surf,

Their nimble hands spin up like Christmas pies,

Their pastry by degrees on high doth rise
 The wheel at home counts it an holiday, Since while the mistress worketh, it may play

A tribe of female hands—but manly hearts—

Forsake at home their pastry-crust and tarts 10

To knead the dirt, the samplers down they hurl,

Their undulating silks they closely furl
 The pickaxe one as a commandress holds, While t'other at her awkness gently scolds One puffs and sweats, the other mutters,
 'Why

Can't you promove your work so fast as I?'
 Some dig, some delve, and others' hands do feel

The little waggon's weight with single wheel

And lest some fainting fits the weak
 surprise,

They want no sack nor cakes, they are more wise 20

These brave essays draw forth male stronger hands,

More like to daubers than to martial bands,

These do the work, and sturdy bulwarks

But the beginners well deserve the praise

4 Rebekah Sewall was the grand-daughter of Samuel Sewall, the diarist. The title of 'Mrs' refers not to matrimony but to the social pre-eminence of her family. Of her death, her father wrote: 'An account of my daughter Rebekah's death Aug 2, 1710. In the afternoon she was taken ill at the Governor's. Sent for Doctor Noyes and Mrs Baily, so continued ill, in the morning after, her mother and myself were sent for, got there about six o'clock. Doctor Noyes and Mrs Baily applying those things which they thought most proper. My daughter Rebekah died Aug 3, 1710, ten minutes before nine in the morning, being lamented by all that knew her. Friday, Aug 4, she was carried from the Governor's house to the Governor's tomb, where she was interred. Gave [the bearers] white scarfs and gloves. My wife and I went into deep mourning. Gave gloves to several relations, Governor's servants and mine. Gave Mr Tompson a pair, he made two copies of verses on her.' Coll Mass Hist Soc, V, xxvii; Diary of Samuel Sewall, I. The elegy was printed as a broadside.

Ah! Pity 'tis such prettiness should die.
 Madam, behold the Lamb of God, for there's Your pretty lamb while you dissolve in tears,
 She lies infolded in her Shepherd's arms, Whose bosom's always full of gracious charms 10 Great Jesus claimed His own, never begrutch
 Your jewels rare into the hands of such He with His righteousness has better dress'd Your babe than e'er you did when at your breast
 'Tis not your case alone, for thousands have Followed their sweetest comforts to the
 Seeking the plat of immortality,
 I saw no place secure, but all must die Death, that stern officer, takes no denial

I'm grieved he found your door to make a trial 20
 Thus, be it on the land or swelling seas, His sov'reignty doth what his wisdom please
 Must then the rulers of this world's affairs
 By Providence be brought thus into tears?
 It is a lesson hard, I must confess, For our proud wills with Heaven's to acquiesce
 But when Death goes before—unseen, behind,
 There's such a One as may compose the mind
 Pray, madam, wipe the tears off your fair
     eyes,
 With your translated damsel sympathize.
 Could she from her new school obtain the leave, 31
 She'd tell you things would make you cease to grieve

FROM GOD'S DETERMINATIONS TOUCHING HIS ELECT<sup>1</sup>

PROLOGUE

LORD, can a crumb of earth the earth outweigh, Outmatch all mountains, nay, the crystal sky?
 Imbosom in't designs that shall display
 And trace into the boundless Deity?
 Yea! hand, a pen whose moisture doth gild o'er Eternal glory with a glorious glor?

 If it its pen had of an angel's quill,
 And sharpened on a precious stone ground tight,
 And dipt in liquid gold, and moved by skill,
 In crystal leaves should golden letters write, 10
 It would but blot and blur, yea, jag and jar Unless Thou mak'st the pen, and scrivener.

I am this crumb of dust which is design'd
 To make my pen unto Thy praise alone,
 And my dull fancy I would gladly grind Unto an edge on Zion's precious stone, And write in liquid gold upon Thy name
 My letters till Thy glory forth doth flame

<sup>1</sup> The full title is as follows: God's Determinations touching His Elect and the Flect's Combat in their Conversion and Coming up to God in Christ together with the Comfortable Effects thereof Taylor's poems were first discovered by Thomas H. Johnson and printed by him in 'Edward Taylor A Puritan "Sacred Poet"', The New England Quarterly, X, 11, 290-322. The texts of the poems have been modernized by the editors.

Let not th'attempts break down my dust, I pray, Nor laugh Thou them to scorn, but pardon give 20 Inspire this crumb of dust till it display Thy glory through't, and then Thy dust shall live
 Its failings then Thou'lt overlook, I trust, They being slips slipped from Thy crumb of dust

Thy crumb of dust breathes two words from its breast That Thou wilt guide its pen to write aright
 To prove Thou art and that Thou art the best,
 And show Thy properties to shine most bright
 And then Thy works will shine as flowers on stems,
 Or as in jewelry shops do gems 30

UPON WHAT BASE WAS FIXED THE LATH WHEREIN<sup>2</sup>

UPON what base was fixed the lath wherein He turned this globe and rigged it so trim?
 Who blew the bellows of His furnace vast?
 Or held the mould wherein the world was cast?
 Who laid its corner-stone? Or whose command?
 Where stand the pillars upon which it stands?
 Who laced and filleted the earth so fine
 With rivers like green ribbons smaragdine?

Who made the seas its selvedge, and its locks
Like a quilt ball within a silver box? 10 Who spread its canopy? Or curtains spun?
Who in this bowling alley bowled the sun?

THE SOUL'S ADMIRATION HEREUPON

WHAT, I such praises sing! How can it be?
Shall I in heaven sing?
What, I, that scarce durst hope to see,
Lord, such a thing?
Though nothing is too hard for Thee,
One hope hereof seems hard to me

What, can I ever tune those melodies, Who have no tune at all,
Not knowing where to stop nor rise, Nor when to fall? 10
To sing Thy praise I am unfit,
I have not learned my gamut yet

But should these praises on stringed instruments
Be sweetly tuned? I find I nonplussed am, for no consents
I ever mind
My tongue is neither quill nor bow, Nor can my fingers quavers show

But was it otherwise, I have no kit,<sup>1</sup>
Which though I had, I could 20 Not tune the strings, which soon would slip Though others should
But should they not, I cannot play, But for an F should strike an A

And should Thy praise upon wind instruments
Sound all o'er heaven shrill?
My breath will hardly through such vents A whistle fill
Which though it should, it's past my spell
By stops and falls to sound it well 30

How should I then join in such exercise?
One sight of Thee'll entice Mine eyes to heft, whose ecstasies Will stob<sup>2</sup> my voice

Hereby mine eyes will bind my tongue Unless Thou, Lord, do cut the thong

What use of useless me then there, poor snake?
There saints and angels sing Thy praise in full career, which make The heavens to ring 40
Yet if Thou wilt, Thou canst me raise With angels bright to sing Thy praise.

THE JOY OF CHURCH FELLOWSHIP RIGHTLY ATTENDED

IN heaven soaring up I dropt an ear
On earth, and, oh! sweet melody!
And listening found it was the saints who were Encoached for heaven that sang for joy
For in Christ's coach they sweetly sing
As they to glory ride therein

Oh, joyous hearts! Enfired with holy flame!
Is speech thus tassellèd with praise?
Will not your inward fire of joy contain,
That it in open flames doth blaze? 10
For in Christ's coach saints sweetly sing
As they to glory ride therein

And if a string do slip by chance, they soon Do screw it up again, whereby They set it in a more melodious tune
And a diviner harmony
For in Christ's coach they sweetly sing
As they to glory ride therein

In all their acts public and private, nay
And secret too, they praise impart, 20
But in their acts divine and worship, they With hymns do offer up their heart Thus in Christ's coach they sweetly sing
As they to glory ride therein.

Some few not in, and some, whose time and place
Block up this coach's way, do go As travellers afoot, and so do trace
The road that gives them right thereto While in this coach these sweetly sing
As they to glory ride therein 30

HOUSEWIFERY

MAKE me, O Lord, Thy spinning-wheel complete Thy holy Word my distaff make for me,

Make mine affections Thy swift flyers neat,
And make my soul Thy holy spool to be,
My conversation make to be Thy reel, And reel the yarn thereon spun of Thy

Make me Thy loom then, knit therein this twine,
And make Thy Holy Spirit, Lord, wind quills, Then weave the web Thyself The yarn is fine
Thine ordinances make my fulling mills Then dye the same in heavenly colors choice,
All pinked with varnished flowers of paradise

Then clothe therewith mine understanding, will,
Affections, judgment, conscience, memory,
My words and actions, that their shine may fill
My ways with glory and Thee glorify Then mine apparel shall display before Ye That I am clothed in holy robes for glory

WHAT love is this of Thine, that cannot be In Thine infinity, O Lord, confined, Unless it in Thy very Person see Infinity and finity conjoined?
What! hath Thy godhead, as not satisfied, Married our manhood, making it its bride?

Oh, matchless love! filling heaven to the brim!
O'errunning it, all running o'er beside This world! Nay, overflowing hell, wherein For Thine elect there rose a mighty tide!
That there our veins might through Thy Person bleed To quench those flames that else would on us feed

Oh! that my love might overflow my heart To fire the same with love! For love I would,

But oh! my straitened breast! my lifeless spark!
My fireless flame! What chilly love and cold!
In measure small! in manner chilly! See!
Lord, blow the coal, Thy love enflame in me

LIKE to the marigold I blushing close My golden blossoms when Thy sun goes down, Moist'ning my leaves with dewy sighs, half froze
By the nocturnal cold that hoars my crown
Mine apples ashes are in apple shells, And dirty too—strange and bewitching spells!

When, Lord, mine eye doth spy Thy grace to beam,
Thy mediatorial glory in the shune,
Out-spouted so from Adam's typic stream And emblemuz'd in Noah's polished shrine, Thine theirs outshines so far it makes their glory
In brightest colors seem a smoky story

10

But when mine eye full of these beams doth cast
Its rays upon my dusty essence thin, Impregnate with a spark divine defaced,
All candied o'er with leprosy of sin,
Such influences on my spirits light Which them as bitter gall or cold ice smute

My bristled sins hence do so horrid 'pear, None but Thyself (and Thou decked up must be In Thy transcendent glory sparkling clear)
A mediator unto God for me So high they rise, faith scarce can toss a sight
Over their head upon Thyself to light

20

Is't possible such glory, Lord, e'er should Center its love on me, sin's dunghill else?
My case up take, make it its own? Who would Wash with his blood my blots out?
Crown his shelf

Or dress his golden cupboard with such ware?
This makes my pale-faced hope almost despair

30

Yet let my titmouse's quill suck in Thy grace's milk pails some small drop;
or cart
A bit or splinter of some ray, the wing Of grace's sun springed out, into my
heart,
To build there wonder's chapel, where Thy praise Shall be the psalms sung forth in gracious lays

Oh! What a thing is man? Lord, who am I?
That Thou shouldst give him law (Oh!

And judge him wilt thereby too in Thy time
A court of justice Thou in heaven hold'st To try his case while he's here housed on How do Thy angels lay before Thine eye My deeds both white and black I daily do?

How doth Thy court Thou panel'st there

But flesh complains What right for this?
Let's know
For right or wrong, I can't appear unto't And shall a sentence pass on such a suit?

10

Soft, blemish not this golden bench or place.
Here is no brube, nor colorings to hude, Nor pettifogger to befog the case,

But justice hath her glory here well tried,
Her spotless law all spotted cases tends,
Without respect or disrespect them ends

God's judge Himself, and Christ attorney

Angels the sergeants are, all creatures kiss
The book, and do as evidence abound.
All cases pass according to pure law,
And in the sentence is no fret nor flaw.

What say'st, my soul? Here all thy deeds are tried

Is Christ thy advocate to plead thy cause?
Art thou His client? Such shall never slide.
He never lost His case He pleads such laws

As carry do the same, nor doth refuse
The vilest sinner's case that doth Him

For all their fines His purse doth make

He non-suits Satan's suit or casts the same

He'll plead thy case, and not accept a fee He'll plead sub forma pauperis for thee

My case is bad Lord, be my advocate.
My sin is red, I'm under God's arrest.
Thou hast the hit of pleading, plead my

Although it's bad, Thy plea will make it

FROM WINTER MEDITATIONS

INTRODUCTION <sup>1</sup>

IT is the description which Martinus in that noble and learned piece of geography which he calls Atlas Chinensis gives concerning the air in that part of the Eastern world, Maus in hac provincia frigus est quam illius poscat poli altitudo; says he: 'The cold in China is greater than the elevation of the pole there would seem to allow, for the country lies in little more than forty degrees of latitude, and yet for four months together in the year the rivers there are so frozen that the ice will bear the passage not only of men but of horses and coaches too upon it. Yea, and the ships are so shut up in their harbors that unto the beginning of March there is hardly any stirring out, and there is more froze in one day than there can be thawed in many.' I almost thought that I read the description of our winters in this part of our Western world in those words of the geographer, for though the latitude of the principal town in this province be but forty-two degrees, twenty-seven minutes, yet our cold is by many degrees more fierce and hard, however more clear, pleasant, and wholesome, than that of many places that lie beyond fifty, and when it shall be told unto strangers that we have had frosts both in June and in August, they will also conclude that our winters must needs be as long as they are cold. Now, the pinches of such a New English winter awakened me to consider how so cold and so long a time of diversion from very much of our other business might be best employed for the glory of that God who made both the summer and the winter. As 'twas the manner of an ingenious person, when in the morning there was a prospect of a fair day, to say, 'Tis pity such a fair day should be lost', so the most of our winter days are fair ones—not such dirty, sloppy, lowering things as fill the winters in some other lands, and methought 'twas pity any of them should be lost, as too many of them are. I am sufficiently dissatisfied at the ordinary definition which the schools have given of the cold, 'A quality that congregates things both a like and an unlike nature.' Yet I have been far more dissatisfied at the too usual way of spending our days when the cold almost confines us from our Christian congregations. But what seemed the best way of redeeming these days? Truly I was willing to try, not only whether there could not be found many pious works to be attended with a singular convenience in the winter, but also whether the accidents of the winter itself might not afford something to assist us and quicken us in those works. There are certain plants which keep green all the winter long, and, thought I, why should not I endeavor that the exercises of devotion might so do, both in myself and others who desire to be as green olive trees in the house of our God? The winter has been sometimes called hiems iners, 'the sluggish winter', but I would contribute what I can that it may be hiems sancta, 'the pious winter, the holy winter, the useful winter', a winter devoted unto the works of the God of Heaven. To sleep all winter more befits a bear than a man, and much more than a saint. It is very certain that there is more time contained in a natural day of the winter than there is in a natural day of the summer, for the sun in its annual motion from the west unto the east, through the zodiac, passes equal arches in unequal times: the winter half-year of the sun's passing from Libra to Aries is but an hundred and seventy-eight days, whereas the summer half-year of his passing from Aries to Libra is no less than an hundred and eighty-seven days, the sun is nine days more in passing through the semi-ecliptic of the summer than he is through that of the winter, and accordingly an hour upon the sundial when the sun is inclining to the winter tropic, is longer than an hour upon the dial when he is advancing near the summer tropic Hereupon I could not but make that reflection if there be more, though it scarce be sensibly more, time in a day now than at other times in the year, why should I do less work for God, for Christ, for His people now than at other times? And as an effect of that reflection, behold, reader, some of my Winter Meditations

'Tis, as I remember, Polydore Virgil who related that when Mathildis was, during the depth of winter, straitly besieged in Oxford, she arrayed herself and her followers all in white, the color of the snow upon the ground, and by the advantage of that color escaped through the besiegers unto a place of safety That which I desire is a free passage for the truths and the ways and the works of God into the minds of my neighbors, and I have therefore taken the advantage of putting a winter complexion upon them, I have clothed them in the colors of the winter And in this essay I have after a sort moralized the fable of Antiphanes, that there is in a certain Scythian region such a frost that the words uttered in the winter there congeal so as to be not heard until the summer following shall dissolve them, for 'twas at Boston lecture, in the month of December last, that the heads of these Winter Meditations were first preached, and it is now in the month of November following that they are printed, on the same designs of religion that gave them their original

When the excellent Bartholinus published his book, De Usu Nivis, it was accompanied with an epigram, something to this purpose,

'Tis possible that, now I am composing my book about the use of the winter, I may find myself obliged to confess unto the world as a great fault what was indeed counted none at all in that incomparable person I do confess that I have written too many books for one of my small attainments, and I would say to my reader, whom I now suppose by the fireside, if this or any

book of mine hinder men from acquainting themselves with the Bible, that book of God, I wish, as Luther in that case did about his own books, that they were all thrown into the fire But I hope it will be otherwise, whereto I would also add that all that weariness of the flesh, as well as the various and humbling temptation otherwise which I have undergone in the study of writing many books, has been abundantly recompensed by the comfort of thinking that the free grace of my good God will accept of my poor thoughts, to be serviceable unto the interests of His Kingdom in the world And now I am appending unto all the rest one book upon the winter, I will not say as my newly mentioned Bartholinus did in the preface of his Ego quidem ex multo labore praeter atram invidiam nihil exspecto, or, that I expect nothing but only to be frost-bitten with envy for what I do 'Tis true, there is a froward generation in every place, whose calumnies must persecute all that serve the public, and I have had the experience of both my father's as well as my own to convince me that this place has of those frowards in it If this people could have had greater (which I know not), yet all mankind will shortly know that it was impossible for any people to have truer, juster, and more indefatigable servants than some, with whom I have the honor to be well acquainted, have been to this But the monstrous detractions that have attended them have taught me that I also must bene agere et male audire, 'hear ill, if I will do well', and it will indeed be at last found that unto all activity in well-disposed persons for the public weal, the spirit of nitre itself is not a greater freezer than such ingrateful usages Nevertheless, I am so charitable as to think that this is the spirit of but a few, or at least that there are multitudes among us who when any service is done for them do heartily give thanks to God for it, and who kindly resent the zeal with which they may see Almighty God inspiring of any to be laboring for their good For the sake of such, none of our thoughts, none of our cares, none of our weary studies are too much, and it is unto such that these of mine are now humbly offered.

THE MERCIFUL WORKS OF GOD

It is written in

Job 37 6,7

*He saith to the snow, be thou upon the earth;
likewise to the small rain, & to the great rain of his strength*

He sealeth up the hand of every man, that all men may know His work

THE merciful works of God which provide for our necessities in the winter are very manifold, and it becomes us to take a most thankful notice of those many mercies. When our God seals up our hands in the winter, He opens His own hand in our liberal supplies for the winter, and we should so know those works of God as to be thankfully affected with them.

The winter itself, that is not without much of mercy in it. It is our winter particularly which for divers months in the year is a better defense unto us against foreign invasions than all the sconces and castles wherewith we could be fortified. Doubtless the Polanders thought their cold was a kindness unto them when, in an army of seventy thousand Turks invading them, forty thousand suddenly perished by the severity of the cold, though it were but the month of November with them. Truly, in the month of November the cold begins none of the least preservatives also for us New Englanders! And who can say how many epidemical diseases have by our winter been extinguished? Our cold precipitates the vapors which would else thicken and poison our air, and by freezing the surface of the earth it keeps in many malignant steams that otherwise would thence arise to suffocate us. It is called for in Pss 148 8 'Praise the Lord, ye hail, and snow, and vapor, and stormy wind.' It seems they that have much of the hail, the snow, the vapor, may find something in them for which they should praise the Lord. The Psalmist says 'God giveth snow like wool', the snow is as a goodly white robe on the body of the earth, whereby 'tis cherished with a nitrous impregnation for fruitfulness in the year ensuing. Thuanus tells us that sometimes it has rained corn, and, indeed, what corn should we have if all rain were denied unto us? It was miraculous when God after a sort rained first bread and then flesh for Israel of old, He does it in effect for us continually.

But as the winter brings much of mercy to us, it brings much of hardship too. Pliny calls the snow and the ice the punishments of the mountains. We who dwell in a plain region, as well as they who dwell upon the rigid and ragged edges of such mountains, would be sorely punished by the hardship of the winter, if the mercy of our God should not relieve us. It was said, in Job 38 22,23 'Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow? Or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail, which I have reserved against the time of trouble?' Truly, the time of snow and the time of hail would be a sore-time of trouble unto us if God should not from the other treasures of his bounty therein make a comfortable provision for us. This I would say the common mercies of God are a ground, and call for more than common praises to God. May we from this time resolve to be more than ordinarily thankful for our common mercies, and we have to extraordinary good purpose now spent the time of this present exercise.

We may be thankful that the winter itself is not so hard, either as it might be if God should make it so, or as it is now in some other lands, yea, or as it has been heretofore among ourselves. The Psalmist saw cause to say, in Pss 147 17 'Who can stand before His cold?' If God should carry on the cold unto a little further extremity upon us, there could be no standing before it. Or, if the cold which in its extremity tarries usually but three days among us were extended for three months, instead of any standing there could be no living for us. But, in the midst of the cold, God remembers mercy. And our winters indeed are not so fiercely cold as those of some other countries. We are not, as Livy speaks of the Alps, aeternis damnati nivibus, 'doomed unto eternal snows!' 'Tis not with us, as Olearius tells us 'tis in Muscovia, where their spittle will freeze ere it reach the ground, and so violent is the cold that no furs can hinder it, but sometimes men's noses, ears, hands, and feet will be frozen and all fall off, and, as the great Fletcher has reported, not only they who travel abroad but many in the very markets of their towns are mortally pinched, so that you shall see many drop down in the streets, and many travellers brought home dead and stiff in their sleds. Which is a report that Sigismundus ab Herberstein has also given us. Nor is it with us as Captain James found it in some of his northern coasting, where, when he and his companions were a little while parted, they had their faces, hair, and clothes frozen over that they could not know each other by their habits, no, nor by their voices, nor, as where Gerat de Voerb was, when their shoes froze as hard as horns upon their feet, nor were they able to wear them, nor as where Beauplan tells us that without good precautions the cold produces those cancers which in a few hours destroy the parts they seize upon.

Yea, and our own winters are as observably as comfortably moderated since the land has been peopled and opened, of later years. Our snows are not so deep and long since the progress that has been made in the clearing of our woods, and our winds blow not such razors as in the days of our fathers, when the hands of the good men would freeze unto the bread upon their tables, and the strongest wine there would in a few minutes be hardly to be swallowed for its congelation, yea, water cast up into the air would be turned into ice ere it came unto the ground. I wish that all wise men would make the reflection of Petronius upon such a matter, says he Incultis asperisque regionibus diutius nives hærent, ast ubi aratro domefacta tellus nitet, dum loqueris, levis pruina dilabatur. Similiter in pectoribus ira considit feras quidem mentes obsidet, eruditæ præterlabitur. In short English 'as our land grows better cultivated, we shall have less winter and less anger too among us.'

But then, let our thankful thoughts proceed unto the more particular provisions wherewith our kind God furnishes us against the assaults of a needy winter. Be thankful that we do not undergo the torments of cold in such starving circumstances as ecclesiastical history tells us the martyrdom of Muria was attended with.

Let us be thankful for our clothing. It is a stroke in the picture of the wise woman, she is not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household are clothed with double garments. 'Tis well for us that we have such garments by night as well as by day, to keep off the cold which would otherwise prodigiously mortify us. A poor naked beggar of Russia, being in the depth of winter asked by a person of quality, covered with his thick furs, how he could, so thin-clad, bear the cold, he replied, 'My lord, should you do as I do, you would feel as little cold as I.' But being asked, 'How is that?' he answered, 'Why, as I do, put on all the clothes you've got.' But indeed, if we were almost naked in the cold of our winter, it would be but a cold comfort unto us to think, 'These few thread-bare clothes are all we have to cover us.' Be thankful, and at the same time let us entreat of our God that He would bestow upon us the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ for the garment of our souls, and adorn us with the fine linen which is the righteousness of the saints.

Let us also be thankful for our fuel. There have been pagans that have sometimes worshipped the fire as a god. But it would well become Christians to worship the true God with manifold praises for the advantages which we have against our cold by the fire. Our Indians have thought the fire must needs be a god, because when a poor man is ready to perish with cold in the winter, one spark of it will in a few minutes blaze out so comfortably as to save the life of him. Instead of so rude a fancy, it seems us to say, 'There is much of God in the fire, His greatness and His bounty may be seen sparkling in it.' Be thankful, and at the same time let us entreat of our God that we may be baptized with the fire of His Holy Spirit, which will make us fervent in spirit serving the Lord.

Let us be thankful for our houses too. We are not left now to lodge abroad in the cold, with none but the ground for our bed, the snow for our coverlid, and the sky for our canopy, nor are we obliged unto such wretched wigwams as were the best habitations of the barbarous natives that were here before us. How well are we lodged in the winter, and neither by burnings nor by earthquakes forced out of doors! Be thankful, and at the same time let us entreat of our God that we have a mansion in our Heavenly Father's house forever. The keenest winters in the world have been made very tolerable by people's making some rooms of their houses under the earth, keeping themselves in such subterranean rooms. But let the winters which call us to give thanks for our warm houses on the earth, cause us to be concerned for an house eternal in the heavens

And let us be thankful for our tables. How many warm dishes have we to cherish us, whereby we are strengthened against the cold of the winter? And how many refreshing draughts to refocillate our enfeebled spirits? Be thankful, and entreat of God that we may be admitted unto His feast of fat things full of marrow, and of wines on the lees well refined, the least whereat there will be no taking away

We have a glorious benefactor in the heavens by whose benignity upon earth we live well all the winter long, and all the expressions of that benignity are to be received with a most hearty thankfulness

I pray, let us not be condemned by the very Jews themselves, with whom it has been customary still to make use of their daily comforts with a Banuk Adonai, or 'Blessed be the Lord!' When Job was looking back upon the good days which he had seen, he said, in Job 29 2,4 'O that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me, as I was in the days of my youth!' Some render it so 'As I was in the days of my winter quarters' Why, when the great Commander of the universe does command us into our winter quarters, He does then preserve us, and by His light we walk through the darkness of the winter. And I would now say, 'O that we were so thankful as we should be for such merciful months!'

The works which God has formerly done towards ourselves ought always to be remembered with us, and the winter is a very proper season for that remembrance

Here is the work of God which we are to know, when by the winter He seals up our hand, even the whole work of God, in the whole course of our life

There have been smiting works of God, which ought seriously to be remembered with us, as it is said in Lam 3 19,20 'Remembering my affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall, my soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled in me' Behold a fit work for the winter! Have we not sometimes been in a winter of adversity, wherein this and that storm of affliction and misery has been hard upon us? Now in the winter let it be part of our work to recount every such work of God. Now bring to remembrance all that wormwood and gall, but what for? Truly, to see whether you have been such gainers by all those chastisements as you should have been, and whether the weeds of the corruptions in your hearts, and of the disorders in your lives, have been duly nipped by the frost of such a winter

But there have also been smiling works of God, which ought carefully to be remembered with us. It was the language of a David, in Pss 103 2 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits' To bless God is not the least of the duties which the everblessed God requires of man, and all true Davids or men beloved by God evermore love to be blessing of God. If this is to be done 'at all times' as the Psalmist elsewhere speaks, I am sure it may eminently be done in winter times. But God is not really blessed or served if not heartily, and in our blessing of God, the thing is done to halves, if the whole soul, or all the powers of the soul, be not engaged in it. Indeed such is our backwardness to the blessing of God that we had need earnestly to stir, and spur, and rouse ourselves unto the doing of it. Let us then stir up ourselves till we have got ourselves into an heat at this work, in our winter, and know that a commemoration of God's benefits to us is to be one main ingredient of our thanksgivings to Him

Well, then, let this be one considerable stroke of our winter work, even to run over the stories of our lives, by reckoning up the benefits of God, and reflecting on that goodness and mercy wherewith we have been followed all our lives. What if you should now and then spend whole days of thanksgiving, not only when the authority does usually once in a winter call the whole province to observe such a day, but also in secret places before God, by yourselves alone? Some children of God have doubtless enjoyed an heaven upon earth by devoting themselves unto such an heavenly and glorious exercise, and a day so devoted has ordinarily been followed with some observable mercy of God. However, let us every winter set apart our time to commemorate the many benefits of God unto us in our lives, and utter our just hal-luhjahs upon every article in that commemoration Particularly, the first article in our commemoration may be the benefits of God relating to the protection which attended our first production—our formation in the womb and reception from the womb. About our being shaped in our mothers, we may say, 'Lord, I will praise Thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made.' And about our being taken from our mothers, we may say, 'Lord, Thou art He who took me out of the womb.' As for our bodies, 'tis impossible for anything to be better contrived than they are in the whole make of them. What a sad thing would it have been if these had been monstrously deformed or defective in any one of all their members? Truly, there are thousands of mercies and wonders in one perfect child! And then, as for our spirits, they are certainly the most noble things that inhabit this lower world. How doleful had been our plight if these had lost any of their faculties, were we fools, or mad! But indeed we have souls capable of a very vast improvement in the honoring and enjoying of our God! What shall I say? That we are arrived alive among the living on the earth is a thing full of marvels, if not of miracles. What if we had expired embryos, whereby all our opportunities to glorify God had been lost forever, yea, and this after our being animated, but perhaps before our being any way given unto God in the New Covenant by our parents, who 'tis possible were themselves at that time strangers from the covenant of promise, and so having no hope for their miserable offspring? O think on what thou art, and what thou mightest have been! But,

The second article in our commemoration may be the benefits of God relating to the place of our nativity, or at least of our habitation. Where do we dwell? 'Tis in a land enriched with all sorts of temporal conveniencies. 'Tis not where we must have endured the want of all things, not in the dark places of the earth, which are filled with cruelty. We dwell where we have a plenty of meat, of drink, of apparel, and of the best, and it is plain that the poor do not in any country live so well as they do in ours. We dwell where we have the right of Englishmen for our birthright, which is an inheritance of more consequence than what any other nation upon earth is favored with, yea, and we have additional privileges, as we are New Englanders, whereof we may say, as the Jewish rabbi did of liberty, 'If the heavens were parchment, and the seas were ink, all would be too little to write the praises due unto our God upon that account.' We dwell where civility abounds, where knowledge and learning, with schools and other means for it, are promoted, where vice is by wholesome laws restrained, where human society is made easy and pleasant by the orders of it, and where industry is encouraged. But this is not all, multo maiora canamus. 'Tis in a land exalted with all sorts of spiritual advantages, 'tis not where the people perish because they have no vision. I pray mark it if the world at this day be divided into one-and-thirty parts, about nineteen of them are heathen idolaters, about seven of them are Mahometans, hardly five of them are so much as called Christians. And of what has been styled Christendom, how small a moiety is rescued either from that superstition or persecution which destroys all real Christianity? Yea, but you and I have the lines fallen to us in such a pleasant place! We dwell in a Goshen, in a Protestant and a Puritan soil, and where a power to persecute is by a royal charter forever kept from coming into the hands of any that might hereafter incline to use it on us. And in what age? Had we been born a few ages ago, it must have been in a pagan, or in a popish age, and before printing was invented, when a Bible must have cost a man an incredible sum of money, if he could have got it so, and perhaps hanging or burning into the bargain. Alas, brethren, there is not one of us but what are descended from the loins of many that are now roaring in the place of dragons! But as for us, we are born in an age of light. Yea, 'tis in the very dawns of our Lord's coming to destroy the wicked one. I am verily persuaded there are some already born who shall see the most glorious revolutions that ever happened in any former ages, even the glorious things that are spoken of Thee, O thou City of God! It is a privilege to be born so low, so far down in the line of time . . .

I 'We sing of much greater things'

Unto all I say, God forbid this winter should pass before you have made your peace with Him And to excite you here-unto, as in some wintry countries the carpenters must thaw their wood before they can cut it, let me essay to thaw your hearts in order to a better shaping and squaring of them I say then, consider that fire, as well as that cold, which the almighty God has to punish the disobedient. It has been said, 'Who can stand before His cold?' But it has also been said, 'Who can stand before His fire?' Thus, in Isa 33 14 'Who among us can dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?' We wonder at the strength of the ice when we see a piece of it near three inches broad and a quarter of an inch thick, laid over a frame three inches distant, bear a weight of near twenty pounds for a long while together, as Mr Boyle experienced, or when we read Olaus Magnus affirming that their septentrional ice is of such a tenacity that when 'tis two or three fingers thick it will bear an armed man upon it, and when three or four hands thick, vast armies will venture over it for their winter wars But thy heart, O man, is prodigiously harder than a piece of ice, if besides the weight of sin upon it, it can bear the thought of the fire that never shall be quenched Remember, the wrath of God, like a formidable fire, will at last, with exquisite agonies and anguishes, torture the soul of them that shall die in their unregeneracy One that felt some flashes of that fire in the troubles of his conscience, hearing of some speaking about burning to death, cried out, 'Oh, that is but a metaphor to what I endure!'
And another that was broiling in the fire of such troubles roared in this manner, 'Oh, might I have this mitigation of my torments, to lie as a backlog in the fire on the hearth, for a thousand ages!' I urge this when you are by the fireside this winter, think seriously with yourselves, 'Could I bear to roast in this fire? Alas, this is but a painted fire to that wherein God will take vengeance on them that know Him not, and that obey not His Gospel! And if I can't bear the metaphor, no, not so much as for a minute, how then shall I bear to remain under the wrath of God in hell for infinitely more millions of ages than all the fires on earth have made ashes in the world! And O let your hearts be thawed by such considerations this winter, immediately to mourn for and turn from all your sins, and give yourselves to God in Christ by a covenant never to be forgotten It is a work of God that is done after the winter is over, whereof there is mention in Pss 104 30

'Thou sendest forth thy Spirit, and thou renewest the face of the earth' O that such a work as this may be done upon you, while this winter is running! Send forth thy Spirit, O most glorious Lord, and now renew the hearts of them that have hitherto continued unregenerates!

In fine, I now leave these my poor labors in the hands of that eternal Spirit, with my humblest supplications that these my endeavors may be made profitable and acceptable unto His people, and assist my neighbors in their travels to that country where the winter shall forever cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest

THE NEW SETTLEMENT OF THE BIRDS IN NEW ENGLAND

THE birds had maintained good order among themselves for several years, under <sup>1</sup> In 1688, Increase Mather was sent by the Massachusetts colony to England as their agent to regain their charter, revoked in 1684 Mather secured a new and reasonably liberal charter in 1691, but there was discontent at home because of the abridged autonomy 'Cotton Mather's Political Fables were not printed in Mather's time, but were circulated in manuscript, presumably about 1692 They were written, it appears, to defend Increase Mather's acceptance of the new charter against those who believed that he had wantonly sacrificed the old rights of New England In "The New Settlement of the Birds" the characters are

The Birds	The New Englanders
Jupiter	The King of England
The Eagle	Increase Mather
The Goldfinch	Sir Henry Ashurst
The Harpies (or Locusts)	The foes of New England
The King's-fisher	Sir William Phips

The fable itself is simply a statement of the advantages of the new charter, and the reasons why the colonists should be grateful for it In the last fable [The Dogs and the Wolves"], the wolves are the French, and the the shelter of charters by Jupiter granted to several flocks among them, but Heaven, to chastise many faults too observable in its birds, left them to be deprived of their ancient settlements. There were birds of all sorts in their several flocks, for some caught fish, some lived upon grains, the woodpeckers also made a great figure among them, some of them scraped for their living with their claws, and many supplied their nests from beyond sea. Geese you may be sure there were good store, as there are everywhere. Moreover, when they had lost their charters, those poetical birds called harpies became really existent, and visited these flocks, not so much that they might build nests of their own as plunder and pull down the nests of others.

There were many endeavors used by an eagle and a goldfinch, afterwards accompanied with two more—no less deserving the love of all the flocks than desirous to serve their interest—that flew into Jupiter's palace for the resettlement of good government among the birds. These endeavors did for awhile prosper no further than to stop the inroads of harpies or locusts, but at length Jupiter's court was willing that Jupiter's grace, which would have denied nothing for the advantage of them whose wings had carried them a thousand leagues to serve his empire, should not be hindered from giving them a comfortable settlement, though not exactly in their old forms.

Upon this there grew a difference of opinion between some that were concerned for the welfare of the birds. Some were of opinion that if Jupiter would not reinstate the birds in all their ancient circumstances, they had better accept of just nothing at all, but let all things be left for the harpies to commit as much rapine as they were doing when they were ejecting every poor bird out of his nest that would not at an excessive rate produce a patent for it, and when canary-birds<sup>1</sup> domineered over all the flocks. Others were of opinion that the birds ought rather thankfully to accept the offers of Jupiter, and if anything were yet grievous, they might shortly see a fitter dogs are the New Englanders. Its point is simply that in a time when there were enemies at her gates, New England could not safely allow herself to be weakened by political disputes at home. Murdock, Selections from Cotton Mather (N Y, 1926), liv–lvi.

season to ask further favors, especially considering that Jupiter made them offer of such things as all the other American birds would part with more than half the feathers on their backs to purchase. He offered that the birds might be everlastingly confirmed in their titles to their nests and fields. He offered that not so much as a twig should be plucked from any tree the birds would roost upon, without their own consent. He offered that the birds might constantly make their own laws, and annually choose their own rulers. He offered that all strange birds might be made incapable of a seat in their council. He offered that it should be made impossible for any to disturb the birds in singing of their songs to the praise of their Maker, for which they had sought liberty in the wilderness. Finally, he offered that the king's-fisher should have his commission to be their governor until they had settled what good orders among them they pleased, and that he should be more concerned than ever now to defend them from the French kites that were abroad. The king's-fisher indeed was to have his negative upon the birds, but the birds were to have a negative too upon the king's-fisher, and this was a privilege beyond what was enjoyed by the birds in any of their plantations, or even in Ireland itself.

The birds, not being agreed in their opinion, resolved that they would refer it to reasonable creatures to advise them upon this question—which of these was to be chosen, but when the reasonable creatures heard the question, they all declared none that had any reason could make any question of it.

AN ADDITIONAL STORY OF THE DOGS AND THE WOLVES, THE SUB-STANCE OF WHICH WAS USED, AN HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS AGO BY MELANCTHON, TO UNITE THE PROTESTANTS

THE wolves and the dogs were going to meet each other in a battle, upon a certain old quarrel that was between them, and the wolves, that they might know the strength of the dogs aforehand, sent forth a scout.

The scout returned and informed the wolves that the dogs were more numerous than they Nevertheless he bid them not be discouraged, for the dogs were not only divided into three or four several bodies, which had little disposition to help one another, but also they were very quarrelsome among themselves One party was for having the army formed one way, and another party another Some were not satisfied in their commanders, and the commanders themselves had their emulations Nor did they want those among them that accounted it more necessary to lie down where they were and hunt and kill fleas than march forth to subdue wolves abroad In short, there was little among them but snapping and snarling at one another 'And therefore,' said he, 'monsieurs, let's have at them We shall easily play the wolf upon them that have played the dog upon one another'

This is a story so old that, as the good man said, I hope it is not true

FROM MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA <sup>1</sup>

A GENERAL INTRODUCTION <sup>2</sup>

Ἐρῶ δὲ τοῦτο τῆς τῶν ἐντευξομένων, ὡφελείας ἕνεκα <sup>30</sup>

Dicam hoc propter utilitatem eorum qui lecturi sunt hoc opus

Theodore <sup>4</sup>

I WRITE the wonders of the Christian religion, flying from the depravations of Europe to the American strand, and, assisted by the holy author of that religion, I do, <sup>40</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Mather wrote in his diary, for July 1693 'And because I foresaw an inexpressible deal of service like to be thereby done for the Church of God, not only here but abroad in Europe, I formed a design to endeavor The Church-History of this Country Laying my design before the neighboring ministers, they encouraged it, and accordingly I set myself to cry mightily unto the Lord that if my undertaking herein might be for His glory, He would grant me his assistance in it' 'Diary of Cotton Mather,' Mass Hist Soc Coll, 7th Series, VII, 166 The task, actually begun later in the year, was more or less completed in 1697 Much of the Magnalia consists of earlier of Mather's writings, brought together and filled out In his book he discussed the foundation of the colony, its civil and ecclesiastical leaders, its university, and its spiritual and physical warfare The Magnalia was first published in London in 1702

with all conscience of truth, required therein by Him who is the truth itself, report the wonderful displays of His infinite power, wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness, wherewith His divine providence hath irradiated an Indian wilderness

I relate the considerable matters that produced and attended the first settlement of colonies which have been renowned for the degree of reformation professed and attained by evangelical churches, erected in those ends of the earth, and a field being thus prepared, I proceed unto a relation of the considerable matters which have been acted thereupon

I first introduce the actors that have in a more exemplary manner served those colonies, and give remarkable occurrences in the exemplary lives of many magistrates, and of more ministers, who so lived as to leave unto posterity examples worthy of everlasting remembrance <sup>20</sup>

I add hereunto the notables of the only Protestant university that ever shone in that hemisphere of the New World, with particular instances of Ciriolians in our biography provoking the whole world with virtuous objects of emulation.

I introduce then the actions of a more eminent importance that have signalized those colonies, whether the establishments, directed by their synods, with a rich variety of synodical and ecclesiastical determinations, or the disturbances with which they have been from all sorts of temptations and enemies tempestuated, and the methods by which they have still weathered out each horrible tempest

And into the midst of these actions, I interpose an entire book wherein there is, with all possible veracity, a collection made of memorable occurrences and amazing judgments and mercies befalling many particular persons among the people of New England

Let my readers expect all that I have promised them in this bill of fare, and it may be they will find themselves entertained with yet many other passages, above and beyond their expectation, deserving likewise a room in history, in all which <sup>50</sup>

there will be nothing but the author's too mean way of preparing so great entertainments to reproach the invitation .

Reader! I have done the part of an impartial historian, albeit not without all occasion perhaps for the rule which a worthy writer in his Historica gives to every reader Historici legantur cum moderatione et venia, et cogitetur fieri non posse ut in omnibus circumstantiis Lyncei sint <sup>1</sup> Polybius complains of those historians who always made either the Carthaginians brave and the Romans base, or e contra, in all their actions, as their affection for their own party led them I have endeavored with all good conscience to decline this writing merely for a party, or doing like the dealer in history whom Lucian derides for always calling the captain of his own party an Achilles, but of the adverse party a Thersites, nor have I added unto the just provocations for the complaint made by the Baron Maurier, that the greatest part of histories are but so many panegyrics composed by interested hands, which elevate iniquity to the heavens, like Paterculus and like Machiavel, who propose Tiberius Caesar and Caesar Borgia as examples fit for imitation, whereas true history would have exhibited them as horrid monsters—as very devils 'Tis true, I am not of the opinion that one cannot merit the name of an impartial historian except he write bare matters of fact, without all reflection, for I can tell where to find this given as the definition of history, Historia est rerum gestarum, cum laude aut vituperatione, narratio, <sup>2</sup> and if I am not altogether a Tacitus, when virtues or vices occur to be matters of reflection as well as of relation, I will, for my vindication, appeal to Tacitus himself, whom Lipsius calls one of the prudentest (though Tertullian, long before, counts him the lyingest) of them who have enriched the world with history, he says, Præcipuum munus annalium reor ne virtutes sileantur utque pravis dictis factisque ex posteritate et infamia metus sit <sup>3</sup> I have not commended any person but when I have really judged, not only that he deserved it, but also that it would be a benefit unto posterity to know wherein he deserved it, and my judgment of desert hath not been biassed by persons' being of my own particular judgment in matters of disputation among the churches of God I have been as willing to wear the name of Simplicius Verinus throughout my whole undertaking as he that, before me, hath assumed it, nor am I like Pope Zachary, impatient so much as to hear of any Antipodes The spirit of a Schlüsselbergius, who falls foul with fury and reproach on all who differ from him, the spirit of an Heylin, who seems to count no obloquy too hard for a reformer, and the spirit of those (folio-writers there are, some of them, in the English nation!) whom a noble historian stigmatizes as 'those hot-headed, passionate bigots, from whom 'tis enough if you be of a religion contrary unto theirs to be defamed, condemned, and pursued with a thousand calumnies'—I thank Heaven I hate it with all my heart But how can the lives of the commendable be written without commending them? Or is that law of history, given in one of the eminentest pieces of antiquity we now have in our hands, wholly antiquated, Maxime proprium est historiæ laudem rerum egregie gestarum persequi? <sup>4</sup> Nor have I, on the other side, forborne to mention many censurable things, even in the best of my friends, when the things in my opinion were not good, or so bore away for Placentia, in the course of our story as to pass by Verona, but been mindful of the direction which Polybius gives to the historian, 'It becomes him that writes an history, sometimes to extol enemies in his praises, when their praiseworthy actions bespeak it, and at the same time to reprove the best friends, when their deeds appear worthy of a reproof, inasmuch as history is good for nothing, if truth (which is the very eye of the animal) be not in it' Indeed I have thought it my duty upon all accounts (and if it have proceeded unto the degree of a fault, there is, it may be, something in my temper and nature that has betrayed me therein) to be more sparing and easy in thus mentioning of censurable things than in my other liberty, a writer of church history should, I know, be

<sup>3</sup> 'I regard it as the primary function of history to record virtues, and to instil a fear of that infamy which evil words and deeds will have in the eyes of posterity'

like the buider of the temple, one of the tribe of Naphthali, and for this I will also plead my Polybius in my excuse 'It is not the work of an historian to commemorate the vices and villanies of men so much as their just, their fair, their honest actions, and the readers of history get more good by the objects of their emulation than of their indignation' Nor do I deny that, though I cannot approve the conduct of Josephus (whom Jerome not unjustly nor ineptly calls 'The Greek Livy') when he left out of his Antiquities the story of the golden calf, and I don't wonder to find Chamier, and Rivet, and others taxing him for his partiality towards his countrymen, yet I have left unmentioned some censurable occurrences in the story of our colonies, as things no less unuseful than improper to be raised out of the grave, wherein oblivion hath now buried them, lest I should have incurred the pasquil bestowed upon Pope Urban, who employing a committee to rip up the old errors of his predecessors, one clapped a pair of spurs upon the heels of the statue of St Peter, and a label from the statue of St Paul opposite thereunto, upon the bridge, asked him, 'Whither he was bound?' St Peter answered, 'I apprehend some danger in staying here, I fear they'll call me in question for denying my master' And St Paul replied, 'Nay, then I had best be gone too, for they'll question me also, for persecuting the Christians before my conversion' Briefly, my pen shall reproach none that can give a good word unto any good man that is not of their own faction, and shall fall out with none but those that can agree with nobody else except those of their own schism If I draw any sort of men with charcoal, it shall be because I remember a notable passage of the best queen that ever was in the world, our late Queen Mary Monsieur Jurieu, that he might justify the Reformation in Scotland, made a very black representation of their old Queen Mary, for which a certain sycophant would have incensed our Queen Mary against that reverend person, saying, 'Is it not a shame that this man, without any consideration for your royal person, should dare to throw such infamous calumnies upon a queen from whom your royal highness is descended?' But that excellent princess replied, 'No, not at all, is it not enough that by fulsome praises great persons be lulled asleep all their lives, but must flattery accompany them to their very graves? How should they fear the judgment of posterity, if historians be not allowed to speak the truth after their death?' But whether I do myself commend, or whether I give my reader an opportunity to censure, I am careful above all things to do it with truth, and as I have considered the words of Plato Deum indigne et graviter ferre cum quis ei similem, id est virtute praestantem, vituperet aut laudet contrarium,<sup>1</sup> so I have had the ninth Commandment of a greater lawgiver than Plato to preserve my care of truth from first to last If any mistake have been anywhere committed, it will be found merely circumstantial, and wholly involuntary, and let it be remembered that, though no historian ever merited better than the incomparable Thuanus, yet learned men have said of his work what they never shall truly say of ours, that it contains multa falsissima et indigna <sup>2</sup> I find Erasmus himself mistaking one man for two when writing of the ancients And even our own English writers too are often mistaken, and in matters of a very late importance, as Baker and Heylin and Fuller (professed historians) tell us that Richard Sutton, a single man, founded the Charterhouse, whereas his name was Thomas, and he was a married man I think I can recite such mistakes, it may be sans number, occurring in the most credible writers, yet I hope I shall commit none such But although I thus challenge, as my due, the character of an impartial, I doubt I may not challenge that of an elegant historian I cannot say whether the style wherein this church history is written will please the modern critics, but if I seem to have used ἀπλουσάτης συντάξει γραφῆς a simple, submiss, humble style, 'tis the same that Eusebius affirms to have been used by Hegesippus, who, as far as we understand, was the first author (after Luke) that ever composed an entire body of ecclesiastical history, which he divided into five books,

1 'That God considers it a serious offence, and one unworthy of Him, when someone condemns a man who is like Him (that is, outstanding in virtue), or praises the opposite'

2 'Much that is very false and unworthy' and entitled ὑπομνήματα τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραξεων <sup>1</sup> Whereas others, it may be, will reckon the style embellished with too much of ornament by the multiplied references to other and former concerns, closely couched, for the observation of the attentive, in almost every paragraph, but I must confess that I am of his mind who said, Sicuti sal modice cibis aspersus condit et gra-tiam saporis addit, ita, si paulum antiquitatis admiscueris, oratio fit venustior <sup>2</sup> And I have seldom seen that way of writing faulted but by those who, for a certain odd reason, sometimes find fault that the grapes are not ripe These embellishments (of which yet I only veniam pro laude peto <sup>3</sup>) are not the puerile spoils of Polyanthea's, but I should have asserted them to be as choice flowers as most that occur in ancient or modern writings, almost unavoidably putting themselves into the author's hand while about his work, if those words of Ambrose had not a little frightened me, as well as they did Baronius Unumquemque fallunt sua scripta <sup>4</sup> I observe that learned men have been so terrified by the reproaches of pedantry, which little smatterers at reading and learning have by their quoting humors brought upon themselves, that, for to avoid all approaches towards that which those feeble creatures have gone to imitate, the best way of writing has been most injuriously deserted But what shall we say? The best way of writing under heaven shall be the worst, when Erasmus his monosyllable tyrant will have it so! And if I should have resigned myself wholly to the judgment of others what way of writing to have taken, the story of the two statues made by Polyclitus tells me what may have been the issue he contrived one of them according to the rules that best pleased himself, and the other according to the fancy of every one that looked upon his work, the former was afterwards applauded by all, and the latter derided by those very persons who had given their directions for it . . .

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM BRADFORD, ESQ.; GOVERNOR OF PLYMOUTH COLONY <sup>6</sup>

*Omnium somnos illius vigilantia defendit, omnium otium illius labor, omnium delicias illius industria, omnium vacationem illius

It has been a matter of some observation that, although Yorkshire be one of the largest shires in England, yet, for all the fires of martyrdom which were kindled in the days of Queen Mary, it afforded no more fuel than one poor leaf, namely, John Leaf, an apprentice, who suffered for the doctrine of the Reformation at the same time and stake with the famous John Bradford But when the reign of Queen Elizabeth would not admit the reformation of worship to proceed unto those degrees which were proposed and pursued by no small number of the faithful in those days, Yorkshire was not the least of the shires in England that afforded suffering witnesses thereunto The churches there gathered were quickly molested with such a raging persecution that if the spirit of separation in them did carry them unto a further extreme than it should have done, one blamable cause thereof will be found in the extremity of that persecution Their troubles made that cold country too hot for them, so that they were under a necessity to seek a retreat in the low countries, and yet the watchful malice and fury of their adversaries rendered it almost impossible for them to find what they sought For them to leave their native soil, their lands, and their friends, and go into a pen of an historian can be better employed than in reporting the virtuous tempers and actions of the men that have therein shown forth the virtues of our blessed Redeemer, and been the epistles of Christ unto the rest of mankind Nor indeed has mankind generally found any sort of history more useful and men that have been distinguished by an excellent such an history Mather, Parentator (Boston, 1724), ii of all, his industry, the pleasures of all, his diligence, the leisure of all'

strange place where they must hear foreign language, and live meanly and hardly and in other employments than that of husbandry wherein they had been educated, these must needs have been such discouragements as could have been conquered by none save those who sought first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof. But that which would have made these discouragements the more unconquerable unto an ordinary faith was the terrible zeal of their enemies to guard all ports, and search all ships, that none of them should be carried off. I will not relate the sad things of this kind then seen and felt by this people of God, but only exemplify those trials with one short story. Divers of this people having hired a Dutchman then lying at Hull to carry them over to Holland, he promised faithfully to take them in between Grimsby and Hull, but they coming to the place a day or two too soon, the appearance of such a multitude alarmed the officers of the town adjoining, who came with a great body of soldiers to seize upon them. Now it happened that one boat full of men had been carried aboard, while the women were yet in a bark that lay aground in a creek at low water. The Dutchman, perceiving the storm that was thus beginning ashore, swore by the sacrament that he would stay no longer for any of them, and so taking the advantage of a fair wind then blowing, he put out to sea for Zealand. The women thus left near Grimsby Common, bereaved of their husbands, who had been hurried from them, and forsaken of their neighbors, of whom none durst in this fright stay with them, were a very rueful spectacle, some crying for fear, some shaking for cold, all dragged by troops of armed and angry men from one justice to another, till not knowing what to do with them they c'en dismissed them to shift as well as they could for themselves. But by their singular afflictions, and by their Christian behaviors, the cause for which they exposed themselves did gain considerably. In the meantime, the men at sea found reason to be glad that their families were not with them, for they were surprized with an horrible tempest, which held them for fourteen days together, in seven whereof they saw not sun, moon, or star, but were driven upon the coast of Norway. The mariners often despaired of life, and once with doleful shrieks gave over all, as thinking the vessel was foundered, but the vessel rose again, and when the mariners with sunk hearts often cried out, 'We sink! We sink!' the passengers without such distraction of mind, even while the water was running into their mouths and ears, would cheerfully shout, 'Yet, Lord, Thou canst save! Yet, Lord Thou canst save!' And the Lord accordingly brought them at last safe unto their desired haven, and not long after helped their distressed relations thither after them, where indeed they found upon almost all accounts a new world, but a world in which they found that they must live like strangers and pilgrims.

Among those devout people was our William Bradford, who was born Anno 1588 in an obscure village called Austerfield, where the people were as unacquainted with the Bible as the Jews do seem to have been with part of it in the days of Josiah, a most ignorant and licentious people, and like unto their priest. Here, and in some other places, he had a comfortable inheritance left him of his honest parents, who died while he was yet a child, and cast him on the education, first of his grandparents, and then of his uncles, who devoted him, like his ancestors, unto the affairs of husbandry. Soon a long sickness kept him, as he would afterwards thankfully say, from the vanities of youth, and made him the fitter for what he was afterwards to undergo. When he was about a dozen years old, the reading of the Scriptures began to cause great impressions upon him, and those impressions were much assisted and improved when he came to enjoy Mr. Richard Clifton's illuminating ministry, not far from his abode, he was then also further befriended by being brought into the company and fellowship of such as were then called professors, though the young man that brought him into it did after become a profane and wicked apostate. Nor could the wrath of his uncles, nor the scoff of his neighbors now turned upon him, as one of the Puritans, divert him from his pious inclinations.

At last beholding how fearfully the evangelical and apostolical church form, whereinto the churches of the primitive times were cast by the good spirit of God, had been deformed by the apostasy of the succeeding times, and what little progress the Reformation had yet made in many parts of Christendom towards its recovery, he set himself by reading, by discourse, by prayer, to learn whether it was not his duty to withdraw from the communion of the parish assemblies, and engage with some society of the faithful that should keep close unto the written word of God as the rule of their worship. And after many distresses of mind concerning it, he took up a very deliberate and understanding resolution of doing so, which resolution he cheerfully prosecuted, although the provoked rage of his friends tried all the ways imaginable to reclaim him from it, unto all whom his answer was 'Were I like to endanger my life, or consume my estate by any ungodly courses, your counsels to me were very seasonable, but you know that I have been diligent and provident in my calling, and not only desirous to augment what I have, but also to enjoy it in your company, to part from which will be as great a cross as can befall me. Nevertheless, to keep a good conscience, and walk in such a way as God has prescribed in His Word, is a thing which I must prefer before you all, and above life itself. Wherefore, since 'tis for a good cause that I am like to suffer the disasters which you lay before me, you have no cause to be either angry with me, or sorry for me, yea, I am not only willing to part with every thing that is dear to me in this world for this cause, but I am also thankful that God has given me an heart so to do, and will accept me so to suffer for Him.' Some lamented him, some derided him, all dissuaded him, nevertheless the more they did it, the more fixed he was in his purpose to seek the ordinances of the Gospel where they should be dispensed with most of the commanded purity, and the sudden deaths of the chief relations which thus lay at him quickly after convinced him what a folly it had been to have quitted his profession in expectation of any satisfaction from them. So to Holland he attempted a removal.

Having with a great company of Christians hired a ship to transport them for Holland, the master perfidiously betrayed them into the hands of those persecutors who rifled and ransacked their goods and clapped their persons into prison at Boston, where they lay for a month together. But

Mr Bradford, being a young man of about eighteen, was dismissed sooner than the rest, so that within a while he had opportunity with some others to get over to Zealand, through perils both by land and sea not inconsiderable, where he was not long ashore ere a viper seized on his hand, that is, an officer, who carried him unto the magistrates, unto whom an envious passenger had accused him as having fled out of England. When the magistrates understood the true cause of his coming thither, they were well satisfied with him, and so he repaired joyfully unto his brethren at Amsterdam, where the difficulties to which he afterwards stooped in learning and serving of a Frenchman at the working of silks were abundantly compensated by the delight wherewith he sat under the shadow of our Lord in His purely dispensed ordinances. At the end of two years, he did, being of age to do it, convert his estate in England into money, but setting up for himself, he found some of his designs by the providence of God frowned upon, which he judged a correction bestowed by God upon him for certain decays of internal piety, whereto he had fallen, the consumption of his estate he thought came to prevent a consumption in his virtue. But after he had resided in Holland about half a score years, he was one of those who bore a part in that hazardous and generous enterprise of removing into New England, with part of the English church at Leyden, where at their first landing his dearest consort, accidentally falling overboard, was drowned in the harbor, and the rest of his days were spent in the services, and the temptations, of that American wilderness.

Here was Mr Bradford in the year 1621, unanimously chosen the governor of the plantation, the difficulties whereof were such that, if he had not been a person of more than ordinary piety, wisdom and courage, he must have sunk under them. He had with a laudable industry been laying up a treasure of experiences, and he had now occasion to use it, indeed, nothing but an experienced man could have been suitable to the necessities of the people. The potent nations of the Indians, into whose country they were come, would have cut them off, if the blessing of God upon his conduct had not quelled them, and if his prudence, justice, and moderation had not overruled them, they had been ruined by their own distempers. One specimen of his demeanor is to this day particularly spoken of. A company of young fellows that were newly arrived were very unwilling to comply with the Governor's order for working abroad on the public account, and therefore on Christmas Day, when he had called upon them, they excused themselves with a pretence that it was against their conscience to work such a day. The Governor gave them no answer, only that he would spare them till they were better informed, but by and by he found them all at play in the street, sporting themselves with various diversions, whereupon, commanding the instruments of their games to be taken from them, he effectually gave them to understand that it was against his conscience that they should play whilst others were at work, and that if they had any devotion to the day, they should show it at home in the exercises of religion, and not in the streets with pastime and frolics, and thus gentle reproof put a final stop to all such disorders for the future.

For two years together after the beginning of the colony, whereof he was now governor, the poor people had a great experiment of man's not living by bread alone, for when they were left all together without one morsel of bread for many months one after another, still the good providence of God relieved them, and supplied them, and this for the most part out of the sea. In this low condition of affairs, there was no little exercise for the prudence and patience of the Governor, who cheerfully bore his part in all, and, that industry might not flag, he quickly set himself to settle property among the new planters, foreseeing that while the whole colony labored upon a common stock, the husbandry and business of the plantation could not flourish, as Plato and others long since dreamed that it would if a community were established. Certainly, if the spirit which dwelt in the old Puritans had not inspired these new planters, they had sunk under the burden of these difficulties, but our Bradford had a double portion of that spirit.

The plantation was quickly thrown into a storm that almost overwhelmed it by the unhappy actions of a minister sent over from England by the adventurers concerned for the plantation, but by the blessing of Heaven on the conduct of the Governor, they weathered out that storm. Only the adventurers, hereupon breaking to pieces, threw up all their concerns with the infant colony, whereof they gave this as one reason, that the planters dissembled with his majesty and their friends in their petition, wherein they declared for a church discipline agreeing with the French and others of the reforming churches in Europe, whereas 'twas now urged that they had admitted into their communion a person who at his admission utterly renounced the churches of England (which person, by the way, was that very man who had made the complaints against them); and therefore, though they denied the name of Brownists, yet they were the thing. In answer hereunto, the very words written by the Governor were these: 'Whereas you tax us with dissembling about the French discipline, you do us wrong, for we both hold and practice the discipline of the French and other reformed churches (as they have published the same in the harmony of confessions) according to our means, in effect and substance. But whereas you would tie us up to the French discipline in every circumstance, you derogate from the liberty we have in Christ Jesus. The Apostle Paul would have none to follow him in any thing but wherein he follows Christ, much less ought any Christian or church in the world to do it. The French may err, we may err, and other churches may err, and doubtless do in many circumstances. That honor therefore belongs only to the infallible Word of God and pure Testament of Christ, to be propounded and followed as the only rule and pattern for direction herein to all churches and Christians. And it is too great arrogancy for any men or church to think that he or they have so sounded the Word of God unto the bottom as precisely to set down the churches' discipline without error in substance or circumstance, that no other without blame may digress or differ in any thing from the same. And it is not difficult to show that the reformed churches differ in many circumstances among themselves.' By which words it appears how far he was free from that rigid spirit of separation which broke to pieces the Separatists themselves in the low countries, unto the great scandal of the reforming churches. He was indeed a person of a well-tempered spirit; or else it had been scarce possible for him to have kept the affairs of Plymouth in so good a temper for thirty-seven years together, in every one of which he was chosen their governor except the three years wherein Mr Winslow, and the two years wherein Mr Prince, at the choice of the people, took a turn with him

The leader of a people in a wilderness had need be a Moses, and if a Moses had not led the people of Plymouth colony, when this worthy person was their governor, the people had never with so much unanimity and importunity still called him to lead them. Among many instances thereof, let this one piece of self-denial be told for a memorial of him, wheresoever this history shall be considered. The patent of the colony was taken in his name, running in these terms 'To William Bradford, his heirs, associates and assigns', but when the number of the freemen was much increased, and many new townships erected, the general court there desired of Mr Bradford that he would make a surrender of the same into their hands, which he willingly and presently assented unto, and confirmed it according to their desire by his hand and seal, reserving no more for himself than was his proportion, with others, by agreement. But as he found the providence of Heaven many ways recompensing his many acts of self-denial, so he gave this testimony to the faithfulness of the divine promises that he had forsaken friends, houses, and lands for the sake of the gospel, and the Lord gave them him again. Here he prospered in his estate, and besides a worthy son which he had by a former wife, he had also two sons and a daughter by another, whom he married in this land

He was a person for study as well as action, and hence, notwithstanding the difficulties through which he passed in his youth, he attained unto a notable skill in languages, the Dutch tongue was become almost as vernacular to him as the English; the French tongue he could also manage, the Latin and the Greek he had mastered, but the Hebrew he most of all studied, because, he said, he would see with his own eyes the ancient oracles of God in their native beauty. He was also well skilled in history, in antiquity, and in philosophy, and for theology he became so versed in it that he was an irrefragable disputant against the errors, especially those of Anabaptism, which with trouble he saw rising in his colony, wherefore he wrote some significant things for the confutation of those errors. But the crown of all was his holy, prayerful, watchful, and fruitful walk with God, wherein he was very exemplary

At length he fell into an indisposition of body which rendered him unhealthy for a whole winter, and as the spring advanced, his health declined, yet he felt himself not what he counted sick, till one day, in the night after which, the God of Heaven so filled his mind with ineffable consolations that he seemed little short of Paul, rapt up unto the unutterable entertainments of paradise. The next morning he told his friends that the good spirit of God had given him a pledge of his happiness in another world, and the first fruits of his eternal glory, and on the day following he died, May 9, 1657, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, lamented by all the colonies of New England as a common blessing and father to them all diately dispatched unto Sagadahock by the charitable compassions of the more southward neighbors, with effects to accomplish it, happily effected the redemption of many that were taken captives at York. But the rest of the people in that broken town talking of drawing off the government, sent Captain Converse and Captain Greenleaf with such encouragements unto them to keep their station as prevailed with 'em still to stand their ground. In February, Major Hutchinson was made commander-in-chief, and forces under the command of Captain Converse, Captain Floyd, and Captain Thaxter were by him so prudently posted on the frontiers that by maintaining a continual communication it became a difficult thing for the enemy to make any more approaches. Lieutenant Wilson particularly hearing of a man shot at in Quochecho Woods, went out with a scout of about eighteen men, who came upon the Indians that had shot at the man, and killed and wounded all but one of the whole company. But now, reader, the longest day in the year is to come on, and, if I mistake not, the bravest act in the war fell out upon it. Modockawando is now come, according to his promise a twelve-month ago. Captain Converse was lodged in Storer's garrison at Wells with but fifteen men, and there came into Wells two sloops, with a shallop, which had aboard supplies of ammunition for the soldiers, and contribution for the needy. The cattle this day came frightened and bleeding out of the woods, which was a more certain omen of Indians a-coming than all the prodigies that Livy reports of the 'sacrificed oxen.' Converse cluded in the Magnalia. The book is an account of the ten years battle with the Indians to the north, from 1688-1698. In his dedication, Mather wrote: "The history is indeed of no very fine thread, and the readers who everywhere fish for nothing but carps, and who love, like Augustus, to tax all the world may find fault enough with it. Nevertheless, while the fault of an untruth can't be found in it, the author pretends that the famous history of the Trojan War itself comes behind our little history of the Indian War, for the best antiquaries have now confused Homer, the walls of Troy were, it seems, all made of poet's paper, and the siege of the town, with the tragedies of the wooden horse, were all but a piece of poetry. And if a war between us and a handful of Indians do appear no more than a Batrachomyomachia [The Battle of the Frogs and Mice, a parody of Homer's epic] to the world abroad, yet unto us at home it hath been considerable enough to make an history." Magnalia Christi Americana (Hartford, 1820), II, 503-04.

immediately issued out his commands unto all quarters, but especially to the sloops just then arrived. The sloops were commanded by Samuel Storer and James Gouge, and Gouge's being two miles up the river, he wisely brought her down undiscovered unto Storer's, by the advantage of a mist then prevailing. A careful night they had on't! The next morning before daylight, one John Diamond, a stranger that came in the shallop on a visit, came to Captain Converse's garrison, where the watch invited him in, but he chose rather to go aboard the sloops, which were little more than a gun-shot off, and, alas! the enemy issuing out from their lurking-places, immediately seized him, and haled him away by the hair of the head (in spite of all the attempts used by the garrison to recover him) for an horrible story to be told by and by concerning him. The general of the enemies' army was Monsieur Burniff, and one Monsieur Labocree was a principal commander (the enemy said he was Lieutenant General), there were also divers other Frenchmen of quality, accompanied with Modockawando, and Moxus, and Egere-met, and Warumbo, and several more Indian sagamores, the army made up in all about five hundred men, or fierce things in the shape of men, all to encounter fifteen men in one little garrison, and about fifteen more men (worthily called such!) in a couple of open sloops. Diamond having informed them how 'twas in all points (only that for fifteen by a mistake he said thirty), they fell to dividing the persons and plunder, and agreeing that such an English captain should be slave to such a one, and such a gentleman in the town should serve such a one, and his wife be a maid of honor to such or such a squaw proposed, and Mr Wheelwright (instead of being a worthy counsellor of the province, which he now is!) was to be servant of such a netop, and the sloops, with their stores, to be so and so parted among them. There wanted but one thing to consummate the whole matter, even the chief thing of all, which I suppose they had not thought of, that was, for Heaven to deliver all this prize into their hands, but alter statutum est in caelo! A man habited like a gentleman made a speech to them in English, exhorting 'em to courage and assuring

1 'It was ordered otherwise in heaven'

'em that, if they would courageously fall upon the English, all was their own. The speech being ended, they fell to the work, and with an horrid shout and shot, made their assault upon the feeble garrison, but the English answered with a brisk volley, and sent such a leaden shower among them, that they retired from the garrison to spend the storm of their fury upon the sloops.

You must know that Wells' harbor is rather a creek than a river, for 'tis very narrow and at low water in many places dry, nevertheless, where the vessels ride it is deep enough, and so far off the bank that there is from thence no leaping aboard. But our sloops were sorely incommoded by a turn of the creek, where the enemy could lie out of danger so near 'em as to throw mud aboard with their hands. The enemy was also privileged with a great heap of plank lying on the bank, and with an haystack which they strengthened with the posts and rails, and from all these places they poured in their vengeance upon the poor sloops, while they so placed smaller parties of their savages as to make it impossible for any of the garrisons to afford 'em any relief. Lying thus within a dozen yards of the sloops, they did with their fire-arrows divers times desperately set the sloops on fire, but the brave defendants, with a swab at the end of a rope tied unto a pole and so dipped into the water, happily put the fire out. In brief, the sloops gave the enemy so brave a repulse that at night they retreated, when they renewed their assault, finding that their fortitude would not assure the success of the assault unto them, they had recourse unto their policy. First, an Indian comes on with a slab for a shield before him, when a shot from one of the sloops pierced the slab, which fell down instead of a tombstone with the dead Indian under it, on which, as little a fellow as he was, I know not whether some will not reckon it proper to inscribe the epitaph which the Italians use to bestow upon their dead popes: 'When the dog is dead, all his malice is dead with him.' Their next stratagem was this: they brought out of the woods a kind of a cart, which they trimmed and rigged and fitted up into a thing that might be called a chariot, whereupon they built a platform, shot-proof in the front, and placed many men upon the platform. Such an engine they understood how to shape, without having read (I suppose) the description of the pluteus in Vegetus! Thus chariot they pushed on towards the sloops till they were got, it may be, within fifteen yards of them, when, lo! one of their wheels, to their admiration, sunk into the ground. A Frenchman stepping to heave the wheel with an helpful shoulder, Storer shot him down, another stepping to the wheel, Storer with a well-placed shot sent him after his mate, so the rest thought it was best to let it stand as it was. The enemy kept galling the sloop from their several batteries, and calling 'em to surrender, with many fine promises to make them happy, which ours answered with a just laughter, that had now and then a mortiferous bullet at the end of it. The tide rising, the chariot overset, so that the men behind it lay open to the sloops, which immediately dispensed an horrible slaughter among them, and they that could get away got as fast and as far off as they could. In the night the enemy had much discourse with the sloops, they inquired who were the commanders, and the English gave an answer, which in some other cases and places would have been too true, that they had a great many commanders, but the Indians replied, 'You lie! You have none but Converse, and we will have him too before morning!' They also, knowing that the magazine was in the garrison, lay under an hillside, pelting at that by times, but Captain Converse once in the night sent out three or four of his men into a field of wheat for a shot, if they could get one. There seeing a black heap lying together, ours all at once let fly upon them a shot that slew several of them that were thus 'caught in the corn,' and made the rest glad that they were able to run for it. Captain Converse was this while in much distress about a scout of six men which he had sent forth to Newichawannick the morning before the arrival of the enemy, ordering them to return the day following. The scout returned into the very mouth of the enemy that lay before the garrison, but the corporal having his wits about him called out aloud (as if he had seen Captain Converse making a sally forth upon 'em) 'Captain, wheel about your men round the hill, and we shall catch 'em, there are but a few rogues of 'em' upon which the Indians, imagining that

Captain Converse had been at their heels, betook themselves to their heels, and our folks got safe into another garrison. On the Lord's Day morning there was for a while a deep silence among the assailants, but at length, getting into a body, they marched with great formality towards the garrison, where the captain ordered his handful of men to lie snug, and not to make a shot until every shot might be likely to do some execution. While they thus beheld a formidable crew of dragons, coming with open mouth upon them to swallow them up at a mouthful, one of the soldiers began to speak of surrendering, upon which the captain vehemently protested that he would lay the man dead who should so much as mutter that base word any more! and so they heard no more on it, but the valiant Storer was put upon the like protestation to keep 'em in good fighting trim aboard the sloops also. The enemy, now approaching very near, gave three shouts that made the earth ring again, and crying out in English, 'Fire, and fall on, brave boys!' the whole body, drawn into three ranks, fired at once. Captain Converse immediately ran into the several flankers, and made their best guns fire at such a rate that several of the enemy fell, and the rest of 'em disappeared almost as nimbly as if there had been so many spectres, particularly a parcel of them got into a small deserted house, which having but a boardwall to it, the captain sent in after them those bullets of twelve to the pound, that made the house too hot for them that could get out of it. The women in the garrison on this occasion took up the Amazonian stroke, and not only brought ammunition to the men, but also with a manly resolution fired several times upon the enemy. The enemy, finding that things would not yet go to their minds at the garrison, drew off to try their skill upon the sloops, which lay still abreast in the creek, lashed fast one to another. They built a great fire-work, about eighteen or twenty foot square, and filled it up with combustible matter which they fired, and then they set it in the way for the tide now to float it up unto the sloops, which had now nothing but an horrible death before them. Nevertheless their demands of both the garrison and the sloops to yield themselves were answered no otherwise than with death upon many of them, spit from the guns of the besieged. Having towed their fire-work as far as they durst, they committed it unto the tide, but the distressed Christians that had this deadly fire swimming along upon the water towards them, committed it unto God; and God looked from heaven upon them in this prodigious article of their distress. 'These poor men cried, and the Lord heard them, and saved them out of their troubles.' The wind, unto their astonishment, immediately turn'd about, and with a fresh gale drove the machine ashore on the other side, and split it so that, the water being let in upon it, the fire went out. So the godly men that saw God from heaven thus fighting for them cried out with an astonishing joy, 'If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, they had swallowed us up quick! Blessed be the Lord, who hath not given us a prey to their teeth, our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers!' The enemy were now in a pifful pickle with toiling and moiling in the mud, and blackened with it, if mud could add blackness to such miscreants, and their ammunition was pretty well exhausted, so that now they began to draw off in all parts, and with rafts get over the river, some whereof breaking, there did not a few cool their late heat by falling into it. But first they made all the spoil they could upon the cattle about the town, and giving one shot more at the sloops, they killed the only man of ours that was killed aboard 'em. Then, after about half an hour's consultation, they sent a flag of truce to the garrison, advising 'em with much flattery to surrender, but the captain sent 'em word that he wanted for nothing but for men to come and fight him. The Indian replied unto Captain Converse, 'Being you are so stout, why don't you come and fight in the open field like a man, and not fight in a garrison like a squaw?' The captain rejoined, 'What a fool are you! Do you think thirty men a match for five hundred? No,' (says the captain, counting, as well he might, each of his fifteen men to be as good as two!) 'come with your thirty men upon the plain, and I will meet you with my thirty as soon as you will.' Upon this the Indian answered, 'Nay, me own English fashion is all one fool: you kill me, me kill you! No, better lie somewhere and shoot a man, and he no see! that the best soldier!" Then they fell to coaxing the captain with as many fine words as the fox in the fable had for the allurements of his prey unto him; and urged mightily that Ensign Hill, who stood with the flag of truce, might stand a little nearer their army. The captain, for a good reason, to be presently discerned, would not allow that, whereupon they fell to threatening and raging, like so many defeated devils, using these words: "Damn ye, we'll cut you as small as tobacco before tomorrow morning." The captain bid 'em to make haste, for he 'wanted work', so the Indian, throwing his flag on the ground, ran away, and Ensign Hill, nimbly stripping his flag, ran into the valley, but the savages presently fired from an ambushment behind an hill, near the place where they had urged for a parley.

And now for poor John Diamond! The enemy retreating (which opportunity the sloops took to burn down the dangerous haystack) into the plain, out of gunshot, they fell to torturing their captive, John Diamond, after a manner very diabolical. They stripped him, they scalped him alive, and after a castration, they finished that article in the punishment of traitors upon him, they slit him with knives between his fingers and his toes, they made cruel gashes in the most fleshy parts of his body, and stuck the gashes with fire-brands which were afterwards found sticking in the wounds. Thus they butchered one poor Englishman with all the fury that they would have spent upon them all, and performed an exploit for five hundred furies to brag of at their coming home. Ghastly to express! What was it then to suffer? They returned then unto the garrison, and kept firing at it now and then till near ten o'clock at night, when they all marched off, leaving behind 'em some of their dead, whereof one was Monsieur Labocree, who had about his neck a pouch with about a dozen reliques ingeniously made up, and a printed paper of indulgences, and several other implements, and, no doubt, thought himself in as good safety as if he had all the spells of Lapland about him; but it seems none of the amulets about his neck would save him from a mortal shot in the head. Thus in forty-eight hours was finished an action as worthy to be related as perhaps any that occurs in our story. And it was not long before the valiant Gouge, who bore his part in this action, did another that was not much inferior to it, when he suddenly recovered from the French a valuable prey which they had newly taken upon our coast.

I doubt, reader, we have had this article of our history a little too long. We will finish it when we have remarked that, albeit there were too much feebleness discovered by my countrymen in some of their actions during this war at sea, as well as on shore, yet several of their actions, especially at sea, deserve to be remembered. And I cannot but particularly bespeak a remembrance for the exploit performed by some of my neighbors in a vessel going into Barbados. They were in sight of Barbados assaulted by a French vessel, which had a good number of guns and between sixty and seventy hands. Our vessel had four guns and eight fighting men (truly such!), with two tawny servants. The names of these men were Barret, Sunderland, Knoles, Nash, Morgan, Fosdyke, and two more that I now forget. A desperate engagement ensued, wherein our eight mariners managed the matter with such bravery that by the help of Heaven they killed between thirty and forty of the French assailants, without losing one of their own little number, and they sank the French vessel which lay by their side, out of which they took twenty-seven prisoners, whereof some were wounded, and all were crying for quarter. In the fight, the French pennant being by the wind fastened about the topmast of the English vessel, it was torn off by the sinking of the French vessel and left pleasantly flying there. So they sailed into Barbados, where the assembly voted them one public acknowledgment of their courage and conduct in this brave action. And our history now gives them another

FROM ESSAYS TO DO GOOD

AN ESSAY FOR GENTLEMEN<sup>1</sup>

I HOPE we are now ready for proposals. We shall set ourselves to devise liberal things.

<sup>1</sup> The selection, of which the text has been modernized and the title supplied by the editors, is from Bonifacius, or Essays to do Good (Boston, 1710), 144-51. It was of the Essays to do Good that Franklin wrote in 1784 to Mather's son, "If I have been, as you seem to think, a useful citizen, the public owes the advantage of it to

There is a city in the world where every house hath a box hanging on a chain, on which is written, 'Think on the poor', and they commonly conclude no bargain, but more or less is put into the box The deacons have the key, and, once a quarter, go round the city and take out the money When that city was like to have been lost, one who was not the best man in the world yet could say that he was of opinion God would preserve that city from being destroyed, if it were only for the great charity they express to the poor 'Tis the richest city of the richest country, for its bigness, that ever was in the world, a city that it is thought spends yearly in charitable uses more than all the revenues which the whole fine country of the Grand Duke of Tuscany brings in to the arbitrary master of it You know, Manus pauperum est Christi gazophylacium<sup>4</sup>

When you dispense your alms unto the poor, who know what it is to pray, you may oblige them to pray for you, by name, every day 'Tis an excellent thing to have the blessing of them that have been ready to perish, thus coming upon you Behold a surprising sense in which you may be praying always! You are so even while you are sleeping, if those whom you have so obliged are thus praying for you And now, look for the accomplishment of that word 'Blessed is he that considers the poor, the Lord will preserve him and keep him alive, and he shall be blessed on the earth'

Very often your alms are dispersed among such as very much need admonitions of piety to accompany them Can't you contrive to intermix a spiritual charity with your temporal? Perhaps you may discourse with them about the state of their souls, and obtain from them, which you now have a singular advantage to do, some declared resolutions to do what they ought to do Or else you may convey little books unto them, which certainly they will promise to read, when you thus bespeak their doing so

Charity to the souls of men is undoubtedly the highest and the noblest charity, and of the greatest consequence To furnish the poor with catechisms and Bibles is to do an unknown deal of good unto them To publish and scatter books of piety, and to put into the hands of mankind such treasures of divinity as may have a tendency 10 to make them wiser or better no man knows what good he does in doing such things! It was excellently done of some good men, who, a little while ago were at the charge of printing thirty thousand of the Alarm to the Unconverted, written by Joseph Alleine, to be all given away unto such as would promise to read it A man of no great estate has before now, with no great trouble, given away the best part of a 20 thousand books of piety every year, for many years together Who can tell but with the expense of less than a shilling, sir, you may convert a sinner from the error of his way, and save a soul from death A worse doom than a damnatio ad metalla<sup>1</sup> is upon the soul who had rather hoard up his money than employ it on such a charity

He that supports the office of the evangelical ministry, supports a good work, and performs one, yea, at the second hand, performs what is done by the skilful, faithful, painful minister,—and that is many a one! The encouraged servant of the Lord will do the more good for your assistances 'Tis done for a glorious Christ, what you have done for him, and in consideration of the glorious Gospel preached by him And you shall receive a prophet's reward! Luther said, Si quid scholasticus confers, Deo ipsi contulisti<sup>2</sup> 'Tis more sensibly so 40 when the scholars are become godly and useful preachers

I have read this passage 'It was for several years the practice of a worthy gentleman, in renewing his leases, instead of making it a condition that his tenants should keep a hawk or a dog for him, to oblige them that they should keep a bible in their houses for themselves, and should bring up their children to read and be catechized' Landlords, 'tis worth your considering whether you may not in your leases insert some clauses that may serve the kingdom of God You are His tenants in those very freeholds where you are landlords to other men! Oblige your tenants to worship God in their families.

To take a poor child, especially an orphan left in poverty, and bestow an education upon it, especially if it be a liberal education, is an admirable and a complicated 10 charity, yea, it may draw on a long train of good, and interest you in all the good that shall be done by those whom you have educated

Hence, also, what is done for schools, and for colleges, and for hospitals is done for a general good The endowing of these, or the maintaining of them is at once to do good unto many

But, alas! how much of the silver and gold in the world is buried in hands where 20 'tis little better than conveyed back to the mines from whence it came! Or employed unto as little purpose as what arrives at Hindustan, where a large part of the silver and gold of the world is, after a circulation, carried as unto a fatal center, and by the moguls lodged in subterraneous caves never to see the light any more Taha non facit bonæ fidei ac spei Christianus<sup>3</sup>

Sometimes there may be got ready for the press elaborate composures of great bulk and greater worth, by which the best interests of knowledge and virtue may be considerably served in the world (perhaps what may be called, as the Octapla of Origen was, opus ecclesiæ<sup>4</sup>) They lie like the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, and there they are like to lie till God inspire some wealthy persons to subscribe nobly 40 for their publication, and by this generous application of their wealth to bring them abroad The names of such noble benefactors to mankind ought to live as long as the works themselves, where the works do any good, what these have done towards the publishing of them ought to be told for a memorial of them<sup>5</sup>

3 'A Christian of good faith and hope does not do such things'

4 'A need of the church'

5 Much seventeenth century American publishing was subsidized in this way The costs of printing the Magnalia were guaranteed by an English Puritan, and it was a bitter disappointment to Mather that his two most elaborate compositions, the Biblia Americana and The Angel of Bethesda, were never published

1 'Sentence to the mines'

2 'What you give to scholars you give to God Himself'

Yea, I will carry the matter further than so The saying may seem to carry some affront in it 'Idle gentlemen and idle beggars are the pests of the commonwealth' But they that are offended must quarrel with the ashes of a bishop 'Twas Dr Sanderson's Will you then think, sirs, of some honorable and agreeable employments? I will mention one The Pythagoreans forbade men's eating their own brains, or keeping their good thoughts to themselves 'Tis an observation of the incomparable Boyle, 'that as to religious books in general, it has been observed that those penned by laymen, and especially gentlemen, have (ceteris paribus<sup>1</sup>) been better entertained and more effectual than those of ecclesiastics' We all know his own were so It is no rare thing for men of quality to accomplish themselves in languages and sciences until they have been prodigies of literature Their libraries, too, have been stupendous collections approaching towards Vatican or Bodleian dimensions An English gentleman has been sometimes the most accomplished thing in the whole world! How many of these (besides a Leigh, a Wolseley, or a Polhill) have been benefactors to mankind by their incomparable writings? It were mightily to be wished that rich men and persons of an elevated condition would qualify themselves for the use of the pen as well as of the sword, and by their pen deserve to have it said of them, they have written excellent things. An English person of quality, in a book of his entitled A View of the Soul, has a passage which I will address you with Says he 'It is certainly the highest dignity if not the greatest happiness human nature is capable of, here in the vale below, to have the soul so far enlightened as to become the mirror, or conduit, or conveyer of God's truth to others' It is an ill motto for men of capacity 'My understanding is unfruitful' Gentlemen, consider what subjects may most properly and usefully fall under your cultivation Your pen will stab atheism and wickedness with an efficacy beyond other men's If out of your tribe there come those who handle the pen of the writer, they will do uncommon execution One of them has ingeniously told you 'Though I know some functions, yet I know no truths of religion

1 'Other things being equal' like the shewbread (Matthew 12 4) only for the priests'

I will address you with one proposal more 'Tis that you would, as Ambrosius had his Origen, wisely choose a friend of shining abilities, of hearty affections, and of excellent piety a minister of such a character, if it may be And entreat him, yea, oblige him to study for you and suggest to you opportunities to do good Make him, as I may say, your monitor Let him advise you from time to time what good you may do Cause him to see that he never gratifies you more than by his advise upon this intention If a David have a seer to do such a good office for him, and be on the lookout for to find out what good he may do, what services may be done for the temple of God in the world!

There seems no need of adding any thing but this When gentlemen occasionally come together, why should not their conversation be agreeable to their superior quality? Methinks they should reckon it beneath people of their quality to employ their conversation with one another on trifling impertinences, or at such a rate that if their discourse were taken down in shorthand by one behind the hangings, they would blush to have it repeated unto them Nihil sed nugæ, et risus, et verba proferuntur in ventum<sup>2</sup> Sirs, it becomes a gentleman to entertain his company with the finest thoughts on the finest themes! But certainly, there cannot be any subject so worthy of a gentleman as this 'What good is there to be done in the world?' Were this noble subject oftener started in the conversation of gentlemen an incredible deal of good would be done

I will conclude with saying, you must come forth to any public service whereof you may be capable when you are called unto it Honest Jeans has a pungent passage 'The world applauds the politic tiredness of those that bury their parts and gifts in an obscure privacy, though both from God and man they have a fair call to public employment But the terrible censure of these men by Christ at the last day will discover them to be the arrantest fools that ever were upon the face of the earth That fault of not employing one's parts for the public, one calls 'a great sacrilege in the temple of the God of Nature' It was a sad age wherein Tacitus tells, Inertia fuit sapientia<sup>1</sup>

2 'Only nonsense and laughter and words are spoken to the winds'

FROM THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHER

OF THE ANATOMY OF PLANTS<sup>2</sup>

THE contrivance of our most glorious Creator in the vegetables growing upon this globe cannot be wisely observed without admiration and astonishment

We will single out some remarkables, and glorify our God . . .

Every particular part of the plant has its astonishing uses The roots give it a stability, and fetch the nourishment into it which lies in the earth ready for it The fibres contain and convey the sap which carries up that nourishment The plant has also larger vessels which entertain the proper and specific juice of it, and others to carry the air for its necessary respiration The outer and inner bark defend it from annoyances and contribute to its augmentation The leaves embrace and preserve the flower and fruit as they come to their explication But the principal use of them, as Malpighi and Perault and Mariotte have observed, is to conduct and prepare the sap for the nourishment of the fruit and of the whole plant, not only that which ascends from the root, but also what they take in from without, from the dew and from the rain For there is a regress of the sap in plants from above downwards, and this descendent juice is that which principally nourishes both fruit and plant, as has been clearly proved by the experiments of Signior Malpighi and Mr Brotherton

1 'Inactivity rated as wisdom'

2 The selection, to which the title has been given by the editors, is from The Christian Philosopher (London, 1721), 122, 125-27 In his introduction, Mather says 'The essays now before us will demonstrate that philosophy is no enemy, but a mighty and wondrous incentive to religion The whole world is indeed a temple of God, built and filled by that Almighty Architect, and in this temple every such one, affecting himself with the occasions for it will speak of His glory

Behold, a religion which will be found without controversy, a religion which will challenge all possible regards from the high as well as the low among the people I will résumé the term a philosophical religion And yet how evangelical! Ibid., 1-2

'How agreeable the shade of plants,' let every man say that sits under his own vine and under his own fig tree!

How charming the proportion and pulchritude of the leaves, the flowers, the fruits! He who confesses not must be, as Dr More says, one sunk into a forlorn pitch of degeneracy and stupid as a beast

Our Saviour says of the lilies (which some, not without reason, suppose to be tulips) that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these And it is observed by Spigelius, that the art of the most skilful painter cannot so mangle and temper his colors, as exactly to imitate or counterfeit the native ones of the flowers of vegetables

Mr Ray thinks it worthy a very particular observation that wheat, which is the best sort of grain and affords the wholesomest bread, is in a singular manner patient of both extremes, both heat and cold, and will grow to maturity as well in Scotland and in Denmark as in Egypt and Guinea and Madagascar It scarce refuses any climate And the exceeding fertility of it is by a pagan, Pliny, acknowledged as an instance of the divine bounty to man Quod eo maxime hominem alat,<sup>3</sup> one bushel in a fit soil, he says, yielding one hundred and fifty A German divine so far plays the philosopher on this occasion, as to propose it for a singularity in bread that totum corpus sustentat adeo ut in unica buccella omnium membrorum totius externi corporis nutrimentum contineatur, illiusque vis per totum corpus sese diffundat<sup>4</sup> A friend of mine had thirty-six ears of rye growing from one grain, and on one stalk

But of our Indian corn, one grain of corn will produce above a thousand And of Guinea corn, one grain has been known to produce ten thousand

The anatomy of plants, as it has been exhibited by the incomparable curiosity of Dr Grew—what a vast field of wonders does it lead us into!

The most inimitable structure of the parts!

The particular canals, and most adapted ones, for the conveyance of the lymphatic and essential juices!

3 'Because by it most of all He feeds man'

4 'It sustains the whole body to such an extent that in a single bushel there is contained the nourishment of all the members of the whole outer body, and the force of it diffuses itself throughout the whole body'

The air vessels in all their curious coil-

The coverings which befriend them, a work unspeakably more curious in reality than in appearance!

The strange texture of the leaves, the angular or circular but always most orderly position of their fibres, the various foldings, with a duplicature, a multiplicature, the fore-roll, the back-roll, the tre-roll, the noble guard of the films interposed!

The flowers, their gaiety and fragrantcy, the perianthium or empalement of them, their curious foldings in the calyx before their expansion, with a close couch or a concave couch, a single plait or a double plait, or a plait and couch together, or a roll, or a spire, or plait and spire together, and their luxuriant colors after their foliation, and the expanding of their petals!

The stamina, with their apices, and the stylus (called the 'attire' by Dr Grew), which is found a sort of male sperm to im-pregnate and fructify the seed!

At last the whole rudiments and lineaments of the parent vegetable, surprisingly locked up in the little compass of the fruit or seed!<sup>1</sup>

Gentlemen of leisure, consult my illustrious Doctor, peruse his Anatomy of Plants, ponder his numberless discoveries, but all

<sup>1</sup> Mather, a member of The Royal Society, although deeply interested in the newest scientific discoveries, did not pretend to any general originality in the observations reported in The Christian Philosopher. In addition to its demonstration of Mather's acceptance of radically significant research, the book is stylistically interesting because of the manner in which Mather often turned the straightforward prose of his originals into an excited, psalm-like hymn of praise. For example, compare with the above. I might also survey here the curious anatomy and structure of their bodies, and show the admirable provision made for the conveyance of the lymphatic and essential juices, for communicating the air, as necessary to vegetables, as animal life. I might also speak of even the very covering they are provided with, because it is a curious work in reality, although less so in appearance, and much more there-fore might I survey the neat variety and texture of their leaves the admirable finery, gaiety, and fragrantcy of their flowers. I might also inquire into the wonderful generation and make of the seed, and the great usefulness of their fruit. I might show that the rudiments and lineaments of the parent vegetable, though never so large and spacious, is locked up in the little compass of their fruit or seed, though some of those seeds are scarce visible to the naked eye. Durham Physico Theology (London, 1714), 416-19. Durham's book was made up of his Boyle lectures for 1711-12, and was first published in 1713.

FROM MANUDUCTIO AD MINISTERIUM

OF POETRY AND OF STYLE<sup>2</sup>

POETRY, whereof we have now even an ante-diluvian piece in our hands, has from the beginning been in such request that I must needs recommend unto you some acquaintance with it. Though some have had a soul so unmusical that they have decried all verse as being but a mere playing and fiddling upon words, all versifying as if it were more unnatural than if we should choose dancing instead of walking, and rhyme as if it were but a sort of Morisco dancing with bells, yet I cannot wish you a soul that shall be wholly unpoetical. An old Horace has left us an Art of Poetry, which you may do well to bestow a perusal on. And besides your lyric hours, I wish you may so far understand an epic poem that the beauties of an Homer and a Virgil may be discerned with you. As to the moral part of Homer,
'tis true, and let me not be counted a Zoilus for saying so, that by first exhibiting their gods as no better than rogues he set open the floodgates for a prodigious inundation of wickedness to break in upon the nations, and was one of the greatest apostles the devil ever had in the world. Among the rest that felt the ill impressions of this universal corrupter (as men of the best sentiments have called him), one was that overgrown robber of execrable memory whom we celebrate under the name of Alexander the Great, who by his continual admiring and studying of his Iliad, and by following that false model of heroic virtue set before him in his Achilles, became one of the worst of men, and at length inflated with the ridiculous pride of being himself a deity exposed himself to all the scorn that could belong unto a lunatic. And hence, notwithstanding the veneration which this idol has had, yet Plato banishes him out of a commonwealth, the welfare whereof he was concerned for Nevertheless, custom or conscience obliges him to bear testimonies unto many points of morality And it is especially observable that he commonly propounds prayer to Heaven as a most necessary preface unto all important enterprises, and when the action comes on too suddenly for a more extended supplication, he yet will not let it come on without an ejaculation, and he never speaks of any supplication but he brings in a gracious answer to it I have seen a travesteeing high-flyer, not much to our dishonor, scoff at Homer for this, as making his actors to be like those whom the English call Dissenters But then, we are so much led into the knowledge of antiquities by reading of this poet, and into so many parts of the recondite learning, that notwithstanding some little nods in him, not a few acute pens besides the old bishop of Thessalonica's have got a reputation by regaling us with annotations upon him Yea, though one can't but smile at the fancy of Cræse, who tries with much ostentation of erudition to show that Homer has all along tendered us in a disguise and fable the history of the Old Testament, yet many illustrations of the sacred scriptures I find are to be fetched from him, who indeed had probably read what was extant of them in his days, particularly, our Eighteenth Psalm is what he has evidently imitated Virgil too, who so much lived upon him, as well as after him, is unaccountably mad upon his fate, which he makes to be he knows not what himself, but superior to gods as well as to men, and through his whole composures he so asserts the doctrine of this nonsensical power as is plainly inconsistent with all virtue And what fatal mischief did Fascinator do to the Roman Empire when, by deifying one great emperor, he taught the successors to claim the adoration of gods while they were perpetrating the crimes of devils? I will not be a Cariblus upon him, nor will I say any thing, how little the married state owes unto one who writes as if he were a woman-hater, nor what his blunders are about his poor-spirited and inconsistent hero, for which many have taxed him Nevertheless 'tis observed that the pagans had no rules of manners that were more laudable and regular than what are to be found in him.

And some have said it is hardly possible seriously to read his works without being more disposed unto goodness, as well as being agreeably entertained Be sure, had Virgil writ before Plato, his works had not been any of the books prohibited. But then, this poet also has abundance of rare antiquities for us, and such things as others besides a Servius have imagined that they have instructed and obliged mankind by employing all their days upon Wherefore if his Æneid, which though it were once near twenty times as big as he has left it, yet he has left it unfinished, may not appear so valuable to you that you may think twenty-seven verses of the part that is the most finished in it worth one-and-twenty hundred pounds and odd money, yet his Georgics, which he put his last hand unto, will furnish you with many things far from despicable But after all, when I said I was willing that the beauties of these two poets might become visible to your visive faculty in poetry, I did not mean that you should judge nothing to be admittable into an epic poem which is not authorized by their example, but I perfectly concur with one who is inexpressibly more capable to be a judge of such a matter than I can be, that it is a false critic who with a petulant air will insult reason itself if it presumes to oppose such authority

I proceed now to say that if (under the guidance of a Vida) you try your young wings now and then to see what flights you can make, at least for an epigram, it may a little sharpen your sense and polish your style for more important performances, for this purpose you are now even overstocked with patterns, and—poemata passim.<sup>1</sup> You may, like Nazianzen, all your days make a little recreation of poetry in the midst of your more painful studies Nevertheless, I cannot but advise you, 'Withhold thy throat from thirst' Be not so set upon poetry as to be always poring on the passionate and measured pages. Let not what should be sauce rather than food for you engross all your application Beware of a boundless and sickly appetite for the reading of the poems, which now the rickety nation swarms withal, and let not the Circean cup

intoxicate you But especially preserve the chastity of your soul from the dangers you may incur by a conversation with muses that are no better than harlots, among which are others besides Ovid's Epistles, which for their tendency to excite and foment impure flames and cast coals into your bosom deserve rather to be thrown into the fire than to be laid before the eye which a covenant should be made withal Indeed, not merely for the impurities which they convey, but also on some other accounts, the powers of darkness have a library among us, whereof the poets have been the most numerous as well as the most venomous authors Most of the modern plays, as well as the romances and novels and fictions, which are a sort of poems, do belong to the catalogue of this cursed library The plays, I say, in which there are so many passages that have a tendency to overthrow all piety, that one whose name is Bedford has extracted near seven thousand instances of them from the plays chiefly of but five years preceding, and says awfully upon them, 'They are national sins, and therefore call for national plagues, and if God should enter into judgment, all the blood in the nation would not be able to atone for them' How much do I wish that such pestilences, and indeed all those worse than Egyptian toads (the spawns of a Butler, and a Brown, and a Ward, and a company whose name is legion!) might never crawl into your chamber! The unclean spirits that come like frogs out of the mouth of the dragon, and of the beast, which go forth unto the young people of the earth, and expose them to be dealt withal as the enemies of God, in the battle of the Great Day of the Almighty As for those wretched scribbles of madmen, my son, touch them not, taste them not, handle them not, thou wilt perish in the using of them They are the dragons whose contagious breath peoples the dark retreats of death To much better purpose will an excellent but an envied Blackmore feast you than those vile rhapsodies (of that vinum daemonum)<sup>1</sup> which you will find always leave a taint upon your mind, and among other ill effects will sensibly indispose you to converse with the holy oracles of God your Saviour

But there is what I may rather call a

parenthesis than a digression, which thus may be not altogether an improper place for the introducing of.

There has been a deal of ado about a style, so much that I must offer you my sentiments upon it. There is a way of writing wherein the author endeavors that the reader may have something to the purpose in every paragraph There is not only a vigor sensible in every sentence, but the paragraph is embellished with profitable references even to something beyond what is directly spoken Formal and painful quotations are not studied, yet all that could be learnt from them is insinuated The writer pretends not unto reading, yet he could not have writ as he does if he had not read very much in his time, and his composures are not only a cloth of gold, but also stuck with as many jewels, as the gown of a Russian ambassador This way of writing has been decried by many, and is at this day more than ever so, for the same reason that in the old story the grapes were decried, that they were not ripe A lazy, ignorant, conceited set of authors would persuade the whole tribe to lay aside that way of writing, for the same reason that one would have persuaded his brethren to part with the encumbrance of their bushy tails But however fashion and humor may prevail, they must not think that the club at their coffee-house is all the world, but there will always be those who will in this case be governed by indisputable reason, and who will think that the real excellency of a book will never lie in saying of little, that the less one has for his money in a book, 'tis really the more valuable for it, and that the less one is instructed in a book, and the more of superfluous margin and superficial harangue, and the less of substantial matter one has in it, the more 'tis to be accounted of And if a more massy way of writing be never so much disgusted at this day, a better gust will come on, as will some other thing, quae iam cecidere<sup>2</sup> In the meantime, nothing appears to me more impertinent and ridiculous than the modern way (I cannot say rule, for they have none!) of criticizing The blades that set up for critics, I know

not who constituted or commissioned 'em —they appear to me for the most part as contemptible as they are a supercilious generation For indeed no two of them have the same style, and they are as intolerably cross-grained and severe in their censures upon one another as they are upon the rest of mankind But while each of them, conceitedly enough, sets up for the standard of perfection, we are entirely at a loss which fire to follow Nor can you easily find any one thing wherein they agree for their style, except perhaps a perpetual care to give us jejune and empty pages, without such touches of erudition (to speak in the style of an ingenious traveller) as may make the discourses less tedious and more enriching to the mind of him that peruses them There is much talk of a florid style obtaining among the pens that are most in vogue, but how often would it puzzle one, even with the best glasses, to find the flowers! And if they were to be chastized for it, it would be with as much of justice as Jerome was for being a Ciceronian After all, every man will have his own style, which will distinguish him as much as his gait, and if you can attain to that which I have newly described, but always writing so as to give an easy conveyance unto your ideas, I would not have you by any scourging be driven out of your gait, but if you must confess a fault in it, make a confession like that of the lad unto his father while he was beating him for his versifying

However, since every man will have his own style, I would pray that we may learn to treat one another with mutual civilities and condescensions, and handsomely indulge one another in this, as gentlemen do in other matters

I wonder what ails people, that they can't let Cicero write in the style of Cicero, and Seneca write in the (much other!) style of Seneca, and own that both may please in their several ways —But I will freely tell you, what has made me consider the humorists that set up for critics upon style as the most unregardable set of mortals in the world, is this! Far more illustrious critics than any of those to whom I am now bidding defiance, and no less men than your Erasmuses, and your Grotiuses, have taxed the Greek style of the New Testament with I know not what solecisms and barbarisms; and how many learned folks have obsequiously run away with the notion! Whereas 'tis an ignorant and an insolent whimsy which they have been guilty of It may be (and particularly by an ingenious Blackwall, it has been) demonstrated, that the gentlemen are mistaken in every one of their pretended instances, all the unquestionable classics may be brought in to convince them of their mistakes Those glorious oracles are as pure Greek as ever was written in the world, and so correct, so noble, so sublime is their style, that never anything under the cope of Heaven, but the Old Testament, has equalled it

FROM PRACTICAL DISCOURSES ON THE PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS

THE FOOLISH AND THE WISE <sup>1</sup>

TEXT They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them. but the

wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps
I shall now proceed to raise some observations from the words . . .

That sincerity and holy living is the highest wisdom of man, hypocrisy and irreligion the greatest folly The foolish and the wise in the text are names for the hypocrite and the sincere believer, the wicked professor and the godly So is the world and the church divided, there are but two sorts or denominations of men, many fools and a few wise, as there are but two places in the judgment, the right hand and the left, and but two states to pass into, heaven or hell

It lies upon me to justify this character, which is a point of great use as well as a main thing in the parable, wherein, as in a glass, every one may see his own face, and the figure he makes in the world. It is good for us to be often reproached by our consciences with the folly of our wicked ways, and shame is one passion by which the holy spirit of God comes at the consciences of men for their awakening

How often is religion recommended to us under the name of wisdom in the Holy Scripture? Moses makes this his argument when he exhorts Israel to obedience 'Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the Lord my God commanded me, keep therefore and do them, for this is your wisdom and your understanding.' The wise Solomon was an accomplished judge, and he thinks nothing worthy to be called wisdom save only piety. 'They are the wise in heart,' he says, 'that receive the commandments.' The Psalmist also is of the same judgment 'The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom', and the Apostle James speaks of the 'wisdom from above,' which is 'pure and full of good fruits.'

On the other hand, sin and irreligion is as often branded with the odious name of folly. The meek Moses so reproaches the crooked and perverse Israelites 'O foolish people and unwise!' It is a proper confession for a sinner bewailing himself 'I have played the fool!' It was of old a severe reproof of heinous wickedness 'A committing folly in Israel,' or 'one of the fools in Israel.' 'The foolish shall not stand in Thy sight,' says David. Whom does he call the foolish? It follows 'Thou hatest all workers of iniquity.' Of all such it may be truly said 'Their way is their folly,' and 'in the greatness of their folly they go astray.' Therefore thus also does the wisdom of God address to sinners 'Forsake the foolish and live, and go in the way of understanding.'

And now what need is there of any further proof? May we not acquiesce in the judgment of God, who is the only wise? He knows the fool and the transgressor. Yet to justify the wisdom of God in this matter, I will set myself a little to consider the nature and properties of wisdom and folly, and see how natural and applicable they are to religion and irreligion. It is an argument that has been often labored in, by very excellent hands, and I shall not be able to bring any new light to it.

Wisdom takes in both sapience and prudence. The first consists in the knowing whatsoever things are true and good, together with the best method of arriving at them. The last consists in a fixed disposition to choose the means of truth and happiness, and diligently to improve them. That is to say, wisdom consists first in the knowledge of our true good, then in discerning the means that most directly and infallibly lead to it, and lastly in a vigorous, constant use of those means for the attaining it. On the other hand, folly appears in the ignorance of our true good, or in the neglect of it when known, or in the taking wrong and ridiculous measures to attain it. As wisdom in God respects 'His ordering and disposing things to the best ends and purposes,' so wisdom in man is to choose best for himself and then to use the best means with utmost diligence to compass what we truly apprehend to be best for us. In short, wisdom is 'the minding our chief end', and laboring by all means to promote it. And by this one rule we may judge of the wisdom of a religious life, and the folly of a wicked one. I shall therefore speak a little to these three general and comprehensive properties of wisdom: the knowing our chief good, our discerning and choosing the true way and means of attaining it, and our diligence in using those means.

One property of wisdom is for men to know and understand their chief good and last end. As much ignorance as there is in us, so much folly will there be, for though knowledge may have a distinct consideration from wisdom, in as much as a man may know much better than he acts, yet wisdom cannot be without knowledge, especially not without the knowledge of those things that are of the greatest weight, consequence, and necessity, and of what does most immediately relate to the acquisition of these.

Now the Scripture gives us the knowledge of our chief interest, business in the world, and the end of our being. It teaches us why we were born, and what we have to do, that there is a God to be served and glorified, that we have souls to save, a Savior to get an interest in, everlasting life to secure, and deliverance from eternal death. It informs us in the means and way unto all these things, how we may work out our own salvation, enjoy the love of God, and be happy for ever 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good, and what doth the Lord thy God require of thee' There is an infinite and eternal good to be enjoyed, there is pardon, grace, and mercy to be had, these are the one necessary and important interest of man, they are our blessedness and our life, the good part that can never be taken from us again Now that which qualifies us for, entitles us unto, and will at last bring us to this blessedness, that is our wisdom

But irreligion is folly for this very reason, because it proposes some mean insignificant end to itself, some little worldly interest, some paltry lust or other, some sensitive finite good, and too often also that only imaginary, and this trifle, this phantom, it places in the seat of God, mistaking it for the proper happiness of man This is gross ignorance and folly, and is certain of ending in shame and disappointment, for it bounds all its cares within the narrow compass of this short life, a dying body, and a perishing world, as if there were no immortal part, nor unseen and spiritual world to be cared for

It is true that all men are athirst and inquiring after good Who will show us any? But the folly of the most by far appears in their choosing amiss, mistaking their proper end and happiness, or regardless of it And it is true again that there is a bewitching appearance of good in the sins men court, but really they are the most formidable evils, only washed over to take with the weak eye of sense Some court unnecessary good, this is folly, when but one thing is needful To fawn after worldly honors, or scrape for riches, or hunt after vanishing pleasures, when indeed our life consisteth not in these things, not so much as our true felicity at present This is folly, to center and terminate our cares upon unprofitable vanity Men build on imagination an airy idea they have of huge satisfactions to be found in sinful courses, but foolishly enough, as they are soon convinced Yet, which is the strangest piece of madness of all, after many trials and experiments, their expectations rise again, and what a man has found a hundred times over to be shadows, dreams, delusions, and a lie, he courts anew with double desires. 'Sure every man walketh in a vain show, he disquieteth himself in vain' Just reason had the Psalmist to ask, 'Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge?' They are words of astonishment and carry in them both admiration and reprehension, which do with great pathos and elegance lament that ignorance which they charge The charge is extensive and universal, but not at all beyond sober truth, all the workers of iniquity, and no knowledge! Every sinner, as such, utterly destitute of the least degree of knowledge! <sup>1</sup> e, judging by their course and actions Sin is a strong, astonishing proof of ignorance For it is presumed that knowledge is given men for their good conduct and government, and it is human and candid to suppose they will use what they have, as much as he that hath eyes will open them to see his way It is to incline to the mildest interpretation of sinful actions to impute it to ignorance rather than malice, to resolve it into want of knowledge rather than into mere venom and spite And indeed it looks as if men had no notice of the being, power, and excellency of God 'His ways are always grievous God is not in all his thoughts,' and, one would think, was never heard of 'He will deal unjustly, and will not behold the majesty of the Lord' As senselessly as impudently he confounds good and evil, puts darkness for light and sweet for bitter He seems wholly ignorant of the world he lives in, its emptiness, instability, deccits, vexations. Would he labor so for the wind? for froth? a shadow? a vapor? No, it's plain the man thinks it a substantial good, worth a great deal of toil and sweat, and that it will well recompense his cares and pains As for worldly honors, how ignorantly do men think and speak of them? What nonsense is their magnificent talk of it! A gilded bubble, shattered by the breath! A brittle idol, which vain fools see broken to pieces while they are worshipping it! An imaginary happiness, for there may be real contempt in the heart while the knee cringes and the tongue flatters. And how soon do the names of honor change into those of contempt, so that at this day slaves wear those once exalted names of Caesar, Pompey, Scipio, etc., which this vain changing world once revered and trembled at. Moreover, the fool sees not the poverty of earthly riches, he thinks his houses shall endure for ever, and that he has goods laid up for many years. And as to fleshly pleasures, he thinks they'll never cloy or sting again, he believes his lying appetite once more, after all its past cheats. It shows great ignorance to be so easily gulled, and credulous to all the flatteries of sense, so often found false and collusive. And then how ignorant seems the sensualist of the world's vexations and afflictions? Would he else expect rest and ease for his soul here? O sot! that is every minute at the mercy of ten thousand sorrows, and sees it not! Who but a fool would build on a merry life in this vale of tears? Or if there were a pretty solid happiness to be enjoyed, yet it were a sufficient mark of a fool to be insensible of the instability of these things! to bless his soul as if he had a propriety and could keep possession! or as if his glory could descend after him! Yet less does a wicked man seem to know any thing of the world to come, and the distant states that await the godly and the wicked. Does the man seem to know there is a heaven of glory and blessedness, but never to be enjoyed by a defiled soul? Think you the ambitious man ever heard of the dignity of the saints in glory, their thrones, and crowns, and robes of unclouded light? Knows he that there is a glorious court above, where the Eternal sits enthroned, and the Mediator at his right hand, surrounded by myriads of noble spirits, among whom the love and favors of this glorious King are distributed with an equal but munificent hand? How happy are they that live forever in His presence, and minister unto Him, beyond those of the wise and magnificent Solomon, whom queens themselves could envy! Would not the noble spirit court only this, knew he of any such transcendent and unfading honor attainable? Would he not tread on crowns and scepters, and spurn at palaces and thrones, if they would clog his way to a better and more lasting state of renown? The very prince on earth being but a vassal and worm before the most high God, and if he be compared to an angel of His, it is a flight in his honor, too high for his mortal state. Again, do you think the voluptuous man knows any thing of the joys of heaven, that never cloy or sour? Knew he the least part of the sweetness of the sense of God's love, and the unspeakable joys He can fill and satiate the soul with, knew he the ravished elders' transports while they sing the praises and victories of the Lamb, their hearts rising with their notes and keeping way with their voice, knew he the deliciousness of those eternal greens and living fountains of waters, where the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall lead and feed his redeemed, did the sinner know any thing of this place of pure and full and endless pleasure, would he, could he hanker any longer after the dreggy cheap pleasures of sin? No, no! He would despise, and hate, and loath them, his stomach would turn at them, his ennobled soul would not relish them, his past surfeits would soon end in antipathy. To give one instance more does not the wretched worldling seem altogether ignorant of any durable incorruptible treasures to be had beyond the grave? of that better country, and that city of the great King, paved with his idolized gold? Would he not find a heart to open his rusty chest and empty his mouldy bags for this better substance, would he not give alms (which he'll as soon his heart's blood now) and provide himself bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, etc.? His own principles of gain would constrain him, did he understand and credit these things. Nor does the sinner seem ever to have heard any thing of a hell, for would self-love and fear suffer him to run headlong into that place of torments? He knows not that it is for his life! In a word, irreligion shows a man to be a stranger to himself, ignorant of his own frame and make, that he has a soul in the delight and perfection whereof his happiness consists. One would think the man esteemed himself only of the upper order of brutes, to graze with and perish like them. Our alliance to the spiritual world, the unseen vital substance, the glory of our nature, is forgotten. Nor can there be a more gross piece of ignorance than this, even in the first thing that we have to learn, scil., the frame of our nature, and our relation to a better world Herein the sinner is ignorant of the grasp and reach of his own nature, which no finite good can ever satisfy, but it will be cheated after all, hungry, and calling for more We may as well throw a shrimp to a whale, or hold a thimbleful of water to Behemoth to drink, whenas he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth, behold he drinketh up a river, he taketh it with his eyes To conclude, sinners seem not to know or at all imagine that truth is the proper food and nourishment of a rational mind, and that husks are only for swine, that his soul cannot be nourished by the gross diet of sense, but is oppressed and starved in the luxurious surfeits of the body Thus sinners publish their own ignorance of themselves and the world they live in, of their own mortality and immortality too, for they lay in as it were for the body's everlasting subsistence here below, but make no provision for the immortal spirit when it shall take its flight

This is to think and speak scripturally: never to take that for knowledge which does not influence to agreeable practice, for words of sense in Scripture do imply affection and action as, to know God signifies to acknowledge and regard Him and carry it to Him as God 'I will give them a heart to know Me, and they shall return unto Me with their whole heart' A life 'alienated from the life of God' argues a 'mind full of vanity,' and an 'understanding darkened' But 'who is a wise man and endowed with knowledge, let him show out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom' . . .

But I must needs add a particular thought or two on the folly of hypocrisy, that sin above others The parable calls for this, because the foolish virgins here spoken of are such as however profess faith in Christ—they have their lamps and are looking out for the coming of the bridegroom, but they took no oil in their lamps, and therefore are called the foolish So that it is the hypocrite or unsound professor that is the fool And indeed, a heathen or profane infidel is not guilty of such glaring folly in his practices as a wicked professor is His profession is every way absurd

believes what he professes, yea or no The hypocrite will be angry if we call into question the truth of his faith, he says, 'I see', therefore his folly remains obvious. For granting him his say, let him only hear his own strange account of himself, which is he sees a hell open before him and runs into it, the glories of heaven and flies from them, the pointed sword of justice and he runs upon it And if so, sense is gone as well as reason, and the dumb ass would reprove the madness, for the beast fled back from the threatening sword of the angel, but you more stupid force on the sword of vengeance This is mere distraction and frenzy

But if the hypocrite believes not a word of what he professes, then he is a trifling fool to make any profession at all What a wanton, ludicrous animal is he! What a ridiculous figure does he make here at God's worship! How grave is his play! How serious a pageantry! How solemn a mock! For his worship is so to him if he do not believe, and worse if he do

How mean and little is the hypocrite's aim, to impose on men and deceive them into a good opinion of him? None but a fool would take so much pains to do this, or value himself on it when it's done 'Tis no such mighty feat to be prided in, only requiring a good measure of dishonesty and impudence Nor is the praise of men to be much set by, 'tis a brittle uncertain thing, a flash in the air, to desire which praise but not deserve it is but like the silly dog in the fable, to lose the substance for the shadow The hypocrite is a fool to toil so much for that which alone by itself is not worth the having a name to live only for a day, doubly to be despised hereafter when found among the dead As a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord, shalt Thou despise their image Nay, methinks hypocrites will look most despicable to the devils themselves, and to them who shall be damned for profaneness and infidelity

If the hypocrite would impose upon God, his folly is yet more gross If he say in his heart, 'How does God know? Thick darkness is a covering to Him that He seeth not' And yet he acts as if he verily thought God were to be deluded with his false vizard of sanctity, and he could hide his heart from Him as well as from men, as if he thought that the Lord seeth no further than man seeth, that is, to the outward appearance only. See with what disdain and indignation the holy Psalmist reflects on this infidel thought: 'Understand, ye brutish among the people, and ye fools, when will you be wise?' And yet if the hypocrite believes that God sees him through, that His eyes are as a flame of fire which pierce through all things and make the darkness light before Him and the night to shine as the day, he is then guilty of more daring folly than if he really thought the Deity blind and inobservant. It is madness to dissemble when God can't be mocked. Blind man! cleanse first the inward thoughts which are all naked and open before that God with whom we have to do. Else we act like silly children that shut their own eyes, and then think that nobody sees them neither.

The hypocrite consults his present peace as little as his future safety, and he that does neither is certainly a fool. It is very obvious that he consults not his future safety, since his Judge is omniscient, and has spoken of hypocrisy as a most aggravated crime, and of the terrible punishment that awaits it in the world to come. He highly resents treachery in professors, which He ranks among and compares with the foulest abominations. The 'portion of hypocrites' is spoken of as the worst part of hell. The abuse of special privileges will increase our future misery, 'And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shall be brought down to hell.' Such pay very dear for their folly, seek for themselves the hottest place in hell, and cast oil into the flames they are ever to fry in.

But you would certainly think now that men made some present advantage of hypocrisy, or they must be fools indeed, if it be their present misery too. Which yet I dare to say of it, for what peace can conscience have in it! Can it possibly refrain from reproaching the man, and telling him of his portion to come? There is indeed a delusion sometimes which is sweet while it lasts, when men think themselves to be something when they are nothing, but most ill professors know themselves to be nothing, and so have not so much as the sweets of a delusive dream for their pains. Indeed sincerity rejoices in the testimony of conscience, but hypocrisy has its lash, as an infamous criminal deserves. It cannot but loath itself, and every day the man condemns himself, remorse and guilty fears torment him, and his sweets are bitter in his mouth. This is the folly of the hypocrite: he takes the direct way to perpetual discontents, fears, and the loathings of his own mind. He loses all comforts of life, throws away peace, that invaluable jewel, and has a kind of hell in his conscience.

And lastly, the hypocrite is a fool, for at the best he only proposes to himself to repent hereafter of what he does. Which is but a sorrowful work at last, and yet the best that he can hope for. That is, he courts one hour's sin now, though it cost him an age of sorrow if he live to be old. This is indeed better than an eternity of it, but nevertheless a dear price for a minute's pleasure. Would any man take a bee into his mouth, and be content it should leave its sting in his tongue, for a drop of honey in its body? Much less would a wise man undergo the pains of repentance for all the pleasures of sin. Grant it then that wickedness be sweet in the mouth, yet 'tis like to prove the 'gall of asps within.' Suppose the poison be vomited up, and we escape with our life, yet not without dreadful convulsions and dying sickness. But of this piece of folly more may be said in a more proper place. Meanwhile let me only add this general account of a hypocrite, and I will do no more to paint his egregious folly.

He pretends to believe that God is, and to worship Him, and to live to Him. He professes to think religion a reality, and to show forth the life and power of it, he says that God ought to be feared for His power and righteousness, loved for His beauty and goodness, praised for His benefits, trusted in for His truth and faithfulness, imitated for His holiness, and obeyed for His dominion and authority, but all this while he no more regards God in his heart than if He were only a name or a stupid stock. He is the grossest piece of self-contradiction in the whole world. He knows the judgment of God and yet incurs it, believes the promises and yet slights them, puts on a demure look as from a reverential awe of God's presence, and yet laughs at Him in his heart, disdains Him when in secret, says of Him, 'He is not,' or 'He cannot see,' or 'He cannot strike', takes off his mask when none but God can see, and puts it on again when he goes out, surfeits jollily on the dainties at home, which he has stolen by long prayers abroad, and uses the name of Christ only as the silversmith did Diana's, to maintain his craft His life is farce and comedy, but will have a tragical end The play won't last always, the last act will be sad and doleful, when God will terribly revenge the sport men make of holy things

SAMUEL SEWALL

1652-1730

FROM DIARY OF SAMUEL SEWALL

SEPTEMBER 30 [1720] Mr Colman's lecture Daughter Sewall acquaints Madam Winthrop that if she pleased to be within at 3 P M, I would wait on her She answered she would be at home

October 1 Saturday I dine at Mr Stoddard's, from thence I went to Madam Winthrop's just at 3 Spake to her, saying my loving wife died so soon and suddenly, 'twas hardly convenient for me to think of marrying again, however, I came to this resolution, that I would not make my court to any person without first consulting with her Had a pleasant discourse about 7 (seven) single persons sitting in the fore-seat September 29th, viz, Madam Rebecca Dudley, Katherine Winthrop, Bridget Usher, Deliverance Legg, Rebecca Lloyd, Lydia Colman, Elizabeth Bellingham She propounded one and another for me, but none would do, said Mrs Lloyd was about her age

October 3 2 Waited on Madam Winthrop again, 'twas a little while before she came in Her daughter Noyes being there alone with me, I said I hoped my waiting on her mother would not be disagreeable to her She answered she should not be against that that might be for her comfort I saluted her, and told her I perceived I must shortly wish her a good time (her mother had told me she was with child and within a month or two of her time) By and by in came Mr. Airs, chaplain of the Castle, and hanged up his hat, which I was a little startled at, it seeming as if he was to lodge

there At last Madam Winthrop came too After a considerable time I went up to her and said if it might not be inconvenient, I desired to speak with her She assented, and spake of going into another room, but Mr Airs and Mrs Noyes presently rose up and went out, leaving us there alone Then I ushered in discourse from the names in the fore-seat, at last I prayed that Katherine [Mrs Winthrop] might be the person assigned for me She instantly took it up in the way of denial, as if she had caught at an opportunity to do it, saying she could not do it before she was asked Said that was her mind unless she should change it, which she believed she should not, could not leave her children I expressed my sorrow that she should do it so speedily, prayed her consideration, and asked her when I should wait on her again She setting no time, I mentioned that day sen- night Gave her Mr Willard's Fountain, opened with the little print and verses, saying I hoped if we did well read that book, we should meet together hereafter, if we did not now She took the book and put it in her pocket Took leave

October 5 Midweek I dined with the court, from thence went and visited Cousin Jonathan's wife, lying in with her little Betty Gave the nurse 2<sup>s</sup> Although I had appointed to wait upon her, Madam Winthrop, next Monday, yet I went from my cousin Sewall's thither about 3 P M The nurse told me Madam dined abroad at her daughter Noyes's, they were to go out together I asked for the maid, who was not within Gave Katee a penny and a kiss, and came away Accompanied my son and daughter Cooper in their remove to their new house Went to tell Joseph, and Mr Belcher saw me by the South Meetinghouse though 'twas duskish, and said I had been at house-warming (he had been at our house) Invited me to drink a glass of wine at his house at 7, and eat part of the pasty provided for the commissioners' voyage to Casco Bay His Excellency, Madam Belcher, S S, Col Fitch, Mr D Oliver, Mr Anthony Stoddard, Mr Welsted, Mr White, Mr Belcher sat down At coming home gave us of the cake and gingerbread to carry away 'Twas about ten before we got home, Mr Oliver and I waited on the Governor to his gate, and then Mr Oliver would wait on me home

October 6th Lecture day Mr Cutler, president of the Connecticut college, preached in Dr C Mather's turn He made an excellent discourse from Heb 11 14 'For they that say such things, declare plainly that they seek a country' Brother Odlin, Son Sewall of Brookline, and Mary Hirst dine with me I asked Mary of Madam Lord, Mr Oliver and wife, and bid her present my service to them October 6th A little after 6 P M I went to Madam Winthrop's She was not within I gave Sarah Chickering the maid 2<sup>s</sup>, Juno, who brought in wood, 1<sup>s</sup> Afterward the nurse came in, I gave her 18<sup>d</sup>, having no other small bill After a while Dr Noyes came in with his mother, and quickly after his wife came in, they sat talking, I think, till eight o'clock I said I feared I might be some interruption to their business, Dr Noyes replied pleasantly he feared they might be an interruption to me, and went away Madam seemed to harp upon the same string Must take care of her children, could not leave that house and neighborhood where she had dwelt so long I told her she might do her children as much or more good by bestowing what she laid out in housekeeping, upon them Said her son would be of age the 7th of August I said it might be inconvenient for her to dwell with her daughter-in-law, who must be mistress of the house I gave her a piece of Mr Belcher's cake and gingerbread wrapped up in a clean sheet of paper, told her of her father's kindness to me when treasurer, and I constable My daughter Judith was gone from me and I was more lonesome—might help to forward one another in our journey to Canaan Mr Eyre came within the door, I saluted him, asked how Mr. Clark did, and he went away I took leave about 9 o'clock I told [her] I came now to refresh her memory as to Monday night, said she had not forgot it In discourse with her, I asked leave to speak with her sister, I meant to gain Madam Mico's favor to persuade her sister She seemed surprised and displeased, and said she was in the same condition

October 7th. Friday I gather the quinces Gave Mr Jonathan Simson and Mrs Field, each of them, a funeral sermon

Cousin Abiel Hobart comes to us Mr Short, having received his £40, returns home

Mr Cooper visits me, thanks me for my cheese

October 8 Mr Short returns not till this day

October 9 Mr Sewall preaches very well from Acts 2 24 of the resurrection of Christ One woman taken into church, one child baptized

October 10th Examine Mr Briggs his account, said they could not find Mr Whittemore Mr Willard offered to answer for him But I showed the necessity of his being here, and appointed Wednesday, 10 o'clock, and ordered notice to be given to the auditors, to pray their assistance

In the evening I visited Madam Winthrop, who treated me with a great deal of courtesy, wine, marmalade I gave her a News-Letter about the Thanksgiving, proposals, for sake of the verses for David Jeffries She tells me Dr Increase Mather visited her this day, in Mr Hutchinson's coach

It seems Dr Cotton Mather's chimney fell afire yesterday, so as to interrupt the Assembly A M Mr Cutler ceased preaching  $\frac{1}{2}$  of an hour.

October 11th I writ a few lines to Madam Winthrop to this purpose 'Madam, These wait on you with Mr Mayhew's sermon, and account of the state of the Indians on Martha's Vineyard I thank you for your unmerited favors of yesterday, and hope to have the happiness of waiting on you tomorrow before eight o'clock after noon I pray God to keep you, and give you a joyful entrance upon the two hundred and twenty-ninth year of Christopher Columbus his discovery, and take leave, who am, Madam, your humble servant S S.'

Sent this by Deacon Green, who delivered it to Sarah Chickering, her mistress not being at home

October 12 Give Mr Whittemore and Willard their oath to Dr Mather's inventory Visit Mr Cooper Go to the meeting at the Widow Emon's, Mr Manly prayed, I read half Mr Henry's 12th chapter of The Lord's Supper Sung 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 10, and 12th verses of the 30th Psalm Brother Franklin concluded with prayer At Madam Winthrop's steps I took leave of Capt Hill, etc

Mrs Anne Cotton came to door ('twas before 8), said Madam Winthrop was within, directed me into the little room, where she was full of work behind a stand, Mrs Cotton came in and stood Madam Winthrop pointed to her to set me a chair Madam Winthrop's countenance was much changed from what 'twas on Monday, looked dark and lowering At last the work (black stuff or silk) was taken away, I got my chair in place, had some converse, but very cold and indifferent to what 'twas before Asked her to acquit me of rudeness if I drew off her glove Inquiring the reason, I told her 'twas great odds between handling a dead goat and a living lady Got it off I told her I had one petition to ask of her—that was that she would take off the negative she laid on me the third of October, she readily answered she could not, and enlarged upon it, she told me of it so soon as she could, could not leave her house, children, neighbors, business I told her she might do some good to help and support me Mentioning Mrs Gookin (Nath ), the Widow Weld was spoken of, said I had visited Mrs Demison I told her, 'Yes!' Afterward I said if after a first and second vagary she would accept of me returning, her victorious kindness and good will would be very obliging She thanked me for my book (Mr Mayhew's sermon), but said not a word of the letter When she insisted on the negative, I prayed there might be no more thunder and lightning, I should not sleep all night I gave her Dr Preston, The Church's Marriage and the Church's Carriage, which cost me 6<sup>s</sup> at the sale The door standing open, Mr Airs came in, hung up his hat, and sat down After awhile, Madam Winthrop moving, he went out John Eyre looked in,

I said, 'How do ye?' or, 'Your servant, Mr Eyre,' but heard no word from him Sarah filled a glass of wine, she drank to me, I to her, she sent Juno home with me with a good lantern, I gave her 6<sup>d</sup> and bid her thank her mistress In some of our discourse, I told her I had rather go to the stone house adjoining to her than to come to her against her mind Told her the reason why I came every other night was lest I should drink too deep draughts of pleasure She had talked of canary, her kisses were to me better than the best canary Explained the expression concerning Columbus

October 13 I tell my son and daughter Sewall that the weather was not so fair as I apprehended Mr Sewall preached very well in Mr Wadsworth's turn Mr Williams of Weston and Mr Odlin dine with us Text was the excellency of the knowledge of Christ

Friday, October 14 Made a dinner for my son and daughter Cooper At table in the best room were Sister Stoddard, Sister Cooper, His Excellency, Mrs Hannah Cooper, Brother Stoddard, S S, Mr Joseph Sewall, Mr Cooper, Mr Sewall of Brookline, Mrs Rand, Mrs Gerrish, daughter of Brookline Mr Gerrish, Clark, and Rand sat at a side table

October 15 Sent my son Cooper, Pareus, 3 books

October 15 I dine on fish and oil at Mr Stoddard's Capt Hill wished me joy of my proceedings, i e, with M— Winthrop, Sister Cooper applauded it, spake of visiting her, I said her complaisance of her visit would be obliging to me

October 16 Lord's Day I upbraided myself that could be so solicitous about earthly things, and so cold and indifferent as to the love of Christ, who is altogether lovely Mr Prince administered Dined at my son's with Mr Cutler and Mr Shurtleff Mr Cutler preaches in the afternoon from Ezek 16 30 'How weak is thy heart.' Son reads the order for the Thanksgiving treated me courteously, but not in clean linen as sometimes. She said she did not know whether I would come again or no. I asked her how she could so impute inconstancy to me (I had not visited her since Wednesday night, being unable to get over the indisposition received by the treatment received that night, and I must in it seemed to sound like a made piece of formality.) Gave her this day's Gazette. Heard David Jeffries say the Lord's Prayer, and some other portions of the Scriptures. He came to the door and asked me to go into chamber where his grandmother was tending little Katee, to whom she had given physic, but I chose to sit below. Dr. Noyes and his wife came in and sat a considerable time, had been visiting Son and Daughter Cooper. Juno came home with me.

October 18 Visited Madam Mico, who came to me in a splendid dress. I said, 'It may be you have heard of my visiting Madam Winthrop,' her sister. She answered, her sister had told her of it. I asked her good will in the affair. She answered, if her sister were for it, she should not hinder it. I gave her Mr. Homes's sermon. She gave me a glass of canary, entertained me with good discourse and a respectful remembrance of my first wife. I took leave.

October 19 Midweek Visited Madam Winthrop, Sarah told me she was at Mr. Walley's, would not come home till late. I gave her Hannah 3 oranges with her duty, not knowing whether I should find her or no. Was ready to go home, but said if I knew she was there, I would go thither. Sarah seemed to speak with pretty good courage she would be there. I went and found her there, with Mr. Walley and his wife in the little room below. At 7 o'clock I mentioned going home, at 8 I put on my coat and quickly waited on her home. She found occasion to speak loud to the servant, as if she had a mind to be known. Was courteous to me, but took occasion to speak pretty earnestly about my keeping a coach. I said 'twould cost £100 per annum, she said 'twould cost but £40. Spake much against John Winthrop, his false-heartedness. Mr. Eyre came in and sat a while, I offered him Dr. Ince Mather's Sermons, whereof Mr. Appleton's ordination sermon was one, said he had them already. I said I would give him another. Exit. Came away somewhat late.

October 20 Mr. Colman preaches from Luke 15. 10 'Joy among the angels', made an excellent discourse.

At council, Col. Townsend spake to me of my hood should get a wig. I said 'twas my chief ornament, I wore it for sake of the day. Brother Odlin, and Sam, Mary, and Jane Hirst dine with us. Promised to wait on the Governor about 7. Madam Winthrop not being at lecture, I went thither first, found her very serene with her daughter Noyes, Mrs. Dering, and the Widow Shupreeve, sitting at a little table, she in her armed chair. She drank to me, and I to Mrs. Noyes. After a while prayed the favor to speak with her. She took one of the candles and went into the best room, closed the shutters, sat down upon the couch. She told me Madam Usher had been there, and said the coach must be set on wheels, and not by rusting. She spake something of my needing a wig. Asked me what her sister said to me. I told her she said if her sister were for it, she would not hinder it. But I told her she did not say she would be glad to have me for her brother. Said, 'I shall keep you in the cold', and asked her if she would be within tomorrow night, for we had had but a running feat. She said she could not tell whether she should or no. I took leave. As were drinking at the Governor's, he said in England the ladies minded little more than that they might have money, and coaches to ride in. I said, 'And New England brooks its name.' At which Mr. Dudley smiled. Governor said they were not quite so bad here.

October 21 Friday. My son the minister came to me P.M. by appointment and we pray one for another in the old chamber, more especially respecting my courtship. About 6 o'clock I go to Madam Winthrop's, Sarah told me her mistress was gone out, but did not tell me whether she went. She presently ordered me a fire, so I went in, having Dr. Sibb's Bowels with me to read. I read the two first sermons, still nobody came in. At last about 9 o'clock Mr. John Eyre came in, I took the opportunity to say to him as I had done to Mrs. Noyes before, that I hoped my visiting his mother would not be disagreeable to him, he answered me with much respect. When 'twas after 9 o'clock he of himself said he would go and call her, she was but at one of his brothers', a while after I heard Madam Winthrop's voice, inquiring something about John. After a good while and clapping the garden door twice or thrice, she came in. I mentioned something of the lateness, she bantered me, and said I was later. She received me courteously. I asked when our proceedings should be made public, she said they were like to be no more public than they were already. Offered me no wine that I remember. I rose up at 11 o'clock to come away, saying I would put on my coat, she offered not to help me. I prayed her that Juno might light me home, she opened the shutter and said 'twas pretty light abroad, Juno was weary and gone to bed. So I came home by star light as well as I could. At my first coming in, I gave Sarah five shillings. I writ Mr Eyre his name in his book with the date October 21, 1720. It cost me 8<sup>s</sup>. Jehovah jireh!<sup>1</sup> Madam told me she had visited M. Mico, Wendell, and William Clark of the South [Church].

October 22 Daughter Cooper visited me before my going out of town, stayed till about sunset. I brought her, going near as far as the Orange-tree. Coming back, near Leg's Corner, little David Jeffries saw me, and looking upon me very lovingly, asked me if I was going to see his grandmother. I said, 'Not to-night.' Gave him a penny and bid him present my service to his grandmother.

October 24 I went in the hackney coach through the Common, stopped at Madam Winthrop's (had told her I would take my departure from thence). Sarah came to the door with Katee in her arms, but I did not think to take notice of the child. Called her mistress. I told her, being encouraged by David Jeffries' loving eyes and sweet words, I was come to inquire whether she could find in her heart to leave that house and neighborhood, and go and dwell with me at the South End, I think she said softly, 'Not yet.' I told her it did not lie in my lands to keep a coach. If I should, I should be in danger to be brought to keep company with her neighbor Brooker (he was a little before sent to prison for debt). Told her I had an antipathy against those who would pretend to give themselves, but nothing of their estate. I would a proportion of my estate with myself. And I supposed she would do so. As to a periwig, my best and greatest Friend, I could not possibly have a greater, began to find me with hair before I was born, and had continued to do so ever since, and I could not find in my heart to go to another. She commended the book I gave her, Dr Preston, The Church Marriage, quoted him saying 'twas inconvenient keeping out of a fashion commonly used. I said the time and tide did circumscribe my visit. She gave me a dram of black-cherry brandy, and gave me a lump of the sugar that was in it. She wished me a good journey. I prayed God to keep her, and came away. Had a very pleasant journey to Salem.

October 25 Sent a letter of it to my son by Wakefield, who delivered it not till Wednesday, so he visited her not till Friday P M. and then presented my service to her.

October 27 Kept the Thanksgiving at Salem. Mr Fisk preached very well from Ephes 5:20 'Giving thanks always.' Dine at Col Brown's.

October 29. Hold court in the morn. Had a pleasant journey home a little before sunset.

October 30 Mrs Phillips and her son sit in their pew.

October 31 She proves her husband's will. At night I visited Madam Winthrop about 6 P M. They told me she was gone to Madam Mico's. I went thither and found she was gone, so returned to her house, read the epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians in Mr Eyre's Latin Bible. After the clock struck 8, I began to read the 103 Psalm. Mr Wendell came in from his warehouse. Asked me if I were alone. Spoke very kindly to me, offered me to call. Madam Winthrop. I told him she would be angry, had been at Mrs Mico's, he helped me on with my coat, and I came home, left the Gazette in the Bible, which told Sarah of, bid her present my service to Mrs Winthrop, and tell her I had been to wait on her if she had been at home.

November 1 I was so taken up that I could not go if I would.

November 2 Midweek. Went again, and found Mrs Alden there, who quickly went out Gave her about  $\frac{1}{2}$  pound of sugar almonds, cost 3s per £ Carried them on Monday She seemed pleased with them, asked what they cost Spake of giving her a hundred pounds per annum if I died before her Asked her what sum she would give me, if she should die first Said I would give her time to consider of it She said she heard as if I had given all to my children by deeds of gift I told her 'twas a mistake, Point Judith was mine, etc That in England, I owned, my father's desire was that it should go to my eldest son, 'twas £20 per annum, she thought 'twas forty. I think when I seemed to excuse pressing this, she seemed to think 'twas best to speak of it, a long winter was coming on Gave me a glass or two of canary

November 4th Friday Went again about 7 o'clock, found there Mr John Walley and his wife, sat discoursing pleasantly I showed them Isaac Moses's [an Indian] writing Madam W served comfits to us After a while a table was spread, and supper was set I urged Mr Walley to crave a blessing, but he put it upon me About 9 they went away I asked Madam what fashioned necklace I should present her with, she said, 'None at all' I asked her whereabouts we left off last time, mentioned what I had offered to give her, asked her what she would give me, she said she could not change her condition, she had said so from the beginning, could not be so far from her children, the lecture Quoted the Apostle Paul affirming that a single life was better than a married I answered that was for the present distress Said she had not pleasure in things of that nature as formerly I said, 'You are the fitter to make me a wife' If she held in that mind, I must go home and bewail my rashness in making more haste than good speed However, considering the supper, I desired her to be within next Monday night, if we lived so long Assented She charged me with saying that she must put away Juno if she came to me, I utterly denied it, it never came in my heart, yet she insisted upon it, saying it came in upon discourse about the Indian woman that obtained her freedom this court About 10 I said I would not disturb the good orders of her house, and came away She not seeming pleased with my coming away Spake to her about David Jeffries, had not seen him

Monday, November 7th. My son prayed in the old chamber Our time had been taken up by Son and Daughter Cooper's visit, so that I only read the 130th and 143rd Psalm 'Twas on the account of my courtship I went to Mad. Winthrop, found her rocking her little Katee in the cradle I excused my coming so late (near eight) She set me an armed chair and cushion, and so the cradle was between her armed chair and mine Gave her the remnant of my almonds, she did not eat of them as before, but laid them away, I said I came to enquire whether she had altered her mind since Friday, or remained of the same mind still She said, 'Thereabouts' I told her I loved her, and was so fond as to think that she loved me She said [she] had a great respect for me I told her I had made her an offer without asking any advice, she had so many to advise with that 'twas a hindrance The fire was come to one short brand besides the block, which brand was set up in end, at last it fell to pieces, and no recruit was made She gave me a glass of wine I think I repeated again that I would go home and bewail my rashness in making more haste than good speed I would endeavor to contain myself, and not go on to solicit her to do that which she could not consent to Took leave of her As came down the steps she bid me have a care Treated me courteously Told her she had entered the 4th year of her widowhood I had given her the News-Letter before I did not bid her draw off her glove as sometime I had done Her dress was not so clean as sometime it had been Jehovah jireh<sup>1</sup>

Midweek, November 9th Dine at Brother Stoddard's, were so kind as to inquire of me if they should invite Madam Winthrop, I answered 'No'

SARAH KEMBLE KNIGHT

1666-1727

FROM THE JOURNAL OF MADAM KNIGHT

TO NEW LONDON <sup>1</sup>

TUESDAY, October the third, about 8 in the morning, I with the post proceeded forward without observing anything remarkable, and about two, afternoon, arrived at the post's second stage, where the western post met him and exchanged letters Here, having called for something to eat, the woman brought in a twisted thing like a cable, but something whiter, and laying it on the board, rugged for life to bring it into a capacity to spread, which having with great pains accomplished, she served in a dish of pork and cabbage I suppose the remains of dinner The sauce was of a deep purple, which I thought was boiled in her dye kettle, the bread was Indian, and everything on the table service agreeable to these I, being hungry, got a little down, but my stomach was soon cloyed, and what cabbage I swallowed served me for a cud the whole day after Having here discharged the ordinary for self and guide (as I understood was the custom), about three, afternoon, went on with my thurd guide, who rode very hard, and having crossed Providence Ferry, we come to a river which they generally ride through But I dare not venture, so the post got a lad and canoe to carry me to t'other side, and he rid through and led my horse The canoe was very small and shallow, so that when we were in she seemed ready to take in water, which greatly terrified me, and caused me to be very cir-

cumspect, sitting with my hands fast on each side, my eyes steady, not daring so much as to lodge my tongue a hair's breadth more on one side of my mouth than t'other, nor so much as think on Lot's wife, for a wry thought would have overset our wherry, but was soon put out of this pain, by feeling the canoe on shore, which I as soon almost saluted with my feet, and rewarding my sculler, again mounted and made the best of our way forwards The road here was very even and the day pleasant, it being now near sunset But the post told me we had near 14 miles to ride to the next stage, where we were to lodge I asked him of the rest of the road, foreseeing we must travel in the night He told me there was a bad river we were to ride through, which was so very fierce a horse could sometimes hardly stem it, but it was but narrow, and we should soon be over I cannot express the concern of mund this relation set me in, no thoughts but those of the dangerous river could entertain my imagination, and they were as formidable as various, still tormenting me with blackest ideas of my approaching fate—sometimes seeing myself drowning, otherwhiles drowned, and at the best like a holy sister just come out of a spiritual bath in dripping garments

Now was the glorious luminary with his swift coursers arrived at his stage, leaving poor me with the rest of this part of the lower world in darkness, with which we were soon surrounded The only glimmering we now had was from the spangled skies, whose imperfect reflections rendered every object formidable Each lifeless trunk, with its shattered limbs, appeared an armed enemy, and every little stump like a ravenous devourer Nor could I so much as discern my guide, when at any distance, which added to the terror

Thus, absolutely lost in thought, and dying with the very thoughts of drowning, I came up with the post, whom I did not see till even with his horse, he told me he stopped for me, and we rode on very deliberately a few paces, when we entered a thicket of trees and shrubs, and I perceived by the horse's going we were on the descent of a hill, which, as we came nearer the bottom, 'twas totally dark with the trees that surrounded it. But I knew by the going of the horse we had entered the water, which my guide told me was the hazardous river he had told me of, and he, riding up close to my side, bid me not fear—we should be over immediately. I now rallied all the courage I was mistress of, knowing that I must either venture my fate of drowning or be left like the children in the wood. So, as the post bid me, I gave reigns to my nag, and sitting as steady as just before in the canoe, in a few minutes got safe to the other side, which he told me was the Narragansett country.

Here we found great difficulty in traveling, the way being very narrow, and on each side the trees and bushes gave us very unpleasant welcomes with their branches and boughs, which we could not avoid, it being so exceeding dark. My guide, as before so now, put on harder than I with my weary bones could follow, so left me and the way behind him. Now returned my distressed apprehensions of the place where I was the dolesome woods, my company next to none, going I knew not whither, and encompassed with terrifying darkness, the least of which was enough to startle a more masculine courage. Added to which the reflections, as in the afternoon of the day, that my call was very questionable, which till then I had not so prudently as I ought considered. Now, coming to the foot of a hill, I found great difficulty in ascending, but being got to the top, was there amply recompensed with the friendly appearance of the kind conductress of the night, just then advancing above the horizontal line. The raptures which the sight of that fair planet produced in me caused me for the moment to forget my present weariness and past toils, and inspired me for most of the remaining way with very diverting thoughts, some of which, with the other occurrences of the day, I reserved to note down when I should come to my stage. My thoughts on the sight of the moon were to this purpose

Fair Cynthia, all the homage that I may Unto a creature, unto thee I pay,
In lonesome woods to meet so kind a guide, To me's more worth than all the world beside
Some joy I felt just now, when safe got o'er Yon surly river to this rugged shore, Deeming rough welcomes from these clownish trees
Better than lodgings with Nereidees Yet swelling fears surprise, all dark appears, Nothing but light can dissipate those fears My fainting vitals can't lend strength to say,
But softly whisper, O I wish 'twere day
The murmur hardly warmed the ambient
air,
Ere thy bright aspect rescues from despair Makes the old hag her sable mantle loose, And a bright joy does through my soul diffuse
The boisterous trees now lend a passage free,
And pleasant prospects thou giv'st light to see

From hence we kept on, with more ease than before, the way being smooth and even, the night warm and serene, and the tall and thick trees at a distance, especially when the moon glared light through the branches, filled my imagination with the pleasant delusion of a sumptuous city, filled with famous buildings and churches, with their spiring steeples, balconies, galleries, and I know not what—grandeurs which I had heard of, and which the stories of foreign countries had given me the idea of

Here stood a lofty church, there is a steeple, And there the grand parade—O see the people!
That famous castle there, were I but nigh To see the moat and bridge and walls so high—
They're very fine! says my deluded eye

Being thus agreeably entertained without a thought of anything but thoughts themselves, I on a sudden was roused from these pleasing imaginations by the post's sounding his horn, which assured me he was arrived at the stage where we were to lodge, and that music was then most musical and agreeable to me

Being come to Mr Havens', I was very civilly received and courteously entertained in a clean, comfortable house, and the good woman was very active in helping off my riding clothes, and then asked what I would eat I told her I had some chocolate if she would prepare it, which with the help of some milk and a little, clean brass kettle she soon effected to my satisfaction I then betook me to my apartment, which was a little room parted from the kitchen by a single board partition, where, after I had noted the occurrences of the past day, I went to bed, which, though pretty hard, yet neat and handsome But I could get no sleep because of the clamor of some of the town toppers in next room, who were entered into a strong debate concerning the signification of the name of their country, viz, Narragansett One said it was named so by the Indians, because there grew a briar there, of a prodigious height and bigness, the like hardly ever known, called by the Indians Narragansett, and quotes an Indian of so barbarous a name for his author that I could not write it His antagonist replied no, it was from a spring it had its name, which he well knew where it was, which was extreme cold in summer and as hot as could be imagined in the winter, which was much resorted to by the natives, and by them called Narragansett (hot and cold), and that was the original of their place's name—with a thousand impertinences not worth notice, which he uttered with such a roaring voice and thundering blows with the fist of wickedness on the table that it pierced my very head. I heartily fretted, and wished 'em tonguetied, but with as little success as a friend of mine once, who was (as she said) kept a whole night awake, on a journey, by a country Lieut, and a Sergeant, Ensign, and a Deacon contriving how to bring a triangle into a square They kept calling for t'other gill, which while they were swallowing was some intermission, but presently, like oil to fire, increased the flame I set my candle on a chest by the bedside, and setting up, fell to my old way of composing my resentments, in the following manner

I ask thy aid, O potent rum!
To charm these wrangling toppers dumb.
Thou hast their giddy brains possessed—
The man confounded with the beast,
And I, poor I, can get no rest Intoxicate them with thy fumes!
O still their tongues till morning comes!

And I know not but my wishes took effect, for the dispute soon ended with t'other dram, and so good night!

Wednesday, October 4th About four in the morning, we set off for Kingston (for so was the town called) with a French doctor in our company He and the post put on very furiously, so that I could not keep up with them, only as now and then they'd stop till they see me This road was poorly furnished with accommodations for travelers, so that we were forced to ride 22 miles by the post's account, but nearer thirty by mine, before we could bait so much as our horses, which I exceedingly complained of But the post encouraged me by saying we should be well accommodated anon at Mr Devell's, a few miles further But I questioned whether we ought to go to the Devil to be helped out of affliction However, like the rest of deluded souls that post to the infernal den, we made all possible speed to this Devil's habitation, where alighting, in full assurance of good accommodation, we were going in But meeting his two daughters—as I supposed twins, they so nearly resembled each other both in features and habit, and looked as old as the Devil himself and quite as ugly—we desired entertainment, but could hardly get a word out of 'em till with our importunity, telling them our necessity, etc, they called the old sophister, who was as sparing of his words as his daughters had been, and no, or none, was the replies he made us to our demands He differed only in this from the old fellow in t'other country he let us depart However, I thought it proper to warn poor travelers to endeavor to avoid falling into circumstances like ours, which at our next stage I sat down and did as followeth

May all that dread the cruel fiend of night Keep on, and not at this cursed mansion light

'Tis hell, 'tis hell! And devils here do dwell Here dwells the Devil—surely this is hell Nothing but wants a drop to cool your tongue

Can't be procured these cruel fiends among Plenty of horrid grins and looks severe, Hunger and thirst, but pity's banished here—

The right hand keep, if hell on earth you fear!

Thus leaving this habitation of cruelty, we went forward, and arriving at an ordinary about two mile further, found tolerable accommodation. But our hostess, being a pretty full-mouthed old creature, entertained our fellow traveler, the French doctor, with innumerable complaints of her bodily infirmities, and whispered to him so loud that all the house had as full a hearing as he, which was very diverting to the company (of which there was a great many), as one might see by their sneering. But poor weary I slipped out to enter my mind in my journal, and left my great landlady with her talkative guests to themselves.

From hence we proceeded, about ten, forenoon, through the Narragansett country pretty leisurely, and about one, afternoon, came to Paukatug River, which was about two hundred paces over and now very high, and no way over to the other side but this. I dared not venture to ride through, my courage at best in such cases but small and now at the lowest ebb by reason of my weary, very weary, hungry, and uneasy circumstances. So taking leave of my company, though with no little reluctance that I could not proceed with them on my journey [I] stop at a little cottage just by the river to wait the water's falling, which the old man that lived there said would be in a little time, and he would conduct me safe over. This little hut was one of the wretchedest I ever saw a habitation for human creatures. It was supported with shores enclosed with clapboards laid on lengthwise, and so much asunder that the light came through everywhere, the door tied on with a cord in the place of hinges, the floor the bare earth, no windows but such as the thin covering afforded, nor any furniture but a bed with a glass bottle hanging at the head on it, an earthen cup, a small pewter basin, a board with sticks to stand on instead of a table, and a block or two in the corner instead of chairs. The family were the old man, his wife, and two children, all and every part being the picture of poverty. Notwithstanding, both the hut and its inhabitants were very clean and tidy, to the crossing the old proverb that bare walls make giddy housewives.

I blest myself that I was not one of this miserable crew, and the impressions their wretchedness formed in me caused me on the very spot to say

Though ill at ease, a stranger and alone,
All my fatigues shall not extort a groan These indigents have hunger with their case,

Their best is worse by half than my disease.
Their miserable hut which heat and cold Alternately without repulse do hold, Their lodgings thin and hard, their Indian fare,

Their mean apparel which the wretches wear,
And their ten thousand ills which can't be told

Makes nature e'er 'tis middle-aged look old

When I reflect, my late fatigues do seem Only a notion or forgotten dream

I had scarce done thinking, when an Indian-like animal came to the door on a creature very much like himself in mien and feature as well as ragged clothing and having 'lit, makes an awkward scratch with his Indian shoe, and a nod, sits on the block, fumbles out his black junk, dips it in the ashes, and presents it piping hot to his muscheetos, and fell to sucking like a calf without speaking for near a quarter of an hour. At length the old man said, 'How does Sarah do?' who I understood was the wretch's wife and daughter to the old man. He replied, 'As well as can be expected, etc.' So I remembered the old say, and supposed I knew Sarah's case. But he being, as I understood, going over the river, as ugly as he was, I was glad to ask him to show me the way to Saxton's at Stonington, which he promising, I ventured over with the old man's assistance, who having rewarded to content, with my tatter-tailed guide I rode on very slowly through Stonington, where the road was very stony and uneven I asked the fellow, as we went, divers questions of the place and way, etc I, being arrived at my country, Saxton's at Stonington, was very well accommodated both as to victuals and lodging, the only good of both I had found since my setting out Here I heard there was an old man and his daughter to come that way, bound to New London, and being now destitute of a guide, gladly waited for them, being in so good a harbor, and accordingly, Thursday, October the 5th, about 3 in the afternoon, I set forward with neighbor Polly and Jemima, a girl about 18 years old, whom he said he had been to fetch out of the Narragansetts, and said they had ridden thirty miles that day, on a sorry lean jade, with only a bag under her for a pillion, which the poor girl often complained was very uneasy

We made good speed along, which made poor Jemima make many a sour face, the mare being a very hard trotter, and after many a hearty and bitter 'Oh!' she at length lowed out 'Lawful heart, father! This bare mare hurts me dingeely, I'm direful sore I vow,' with many words to that purpose 'Poor child,' says gaffer, 'she used to serve your mother so 'I don't care how mother used to do,' quoth Jemima in a passionate tone, at which the old man laughed,

About seven that evening we came to New London Ferry, here, by reason of a very high wind, we met with great difficulty in getting over—the boat tossed exceedingly, and our horses capered at a very surprizing rate and set us all in a fright, especially poor Jemima, who desired her father to say, 'So, Jack' to the jade to make her stand But the careless parent taking no notice of her repeated desires, she roared out in a passionate manner 'Pray sooth, father, are you deaf? Say, "So, Jack," to the jade, I tell you' The dutiful parent obeys, saying, 'So, Jack, so, Jack,' as gravely as if he'd been to saying catechism after young Miss, who with her fright looked of all colors in the rainbow

Being safely arrived at the house of Mrs Prentice's in N London, I treated neighbor Polly and daughter for their diverting company and bid them farewell, and between nine and ten at night waited on the Reverend Mr Gurdon Saltonstall, minister of the town, who kindly invited me to stay that night at his house, where I was very handsomely and plentifully treated and lodged, and made good the great character I had before heard concerning him, viz, that he was the most affable, courteous, generous, and best of men

Dover, August 28, 1780

My dear Sir,—

After I had wrote what I suppose you have got before now, I received yours of the 9th inst, which fully accounts for your not coming here, and not only so, but 'leaves me to judge your feelings under such a disappointment' This is nearly the language of my last to you, so that it seems we have had mutual feelings on the occasion, and these you know are in many cases the best criterion of truth

<sup>1</sup> The selection is from a letter first published in V Coll of the Mass Hist Soc, II, 69-75, in which has been substituted the version of Green's parody as printed in the London Magazine for Nov 1733, and to which Byles' rejoinder has been added, as published in Duyckinck, E A and G L., eds., Cyclopedia of American Literature (N Y, 1855), I, 122 The titles to the selection and the last hymn have been supplied, and the text modernized by the editors Byles' original hymn was included in his Poems on Several Occasions (Boston, 1736)

'The Hymn composed for Dr B' you request, and his parody upon it The former I will give you, after first acquainting you with the occasion of it, as I had it from his own mouth some years ago N B He would not let me have a copy of his parody The story is this When Belcher was Governor, he undertook a voyage to the eastward to treat with the Indians, and carried Byles (who was his nephew) as a chaplain. The ship sailed on a Sunday P M after service, but the weather was such that they were at sea the next Sunday, and it was necessary to perform Divine service on shipboard. B had forgot his psalm-book, and the ship did not furnish one, so his ingenuity was set to work to supply the defect, which he did by composing an hymn 'Upon the Objects then in View'. The hymn is printed in his collection, but because you may not have seen it I will transcribe it —

UPON THE OBJECTS THEN IN VIEW

Great God! Thy works our wonder raise,
To Thee our swelling notes belong, While skies and winds and rocks and seas Around shall echo to our song

Thy power produced this mighty frame, Aloud to Thee the tempests roar,
Or softer breezes tune Thy name Gently along the shelly shore

Round thee the scaly nation roves, Thy opening hand their joys bestow,
Through all the blushing coral groves,
These silent gay retreats below

See the broad sun forsake the skies, Glow on the waves, and downward slide, Anon! heaven opens all its eyes,
And starbeams tremble in the tide

Each various scene, or day, or night, Lord, points to Thee our ravish'd soul, Thy glories fix our whole delight,
So the touch'd needle courts the pole.

The singing of this hymn furnished Joseph Green with the hint for the following piece of satire —

HYMN COMPOSED FOR DR. B

In David's Psalms an oversight Byles found one morning o'er his tea Alas! why did not David write A proper psalm to sing at sea?

Thus ruminating on his feat, Ambitious thoughts at length prevailed,
The bard determined to complete The part in which the prophet failed

Awhile he paused, and stroked his Muse,<sup>1</sup>
Then, taking up his tuneful pen, Wrote a few stanzas for the use Of his seafaring bretheren

The task performed, the bard content (Well chosen was each flowing word), On a short voyage himself he went,
To hear it read and sung on board

What extasies of joy appear,
What pleasures and unknown delights Thrilled the vain poet's soul to hear Others repeat the things he writes

Most aged Christians do aver (Their credit sure we may rely on),
In former times that, after prayer,
They used to sing a song of Zion

Our modern parson having prayed (Unless loud fame our faith beguiles), Sat down, took out his book, and said,
'Let's sing a song of Mather Byles'

As soon as he began to read,
The heads th' assembly downward hung,
But he with boldness did proceed,
And thus he read, and thus they sung,—

THE HYMN

With vast amazement we survey
The wonders of the deep,
Where mack'rel swim, and porpoise play,
And crabs and lobsters creep

Fish of all kinds inhabit there,
And throng the dark abode,
There haddock, hake, and flounders are,
And eels, and perch, and cod

From raging winds and tempests free,
So smooth that, as you pass,
The shining surface seems to be A piece of Bristol glass

<sup>1</sup> Alluding to his remarkable fondness for a cat, which was jocosely called his "Muse," and on the death of which Green wrote an Elegy. Belknap's note, V Coll of the Mass Hist Soc, 11, 71

But when the winds tempestuous rise,
And foaming billows swell,
The vessel mounts above the skies,
Then lower sinks than hell

Our brains the tott'ring motion feel,
And quickly we become Giddy as new-dropped calves, and reel
Like Indians drunk with rum

What praises then are due, that we Thus far have safely got,
Amariscoggin tribe to see,
And tribe of Penobscot!

Much of the fun of the piece consists in its being formed, as Byles's real hymn was, on the objects then present. The ship at sea within view of the shore, the rising and falling of the waves, the rocks, the fish, the sun setting, the evening approaching, the needle in the binacle,—these were Byles's real objects. Green has funnified the mass of these, and has added the Indians, who were the principal objects of the voyage, and the rum which was on board to treat them with, as very important hints in such an occasional ode. If I can by any means get a copy of the parody (which by the by is a very good one, and turned the laugh upon Green in the time of it), I will send it you

HYMN COMPOSED FOR MR. G.

In Byles's works an oversight Green spy'd, as once he smoked his chunk,
Alas! that Byles should never write A song to sing, when folks are drunk

Thus in the chimney on his block, Ambition fired the 'stiller's pate,
He summoned all his little stock,
The poet's volume to complete

Long paused the lout, and scratched his skull
Then took his chalk (he owned no pen),
And scrawled some doggrel, for the whole Of his flip-drinking brethren

The task performed—not to content—Ill-chosen was each Grub-street word, Straight to the tavern club he went,
To hear it bellowed round the board

Unknown delights his ears explore, Inured to midnight caterwauls,
To hear his hoarse companions roar,
The horrid thing his dullness scrawls

The club, if fame we may rely on, Convened, to hear the drunken catch,
At the Three Horse Shoes, or Red Lion—Tippling began the night's debauch.

The little 'stiller took the pint 10 Full fraught with flip and songs obscene, And, after a long stutt'ring, meant To sing a song of Josy Green

Soon as with stam'ring tongue, to read The drunken ballad, he began,
The club from clam'ring straight recede,
To hear him roar the thing alone

SONG

With vast amazement we survey 20 The can so broad, so deep, Where punch succeeds to strong sangree, Both to delightful flip

Drink of all smacks, inhabit here,
And throng the dark abode,
Here's rum, and sugar, and small beer,
In a continual flood

From cruel thoughts and conscience free, 30 From dram to dram we pass Our cheeks, like apples, ruddy be,
Our eyeballs look like glass

At once, like furies up we rise,
Our raging passions swell,
We hurl the bottle to the skies,
But why, we cannot tell

Our brains a tott'ring motion feel,
40 And quickly we become Sick, as with negro steaks, and reel
Like Indians drunk with rum

Thus lost in deep tranquillity,
We sit, supine and sot, Till we two moons distinctly see—Come give us t'other pot

I am your faithful and much obliged friend and servant,

HYMN TO THE MORNING <sup>1</sup>

AWAKE, my soul, and with the constant morn
Carol th' Almighty's praise, awake and tune
The vocal shell to sympathetic sounds And heav'nly consort See! the radiant sun Stains with ethereal gold the varied east And vast expanse, behold! with giant stride
He' advances ruddy, and with hum returns
The sweet vicissitude of day, and all Th' obsequious train of filial colors Now
The vivid green extends her welcome sway O'er the sequestered lawns and smiling meads, 11
And now the purpled violet resumes Its costly dye, and all th' extended plains Confess th' Almighty's hand, of ornament Profuse Behold! with fleshy pink they smile
Enameled, and the daisy's dwarfy bloom
Of pallid hue, and gorgeous marigold

On ev'ry grassy sprig a pearly drop Hangs wav'ring, and with varied ray proclaims Its great progenitor The liquid gem, 20
Pendent and tremulous, with rival gleam Mimics the lustre of its parent orb.
Vain Man's best emblem! who, with borrowed light Which ev'ry touch destroys, against his God
Dares wage an impious and gigantic war

From downy nest of artificial weft
The sedulous arlings rise, and to their task Hie joyous Or with gamesome wing they cut
The yielding fluent, and with transient touch 29
Skim the moist element in sportive whirl,
Or else to studious wand'rer's curious view Delightful, they collect their grainy food And masticative stones But heark! the grove,
Respondent to the tuneful choir, resound Celestial symphony The speckled thrush Of various note, and blackbird's piercing sound,

SONG

YOUNG poets in love
Will call from above
Cytherea, drest all in her graces and airs,
And will tell their fond dreams of Ida's soft grove,
Of cupids, of doves, and of cars.

Some Chloe beside,
Or Sylvia must hide
The name of the fair that possesses their
heart,
Thus sighing in pomp of poetical pride,
They vainly make show of their art 10

No poet am I,
 And no dame of the sky,
 No fiction, shall ever disgrace my bright
 flame,
 That truth is most beautiful, none will deny,
 When I tell them that —— is her name

Then fill up my glass;
 Here's a health to the lass!
 As for Venus, I fairly now bid you adieu; Since on her you can never reflect any praise,
 I'll not labor to compliment you. 20

WILLIAM BYRD

1674-1744

A PROGRESS TO THE MINES,

SEPT 18 For the pleasure of the good company of Mrs Byrd, and her little governor, my son, I went about halfway to the falls in the chariot There we halted, not far from a purling stream, and upon the stump of a propagate oak picked the bones of a piece of roast beef By the spirit which that gave me, I was the better able to part with the dear companions of my travels, and to perform the rest of my journey on horseback by myself I reached Shacoe's before two o'clock, and crossed the river to the mills I had the grief to find them both stand as still for the want of water as a dead woman's tongue for want of breath It had rained so little for many weeks above the falls that the naiads had hardly water enough left to wash their faces However, as we ought to turn all our misfortunes to the best advantage, I directed Mr Booker, my first minister there, to make use of the lowness of the water for blowing up the rocks at the mouth of the canal For that purpose I ordered iron drills to be made about two foot long, pointed with steel, chisel-fashion, in order to make holes, into which we put our cartridges of powder, containing each about three ounces There wanted skill among my engineers to choose the best parts of the stone for boring, that we might blow to the most advantage They made all their holes quite perpendicular, whereas they should have humored the grain of the stone for the more effectual execution I ordered the points of the drills to be made chisel-way, rather than the diamond, that they might need to be seldomer repaired, though in stone the diamond points would make the most dispatch The water now flowed out of the river so slowly that the miller was obliged to pond it up in the canal by setting open the flood-gates at the mouth and shutting those close at the mill By this contrivance, he was able at any time to grind two or three bushels, either for his choice customers or for the use of my plantations Then I walked to the place where they broke the flax, which is wrought with much greater ease than the hemp, and is much better for spinning From thence I paid a visit to the weaver, who needed a little of Minerva's inspiration to make the most of a piece of fine cloth Then I looked in upon my Caledonian spinster, who was mended more in her looks than in her humor. However, she promised much, though at the same time intended to perform little She is too high-spirited for Mr Booker, who hates to have his sweet temper ruffled, and will rather suffer matters to go a little wrong sometimes than give his righteous spirit any uneasiness He is very honest, and would make an admirable overseer where servants will do as they are bid But eye-servants, who want abundance of overlooking, are not so proper to be committed to his care I found myself out of order and for that reason retired early, yet with all this precaution had a gentle fever in the night, but towards morning nature sat open all her gates, and drove it out in a plentiful perspiration .

20 I continued the bark, and then tossed down my poached eggs, with as much ease as some good breeders slip children into the world About nine I left the prudentest orders I could think of with my vizier, and then crossed the river to Shacoe's. I made a running visit to three of my quarters, where, besides finding all the people well, I had the pleasure to see better crops than usual, both of corn and tobacco. I parted there with my intendant, and pursued my journey to Mr. Randolph's, at Tuckahoe, without meeting with any adventure by the way. Here I found Mrs. Fleming, who was packing up her baggage with design to follow her husband the next day, who was gone to a new settlement in Goochland. Both he and she have been about seven years persuading themselves to remove to that retired part of the country, though they had the two strong arguments of health and interest for so doing. The widow smiled graciously upon me, and entertained me very handsomely. Here I learned all the tragical story of her daughter's humble marriage with her uncle's overseer. Besides the meanness of this mortal's aspect, the man has not one visible qualification, except impudence, to recommend him to a female's inclinations. But there is sometimes such a charm in that Hibernian endowment that frail woman can't withstand it, though it stand alone without any other recommendation. Had she run away with a gentleman or a pretty fellow, there might have been some excuse for her, though he were of inferior fortune, but to stoop to a dirty plebeian, without any kind of merit, is the lowest prostitution. I found the family justly enraged at it, and though I had more good nature than to join in her condemnation, yet I could devise no excuse for so senseless a prank as this young gentlewoman had played. Here good drink was more scarce than good victuals, the family being reduced to the last bottle of wine, which was therefore husbanded very carefully. But the water was excellent. The heir of the family did not come home till late in the evening. He is a pretty young man, but had the misfortune to become his own master too soon. This puts young fellows upon wrong pursuits before they have sense to judge rightly for themselves, though at the same time they have a strange conceit of their own sufficiency, when they grow near twenty years old, especially if they happen to have a small smattering of learning. 'Tis then they fancy themselves wiser than all their tutors and governors, which makes them headstrong to all advice, and above all reproof and admonition.

21 I was sorry in the morning to find myself stopped in my career by bad weather brought upon us by a northeast wind. This drives a world of raw, unkindly vapors upon us from Newfoundland, laden with blight, coughs, and pleurisies. However, I complained not, lest I might be suspected to be tired of the good company, though Mrs. Fleming was not so much upon her guard, but mutinied strongly at the rain that hindered her from pursuing her dear husband. I said what I could to comfort a gentlewoman under so sad a disappointment. I told her a husband that stayed so much at home as her's did could be no such violent rarity, as for a woman to venture her precious health to go daggling through the rain after him, or to be miserable if she happened to be prevented. That it was prudent for married people to fast sometimes from one another, that they might come together again with the better stomach. That the best things in this world, if constantly used, are apt to be cloying, which a little absence and abstinence would prevent. Thus was strange doctrine to a fond female, who fancies people should love with as little reason after marriage as before. In the afternoon Monsieur Marij, the minister of the parish, came to make me a visit. He had been a Romish priest, but found reasons, either spiritual or temporal, to quit that gay religion. The fault of this new convert is that he looks for as much respect from his Protestant flock as is paid to the popish clergy, which our ill-bred Huguenots don't understand. Madam Marij had so much curiosity as to want to come too, but another horse was wanting, and she believed it would have too vulgar an air to ride behind her husband. This woman was of the true exchange breed, full of discourse but void of discretion, and married a parson with the idle hopes he might some time or other come to be his grace of Canterbury. The gray mare is the better horse in that family, and the poor man submits to her wild vagaries for peace's sake. She has just enough of the fine lady to run in debt and be of no signification in her household. And the only thing that can prevent her from undoing her loving husband will be that nobody will trust them beyond the 16,000,<sup>1</sup> which is soon run out in a Goochland store. The way of dealing there is for some small merchant or pedlar to buy a Scotch pennyworth of goods, and clap 150 per cent upon that. At this rate the parson can't be paid much more for his preaching than 'tis worth. No sooner was our visitor retired, but the facetious widow was so kind as to let me into all this secret history, but was at the same time exceedingly sorry that the woman should be so indiscreet, and the man so tame as to be governed by an unprofitable and fantastical wife.

22 We had another wet day, to try both Mrs Fleming's patience and my good breeding. The northeast wind commonly sticks by us three or four days, filling the atmosphere with damps, injurious both to man and beast. The worst of it was, we had no good liquor to warm our blood, and fortify our spirits against so strong a malignity. However, I was cheerful under all these misfortunes, and expressed no concern but a decent fear lest my long visit might be troublesome. Since I was like to have thus much leisure, I endeavored to find out what subject a dull married man could introduce that might best bring the widow to the use of her tongue. At length I discovered she was a notable quack, and therefore paid that regard to her knowledge as to put some questions to her about the bad distemper that raged then in the country. I mean the bloody flux, that was brought us in the negro-ship consigned to Col Braxton. She told me she made use of very simple remedies in that case, with very good success. She did the business either with Hartshorn drink, that had plantain leaves boiled in it, or else with a strong decoction of St Andrew's Cross, in new milk instead of water. I agreed with her that those remedies might be very good, but would be more effectual after a dose or two of Indian physic. But for fear this conversation might be too grave for a widow, I turned the discourse, and began to talk of plays, and finding her taste lay most towards comedy, I offered my service to read one to her, which she kindly accepted. She produced the second part of The Beggar's Opera, which had diverted the town for 40 nights successively, and gained four thousand pounds to the author. This was not owing altogether to the wit or humor that sparkled in it, but to some political reflections that seemed to hit the ministry. But the great advantage of the author was that his interest was solicited by the Duchess of Queensbury, which no man could refuse who had but half an eye in his head, or half a guinea in his pocket. Her grace, like Death, spared nobody, but even took my Lord Selkirk in for two guineas, to repair which extravagance he lived upon Scotch herrings two months afterwards. But the best story was, she made a very smart officer in his majesty's guards give her a guinea, who swearing at the same time 'twas all he had in the world, she sent him fifty for it the next day, to reward his obedience. After having acquainted my company with the history of the play, I read three acts of it, and left Mrs Fleming and Mr Randolph to finish it, who read as well as most actors do at a rehearsal. Thus we killed the time, and triumphed over the bad weather.

23 The clouds continued to drive from the northeast, and to menace us with more rain. But as the lady resolved to venture through it, I thought it a shame for me to venture to flinch. Therefore, after fortifying myself with two capacious dishes of coffee, and making my compliments to the ladies, I mounted, and Mr Randolph was so kind as to be my guide. At the distance of about three miles, in a path as narrow as that which leads to heaven, but much more dirty, we reached the homely dwelling of the Reverend Mr Marij. His land is much more barren than his wife, and needs all Mr Bradley's skill in agriculture to make it bring corn. Thence we proceeded five miles farther, to a mill of Mr Randolph's, that is apt to stand still when there falls but little rain, and to be carried away when there falls a great deal. Then we pursued a very blind path four miles farther, which puzzled my guide, who I suspect led me out of the way. At length we came into a great road, where he took leave, after giving me some very confused directions, and so left me to blunder out the rest of the journey by myself. I lost myself more than once, but soon recovered the right way again. About three miles after quitting my guide, I passed the south branch of Pamunkey River, near fifty yards over, and full of stones. After this, I had eight miles to Mr Chiswell's, where I arrived at about two o'clock, and saved my dinner. I was very handsomely entertained, finding every thing very clean, and very good. I had not seen Mrs Chiswell in twenty-four years, which, alas! had made great havoc with her pretty face, and plowed very deep furrows in her fair skin. It was impossible to know her again, so much the flower was faded. However, though she was grown an old woman, yet she was one of those absolute rarities, a very good old woman. I found Mr Chiswell a sensible, well-bred man, and very frank in communicating his knowledge in the mystery of making iron, wherein he has had long experience. I told him I was come to spy the land, and inform myself of the expense of carrying on an iron work with effect, that I sought my instruction from him, who understood the whole mystery, having gained full experience in every part of it, only I was very sorry he had bought that experience so dear. He answered that he would, with great sincerity, let me into the little knowledge he had, and so we immediately entered upon the business.

27 I took my leave about ten, and drove over a spacious level road ten miles, to a bridge built over the river Po, which is one of the four branches of the Mattaponi, about forty yards wide. Two miles beyond that, we passed by a plantation belonging to the Company, of about 500 acres, where they keep a great number of oxen to relieve those that have dragged their loaded carts thus far. Three miles farther we came to the Germanna road, where I quitted the chair and continued my journey on horse-back. I rode eight miles together over a stony road, and had on either side continual poisoned fields, with nothing but saplings growing on them. Then I came into the main county road, that leads from Fredericksburg to Germanna, which last place I reached in ten miles more. This famous town consists of Colonel Spotswood's enchanted castle on one side of the street, and a baker's dozen of ruinous tenements on the other, where so many German families had dwelt some years ago, but are now removed ten miles higher, in the fork of Rappahannock, to land of their own. There had also been a chapel about a bow-shot from the Colonel's house, at the end of an avenue of cherry trees, but some pious people had lately burnt it down, with intent to get another built nearer to their own homes. Here I arrived about three o'clock, and found only Mrs Spotswood at home, who received her old acquaintance with many a gracious smile. I was carried into a room elegantly set off with pier glasses, the largest of which came soon after to an odd misfortune. Amongst other favorite animals that cheered this lady's solitude, a brace of tame deer ran familiarly about the house, and one of them came to stare at me as a stranger. But unluckily spying his own figure in the glass, he made a spring over the tea table that stood under it and shattered the glass to pieces, and falling back upon the tea table, made a terrible fracas among the china. This exploit was so sudden and accompanied with such a noise that it surprised me, and perfectly frightened Mrs Spotswood. But 'twas worth all the damage to show the moderation and good humor with which she bore this disaster. In the evening the noble Colonel came home from his mines, who saluted me very civilly, and Mrs Spotswood's sister, Miss Theky, who had been to meet him en cavalier, was so kind too as to bid me welcome. We talked over a legend of old stories, supped about nine, and then prattled with the ladies, till 'twas time for a traveler to retire. In the meantime I observed my old friend to be very uxorious, and exceedingly fond of his children. This was so opposite to the maxims he used to preach up before he was married that I could not forbear rubbing up the memory of them. But he gave a very good-natured turn to his change of sentiments by alleging that whoever brings a poor gentlewoman into so solitary a place, from all her friends and acquaintance, would be ungrateful not to use her and all that belongs to her with all possible tenderness.

28 We all kept snug in our several apartments till nine, except Miss Theky, who was the housewife of the family. At that hour we met over a pot of coffee, which was not quite strong enough to give us the palsy. After breakfast the Colonel and I left the ladies to their domestic affairs and took a turn in the garden, which has nothing beautiful but three terrace walks that fall in slopes one below another I let him understand that besides the pleasure of paying him a visit I came to be instructed by so great a master in the mystery of making of iron, wherein he had led the way and was the Tubal Cain of Virginia He corrected me a little there, by assuring me he was not only the first in this country but the first in North America who had erected a regular furnace That they ran altogether upon bloomeries in New England and Pennsylvania, till his example had made them attempt greater works But in this last colony, they have so few ships to carry their iron to Great Britain that they must be content to make it only for their own use, and must be obliged to manufacture it when they have done That he hoped he had done the country very great service by setting so good an example That the four furnaces now at work in Virginia circulated a great sum of money for provisions and all other necessities in the adjacent counties That they took off a great number of hands from planting tobacco and employed them in works that produced a large sum of money in England to the persons concerned, whereby the country is so much the richer That they are besides a considerable advantage to Great Britain, because it lessens the quantity of bar iron imported from Spain, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and Muscovy, which used to be no less than 20,000 tons yearly, though at the same time no sow iron is imported thither from any country but only from the plantations For most of this bar iron they do not only pay silver, but our friends in the Baltic are so nice, they even expect to be paid all in crown pieces On the contrary, all the iron they receive from the plantations, they pay for it in their own manufactures, and send for it in their own shipping Then I inquired after his own mines, and hoped, as he was the first that engaged in this great undertaking, that he had brought them to the most perfection He told me he had iron in several parts of his great tract of land, consisting of 45,000 acres But that the mine he was at work upon was thirteen miles below Germanna That his ore (which was very rich) he raised a mule from his furnace, and was obliged to cart the iron, when it was made, fifteen miles to Massaponax, a plantation he had upon Rappahannock River, but that the road was exceeding good, gently declining all the way, and had no more than one hill to go up in the whole journey For this reason his loaded carts went in a day without difficulty He said it was true his works were of the oldest standing but that his long absence in England and the wretched management of Mr Greame, whom he had entrusted with his affairs, had put him back very much That what with neglect and severity, above eighty of his slaves were lost while he was in England, and most of his cattle starved That his furnace stood still great part of the time, and all his plantations ran to ruin. That indeed he was rightly served for committing his affairs to the care of a mathematician, whose thoughts were always among the stars That nevertheless, since his return, he had applied himself to rectify his steward's mistakes and bring his business again into order That now he had contrived to do everything with his own people except raising the mine and running the iron, by which he had contracted his expense very much Nay, he believed that by his directions he could bring sensible negroes to perform those parts of the work tolerably well But at the same time he gave me to understand that his furnace had done no great feats lately, because he had been taken up in building an air furnace at Massaponax, which he had now brought to perfection, and should be thereby able to furnish the whole country with all sorts of cast iron, as cheap and as good as ever came from England I told him he must do one thing more to have a full vent for those commodities, he must keep a shallop running into all the rivers, to carry his wares home to people's own doors And if he would do that I would set a good example, and take of a whole ton of them Our conversation on this subject continued till dinner, which was both elegant and plentiful The afternoon was devoted to the ladies, who showed me one of their most beautiful walks They conducted me through a shady lane to the landing, and by the way made me drink some very fine water that issued from a marble fountain, and ran incessantly Just behind it was a covered bench, where Miss Theky often sat and bewailed her virginity. Then we proceeded to the river, which is the south branch of Rappahannock, about fifty yards wide, and so rapid that the ferry boat is drawn over by a chain, and therefore called the Rapidan. At night we drank prosperity to all the Colonel's projects in a bowl of rack punch, and then retired to our devotions.

29 Having employed about two hours in retirement, I sallied out at the first summons to breakfast, where our conversation with the ladies, like whip syllabub, was very pretty, but had nothing in it. Thus it seems was Miss Theky's birthday, upon which I made her my compliments, and wished she might live twice as long a married woman as she had lived a maid. I did not presume to pry into the secret of her age, nor was she forward to disclose it, for this humble reason, lest I should think her wisdom fell short of her years. She contrived to make this day of her birth a day of mourning, for having nothing better at present to set her affections upon, she had a dog that was a great favorite. It happened that very morning the poor cur had done something very uncleanly upon the Colonel's bed, for which he was condemned to die. However, upon her entreaty, she got him a reprieve, but was so concerned that so much severity should be intended on her birthday that she was not to be comforted, and lest such another accident might oust the poor cur of his clergy, she protested she would board out her dog at a neighbor's house, where she hoped he would be more kindly treated. Then the Colonel and I took another turn in the garden, to discourse farther on the subject of iron. He was very frank in communicating all his dear-bought experience to me, and told me very civilly he would not only let me into the whole secret, but would make a journey to James River and give me his faithful opinion of all my conveniences. For his part he wished there were many more iron-works in the country, provided the parties concerned would preserve a constant harmony among themselves, and meet and consult frequently what might be for their common advantage. By this they might be better able to manage the workmen, and reduce their wages to what was just and reasonable.

After this frank speech, he began to explain the whole charge of an iron-work. He said there ought at least to be an hundred negroes employed in it, and those upon good land would make corn and raise provisions enough to support themselves and the cattle, and do every other part of the business. That the furnace might be built for £700, and made ready to go to work, if I went the nearest way to do it, especially since, coming after so many, I might correct their errors and avoid their miscarriages. That if I had ore and wood enough, and a convenient stream of water to set the furnace upon, having neither too much nor too little water, I might undertake the affair with a full assurance of success, provided the distance of carting be not too great, which is exceedingly burdensome. That there must be abundance of wheel carriages shod with iron and several teams of oxen provided to transport the wood that is to be coaled, and afterwards the coal and ore to the furnace, and last of all the sow iron to the nearest water carriage, and carry back limestone and other necessities from thence to the works, and a sloop also would be useful to carry the iron on board the ships, the masters not being always in the humor to fetch it. Then he enumerated the people that were to be hired, viz a founder, a mine-raiser, a collier, a stock-taker, a clerk, a smith, a carpenter, a wheelwright, and several carters. That these altogether will be a standing charge of about £500 a year. That the amount of freight, custom, commission and other charges in England, comes to 27s a ton. But that the merchants yearly find out means to inflame the account with new articles, as they do in those of tobacco. That, upon the whole matter, the expenses here and in England may be computed modestly at £3 a ton. And the rest that the iron sells for will be clear gain, to pay for the land and negroes, which 'tis to be hoped will be £3 more for every ton that is sent over. As this account agreed pretty near with that which Mr Chiswell had given me, I set it down (notwithstanding it may seem a repetition of the same thing) to prove that both these gentlemen were sincere in their representations. We had a Michaelmas goose for dinner, of Miss Theky's own raising, who was now good-natured enough to forget the jeopardy of her dog In the afternoon we walked in a meadow by the riverside, which winds in the form of a horseshoe about Germanna, making it a peninsula containing about 400 acres Rappahannock forks about fourteen miles below this place, the northern branch being the larger, and consequently must be the river that bounds my lord Fairfax's grant of the northern neck.

SARAH PIERREPONT <sup>1</sup>

THEY say there is a young lady in [New Haven] who is beloved of that Great Being, who made and rules the world, and that there are certain seasons in which this Great Being, in some way or other invisible, comes to her and fills her mind with exceeding sweet delight, and that she hardly cares for anything, except to meditate on Him—that she expects after a while to be received up where He is, to be raised up out of the world and caught up into heaven, being assured that He loves her too well to let her remain at a distance from Him always There she is to dwell with Him, and to be ravished with His love and delight forever Therefore, if you present all the world before her, with the richest of its treasures, she disregards it and cares not for it, and is unmindful of any pain or affliction She has a strange sweetness in her mind, and singular purity in her affections, is most just and conscientious in all her conduct, and you could not persuade her to do any thing wrong or sinful, if you would give her all the world, lest she should offend this Great Being She is of a wonderful sweetness, calmness and universal benevolence of mind, especially after this Great God has manifested Himself to her mind She will sometimes go about from place to place, singing sweetly, and seems to be always full of joy and pleasure, and no one knows for what She loves to be alone, walking in the fields and groves, and seems to have some one invisible always conversing with her

NATURE <sup>2</sup>

WE have shown that the Son of God created the world for this very end, to communicate Himself in an image of His own excellency He communicates Himself properly only to spirits, and they only are capable of being proper images of His excellency, for they only are properly 'beings,' as we have shown Yet He communicates a sort of a shadow or glimpse of His excellencies to bodies which, as we have shown, are but the shadows of beings and not real beings He who, by His immediate influence, gives being every moment, and by His spirit actuates the world, because He inclines to communicate Himself and His excellencies, doth doubtless communicate His excellency to bodies, as far as there is any consent or analogy And the beauty of face and sweet airs in men are not always the effect of the corresponding excellencies of mind, yet the beauties of nature are really emanations or shadows of the excellency of the Son of God

So that, when we are delighted with flowery meadows and gentle breezes of wind, we may consider that we see only the emanations of the sweet benevolence of Jesus Christ When we behold the fragrant rose and lily, we see His love and purity So the green trees and fields, and singing of birds, are the emanations of His infinite joy and benignity The easiness and naturalness of trees and vines are shadows of His beauty and loveliness The crystal rivers and murmuring streams are the footsteps of His favor, grace, and beauty. When we behold the light and brightness of the sun, the golden edges of an evening cloud, or the beauteous bow, we behold the adumbrations of His glory and goodness, and in the blue sky, of His mildness and gentleness. There are also many things wherein we may behold His awful majesty in the sun in His strength, in comets, in thunder, in the hovering thunderclouds, in ragged rocks and the brows of mountains. That beauteous light with which the world is filled in a clear day is a lively shadow of His spotless holiness, and happiness and delight in communicating Himself. And doubtless this is a reason that Christ is compared so often to those things, and called by their names, as the Sun of Righteousness, the morning-star, the rose of Sharon, and lily of the valley, the apple-tree among trees of the wood, a bundle of myrrh, a roe, or a young hart. By this we may discover the beauty of many of those metaphors and similes which to an unphilosophical person do seem so uncouth.

In like manner, when we behold the beauty of man's body in its perfection, we still see like emanations of Christ's divine perfections, although they do not always flow from the mental excellencies of the person that has them. But we see the most proper image of the beauty of Christ when we see beauty in the human soul.

PERSONAL NARRATIVE <sup>1</sup>

I HAD a variety of concerns and exercises about my soul from my childhood, but had two more remarkable seasons of awakening, before I met with that change by which I was brought to those new dispositions, and that new sense of things, that I have since had. The first time was when I was a boy, some years before I went to college, at a time of remarkable awakening in my father's congregation. I was then very much affected for many months, and concerned about the things of religion, and my soul's salvation, and was abundant in duties. I used to pray five times a day in secret, and to spend much time in religious talk with other boys, and used to meet with them to pray together. I experienced I know not what kind of delight in religion. My mind was much engaged in it, and had much self-righteous pleasure, and it was my delight to abound in religious duties. I with some of my schoolmates joined together, and built a booth in a swamp, in a very retired spot, for a place of prayer. And besides, I had particular secret places of my own in the woods, where I used to retire by myself, and was from time to time much affected. My affections seemed to be lively and easily moved, and I seemed to be in my element when engaged in religious duties. And I am ready to think, many are deceived with such affections, and such a kind of delight as I then had in religion, and mistake it for grace.

But in process of time, my convictions and affections wore off, and I entirely lost all those affections and delights and left off secret prayer, at least as to any constant performance of it, and returned like a dog to his vomit, and went on in the ways of sin. Indeed I was at times very uneasy, especially towards the latter part of my time at college, when it pleased God, to seize me with the pleurisy, in which he brought me nigh to the grave, and shook me over the pit of hell. And yet, it was not long after my recovery, before I fell again into my old ways of sin. But God would not suffer me to go on with my quietness, I had great and violent inward struggles, till, after many conflicts, with wicked inclinations, repeated resolutions, and bonds that I laid myself under by a kind of vows to God, I was brought wholly to break off all former wicked ways, and all ways of known outward sin, and to apply myself to seek salvation, and practice many religious duties, but without that kind of affection and delight which I had formerly experienced. My concern now wrought more by inward struggles and conflicts, and self-reflections. I made seeking my salvation the main business of my life. But yet, it seems to me, I sought after a miserable manner, which has made me sometimes since to question, whether ever it issued in that which was saving, being ready to doubt, whether such miserable seeking ever succeeded. I was indeed brought to seek salvation in a manner that I never was before, I felt a spirit to part with all things in the world, for an interest in Christ.—My concern continued and prevailed, with many exercising thoughts and inward struggles, but yet it never seemed to be proper to express that concern by the name of terror

From my childhood up, my mind had been full of objections against the doctrine of God's sovereignty, in choosing whom He would to eternal life, and rejecting whom He pleased, leaving them eternally to perish, and be everlastingly tormented in hell It used to appear like a horrible doctrine to me But I remember the time very well, when I seemed to be convinced, and fully satisfied, as to this sovereignty of God, and His justice in thus eternally disposing of men according to His sovereign pleasure. But never could give an account, how, or by what means, I was thus convinced, not in the least imagining at the time, nor a long time after, that there was any extraordinary influence of God's Spirit in it, but only that now I saw further, and my reason apprehended the justice and reasonableness of it However, my mind rested in it, and it put an end to all those cavils and objections. And there has been a wonderful alteration in my mind, with respect to the doctrine of God's sovereignty, from that day to this, so that I scarce ever have found so much as the rising of an objection against it, in the most absolute sense, in God's shewing mercy to whom He will shew mercy, and hardening whom He will God's absolute sovereignty and justice, with respect to salvation and damnation, is what my mind seems to rest assured of, as much as of any thing that I see with my eyes, at least it is so at times But I have often, since that first conviction, had quite another kind of sense of God's sovereignty than I had then I have often since had not only a conviction, but a delightful conviction The doctrine has very often appeared exceeding pleasant, bright, and sweet

Absolute sovereignty is what I love to ascribe to God But my first conviction was not so

The first instance that I remember of that sort of inward, sweet delight in God and divine things that I have lived much in since, was on reading those words, 1 Tim 1:17 'Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory forever and ever, Amen' As I read the words, there came into my soul, and was as it were diffused through it, a sense of the glory of the Divine Being, a new sense, quite different from any thing I ever experienced before Never any words of scripture seemed to me as these words did I thought within myself, how excellent a being that was, and how happy I should be, if I might enjoy that God, and be wrapt up in heaven, and be as it were swallowed up in Him forever! I kept saying, and as it were singing over these words of scripture to myself, and went to pray to God that I might enjoy Him, and prayed in a manner quite different from what I used to do, with a new sort of affection But it never came into my thought, that there was any thing spiritual, or of a saving nature in this

From about that time, I began to have a new kind of apprehensions and ideas of Christ, and the work of redemption, and the glorious way of salvation by Him An inward, sweet sense of these things, at times, came into my heart, and my soul was led away in pleasant views and contemplations of them And my mind was greatly engaged to spend my time in reading and meditating on Christ, on the beauty and excellency of His person, and the lovely way of salvation by free grace in Him I found no books so delightful to me, as those that treated of these subjects Those words, Cant 1:1, used to be abundantly with me 'I am the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valleys' The words seemed to me, sweetly to represent the loveliness and beauty of Jesus Christ The whole book of Canticles used to be pleasant to me, and I used to be much in reading it, about that time, and found, from time to time, an inward sweetness, that would carry me away, in my contemplations This I know not how to express otherwise, than by a calm, sweet abstraction of soul from all the concerns of this world, and sometimes a kind of vision, or fixed ideas and imaginations, of being alone in the mountains, or some solitary wilderness, far from all mankind, sweetly conversing with Christ, and wrapt and swallowed up in God The sense I had of divine things, would often of a sudden kindle up, as it were, a sweet burning in my heart, an ardor of soul, that I know not how to express

Not long after I began to experience these things, I gave an account to my father of some things that had passed in my mind I was pretty much affected by the discourse we had together, and when the discourse was ended, I walked abroad alone, in a solitary place in my father's pasture for contemplation And as I was walking there and looking up on the sky and clouds, there came into my mind so sweet a sense of the glorious majesty and grace of God, that I know not how to express. I seemed to see them both in a sweet conjunction, majesty and meekness joined together, it was a gentle, and holy majesty, and also a majestic meekness, a high, great, and holy gentleness

After this my sense of divine things gradually increased, and became more and more lively, and had more of that inward sweetness The appearance of every thing was altered, there seemed to be, as it were, a calm, sweet cast, or appearance of divine glory, in almost every thing God's excellency, His wisdom, His purity and love, seemed to appear in every thing, in the sun, moon, and stars, in the clouds, and blue sky, in the grass, flowers, trees, in the water, and all nature, which used greatly to fix my mind I often used to sit and view the moon for continuance, and in the day, spent much time in viewing the clouds and sky, to behold the sweet glory of God in these things, in the mean time, singing forth, with a low voice, my contemplations of the Creator and Redeemer And scarce any thing, among all the works of nature, was so delightful to me as thunder and lightning, formerly, nothing had been so terrible to me Before, I used to be uncommonly terrified with thunder, and to be struck with terror when I saw a thunder storm rising, but now, on the contrary, it rejoiced me I felt God, so to speak, at the first appearance of a thunder storm, and used to take the opportunity, at such times, to fix myself in order to view the clouds, and see the lightnings play, and hear the majestic and awful voice of God's thunder, which oftentimes was exceedingly entertaining, leading me to sweet contemplations of my great and glorious God. While thus engaged, it always seemed natural to me to sing, or chant for my meditations, or, to speak my thoughts in soliloquies with a singing voice

I felt then great satisfaction, as to my good state, but that did not content me I had vehement longings of soul after God and Christ, and after more holiness, where-with my heart seemed to be full, and ready to break, which often brought to my mind the words of the Psalmist, Psal cxix 28 'My soul breaketh for the longing it hath' I often felt a mourning and lamenting in my heart, that I had not turned to God sooner, that I might have had more time to grow in grace My mind was greatly fixed on divine things, almost perpetually in the contemplation of them I spent most of my time in thinking of divine things, year after year, often walking alone in the woods, and solitary places, for meditation, soliloquy, and prayer, and converse with God, and it was always my manner, at such times, to sing forth my contemplations I was almost constantly in ejaculatory prayer, wherever I was Prayer seemed to be natural to me, as the breath by which the inward burnings of my heart had vent The delights which I now felt in the things of religion, were of an exceedingly different kind from those before mentioned, that I had when a boy, and what I then had no more notion of than one born blind has of pleasant and beautiful colors They were of a more inward, pure, soul-animating and refreshing nature Those former delights never reached the heart, and did not arise from any sight of the divine excellency of the things of God, or any taste of the soul-satisfying and life-giving good there is in them

My sense of divine things seemed gradually to increase, until I went to preach at New York, which was about a year and a half after they began, and while I was there, I felt them, very sensibly, in a higher degree than I had done before My longings after God and holiness, were much increased Pure and humble, holy and heavenly Christianity, appeared exceedingly amiable to me I felt a burning desire to be in every thing a complete Christian, and conform to the blessed image of Christ, and that I might live, in all things, according to the pure and blessed rules of the gospel I had an eager thirsting after progress in these things, which put me upon pursuing and pressing after them It was my continual strife day and night, and constant inquiry, how I should be more holy, and live more holily, and more becoming a child of God, and a disciple of Christ I now sought an increase of grace and holiness, and a holy life, with much more earnestness, than ever I sought grace before I had it I used to be continually examining myself, and studying and contriving for likely ways and means, how I should live holily, with far greater diligence and earnestness, than ever I pursued any thing in my life, but yet with too great a dependence on my own strength, which afterwards proved a great damage to me My experience had not then taught me, as it has done since, my extreme feebleness and impotence, every manner of way, and the bottomless depths of secret corruption and deceit there was in my heart However, I went on with my eager pursuit after more holiness, and conformity to Christ

The heaven I desired was a heaven of holiness, to be with God, and to spend my eternity in divine love, and holy communion with Christ My mind was very much taken up with contemplations on heaven, and the enjoyments there, and living there in perfect holiness, humility and love And it used at that time to appear a great part of the happiness of heaven, that there the saints could express their love to Christ It appeared to me a great clog and burden, that what I felt within, I could not express as I desired The inward ardor of my soul, seemed to be hindered and pent up, and could not freely flame out as it would I used often to think, how in heaven this principle should freely and fully vent and express itself Heaven appeared exceedingly delightful, as a world of love, and that all happiness consisted in living in pure, humble, heavenly, divine love

I remember the thoughts I used then to have of holiness, and said sometimes to myself, 'I do certainly know that I love holiness, such as the gospel prescribes' It appeared to me, that there was nothing in it but what was ravishingly lovely, the highest beauty and amiableness—a divine beauty, far purer than any thing here upon earth, and that every thing else was like mire and defilement, in comparison of it

Holiness, as I then wrote down some of my contemplations on it, appeared to me to be of a sweet, pleasant, charming, serene, calm nature, which brought an inexpressible purity, brightness, peacefulness and rapture to the soul In other words, that it made the soul like a field or garden of God, with all manner of pleasant flowers, all pleasant, delightful, and undisturbed, enjoying a sweet calm, and the gently vivifying beams of the sun The soul of a true Christian, as I then wrote my meditations, appeared like such a little white flower as we see in the spring of the year, low and humble on the ground, opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory, rejoicing as it were in a calm rapture, diffusing around a sweet fragrantcy, standing peacefully and lovingly, in the midst of other flowers round about, all in like manner opening their bosoms, to drink in the light of the sun There was no part of creature holiness, that I had so great a sense of its loveliness, as humility, brokenness of heart and poverty of spirit, and there was nothing that I so earnestly longed for My heart panted after this, to lie low before God, as in the dust, that I might be nothing, and that God might be ALL, that I might become as a little child

While at New York, I was sometimes much affected with reflections on my past life, considering how late it was before I began to be truly religious, and how wickedly I had lived till then, and once so as to weep abundantly, and for a considerable time together

On January 12, 1723, I made a solemn dedication of myself to God, and wrote it down, giving up myself, and all that I had to God, to be for the future in no respect my own, to act as one that had no right to himself, in any respect And solemnly vowed to take God for my whole portion and felicity, looking on nothing else as any part of my happiness, nor acting as if it were, and His law for the constant rule of my obedience, engaging to fight with all my might, against the world, the flesh and the devil, to the end of my life But I have reason to be infinitely humbled, when I consider how much I have failed of answering my obligation

I had then abundance of sweet religious conversation in the family where I lived, with Mr John Smith and his pious mother My heart was knit in affection to those in whom were appearances of true piety, and I could bear the thoughts of no other companions, but such as were holy, and the disciples of the blessed Jesus I had great longings for the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world, and my secret prayer used to be, in great part, taken up in praying for it. If I heard the least hint of any thing that happened, in any part of the world, that appeared, in some respect or other, to have a favorable aspect on the interest of Christ's kingdom, my soul eagerly caught at it, and it would much animate and refresh me. I used to be eager to read public news-letters, mainly for that end, to see if I could not find some news favorable to the interest of religion in the world.

I very frequently used to retire into a solitary place, on the banks of Hudson's river, at some distance from the city, for contemplation on divine things, and secret converse with God, and had many sweet hours there. Sometimes Mr. Smith and I walked there together, to converse on the things of God, and our conversation used to turn much on the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world, and the glorious things that God would accomplish for his church in the latter days. I had then, and at other times, the greatest delight in the holy scriptures, of any book whatsoever. Oftentimes in reading it, every word seemed to touch my heart. I felt a harmony between something in my heart, and those sweet and powerful words. I seemed often to see so much light exhibited by every sentence, and such a refreshing food communicated, that I could not get along in reading, often dwelling long on one sentence, to see the wonders contained in it, and yet almost every sentence seemed to be full of wonders.

I came away from New York in the month of April, 1723, and had a most bitter parting with Madam Smith and her son. My heart seemed to sink within me at leaving the family and city, where I had enjoyed so many sweet and pleasant days. I went from New York to Weathersfield, by water, and as I sailed away, I kept sight of the city as long as I could. However, that night, after this sorrowful parting, I was greatly comforted in God at Westchester, where we went ashore to lodge, and had a pleasant time of it all the voyage to Saybrook. It was sweet to me to think of meeting dear Christians in heaven, where we should never part more. At Saybrook we went ashore to lodge, on Saturday, and there kept the Sabbath, where I had a sweet and refreshing season, walking alone in the fields.

After I came home to Windsor, I remained much in a like frame of mind, as when at New York, only sometimes I felt my heart ready to sink with the thoughts of my friends at New York. My support was in contemplations on the heavenly state, as I find in my diary of May 1, 1723. It was a comfort to think of that state, where there is fulness of joy, where reigns heavenly, calm, and delightful love, without alloy, where there are continually the dearest expressions of this love, where is the enjoyment of the persons loved, without ever parting, where those persons who appear so lovely in this world, will really be inexpressibly more lovely and full of love to us. And how sweetly will the mutual lovers join together to sing the praises of God and the Lamb! How will it fill us with joy to think, that this enjoyment, these sweet exercises will never cease, but will last to all eternity! I continued much in the same frame, in the general, as when at New York, till I went to New Haven as tutor to the college, particularly once at Bolton, on a journey from Boston, while walking out alone in the fields. After I went to New Haven I sunk in religion, my mind being diverted from my eager pursuits after holiness, by some affairs that greatly perplexed and distracted my thoughts.

In September, 1725, I was taken ill at New Haven, and while endeavoring to go home to Windsor, was so ill at the North Village, that I could go no further, where I lay sick for about a quarter of a year. In this sickness God was pleased to visit me again with the sweet influences of his Spirit. My mind was greatly engaged there in divine, pleasant contemplations, and longings of soul. I observed that those who watched with me, would often be looking out wishfully for the morning, which brought to my mind those words of the Psalmist, and which my soul with delight made its own language: 'My soul waiteth for the Lord, more than they that watch for the morning, I say, more than they that watch for the morning', and when the light of day came in at the windows, it refreshed my soul from one morning to another. It seemed to be some image of the light of God's glory

I remember, about that time, I used greatly to long for the conversion of some that I was concerned with, I could gladly honor them, and with delight be a servant to them, and lie at their feet, if they were but truly holy. But, some time after this, I was again greatly diverted in my mind with some temporal concerns that exceedingly took up my thoughts, greatly to the wounding of my soul, and went on through various exercises, that it would be tedious to relate, which gave me much more experience of my own heart, than ever I had before.

Since I came to this town, I have often had sweet complacency in God, in views of His glorious perfections and the excellency of Jesus Christ. God has appeared to me a glorious and lovely being, chiefly on the account of His holiness. The holiness of God has always appeared to me the most lovely of all His attributes. The doctrines of God's absolute sovereignty, and free grace, in shewing mercy to whom He would shew mercy, and man's absolute dependence on the operations of God's Holy Spirit, have very often appeared to me as sweet and glorious doctrines. These doctrines have been much my delight. God's sovereignty has ever appeared to me, great part of His glory. It has often been my delight to approach God, and adore Him as a sovereign God, and ask sovereign mercy of Him.

I have loved the doctrines of the gospel, they have been to my soul like green pastures. The gospel has seemed to me the richest treasure, the treasure that I have most desired, and longed that it might dwell richly in me. The way of salvation by Christ has appeared, in a general way, glorious and excellent, most pleasant and most beautiful. It has often seemed to me, that it would in a great measure spoil heaven, to receive it in any other way. That text has often been affecting and delightful to me. Isa xxxiii 2 'A man shall be an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, &c.'

It has often appeared to me delightful, to be united to Christ, to have Him for my head, and to be a member of His body, also to have Christ for my teacher and prophet. I very often think with sweetness, and longings, and pantings of soul, of being a little child, taking hold of Christ, to be led by Him through the wilderness of this world.

That text, Matth xviii 3, has often been sweet to me, 'except ye be converted and become as little children, &c.' I love to think of coming to Christ, to receive salvation of Him, poor in spirit, and quite empty of self, humbly exalting Him alone, cut off entirely from my own root, in order to grow into, and out of Christ, to have God in Christ to be all in all, and to live by faith on the Son of God, a life of humble unfeigned confidence in Him. That scripture has often been sweet to me, Psal cxv 1 'Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give glory, for thy mercy and for thy truth's sake.' And those words of Christ, Luke x 21 'In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes, even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.' That sovereignty of God which Christ rejoiced in, seemed to me worthy of such joy, and that rejoicing seemed to show the excellency of Christ, and of what spirit He was.

Sometimes, only mentioning a single word caused my heart to burn within me, or only seeing the name of Christ, or the name of some attribute of God. And God has appeared glorious to me, on account of the Trinity. It has made me have exalting thoughts of God, that He subsists in three persons, Father, Son and Holy Ghost. The sweetest joys and delights I have experienced, have not been those that have arisen from a hope of my own good estate, but in a direct view of the glorious things of the gospel. When I enjoy this sweetness, it seems to carry me above the thoughts of my own estate, it seems at such times a loss that I cannot bear, to take off my eye from the glorious pleasant object I behold without me, to turn my eye in upon myself, and my own good estate.

My heart has been much on the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world. The histories of the past advancement of Christ's kingdom have been sweet to me. When I have read histories of past ages, the pleasantest thing in all my reading has been, to read of the kingdom of Christ being promoted. And when I have expected, in my reading, to come to any such thing, I have rejoiced in the prospect, all the way as I read. And my mind has been much entertained and delighted with the scripture promises and prophecies, which relate to the future glorious advancement of Christ's kingdom upon earth

I have sometimes had a sense of the excellent fulness of Christ, and His meetness and suitableness as a Saviour, whereby He has appeared to me, far above all, the chief of ten thousands His blood and atonement have appeared sweet, and His righteousness sweet, which was always accompanied with ardency of spirit, and inward strugglings and breathings, and groanings that cannot be uttered, to be emptied of myself, and swallowed up in Christ

Once as I rode out into the woods for my health, in 1737, having alighted from my horse in a retired place, as my manner commonly has been, to walk for divine contemplation and prayer, I had a view that for me was extraordinary, of the glory of the Son of God, as Mediator between God and man, and His wonderful, great, full, pure and sweet grace and love, and meek and gentle condescension This grace that appeared so calm and sweet, appeared also great above the heavens The person of Christ appeared ineffably excellent with an excellency great enough to swallow up all thought and conception—which continued, as near as I can judge, about an hour, which kept me the greater part of the time in a flood of tears, and weeping aloud I felt an ardency of soul to be, what I know not otherwise how to express, emptied and annihilated, to lie in the dust, and to be full of Christ alone, to love Him with a holy and pure love, to trust in Him, to live upon Him, to serve and follow Him, and to be perfectly sanctified and made pure, with a divine and heavenly purity I have, several other times, had views very much of the same nature, and which have had the same effects

I have many times had a sense of the glory of the third person in the Trinity, in His office of Sanctifier, in His holy operations, communicating divine light and life to the soul God, in the communications of His Holy Spirit, has appeared as an infinite fountain of divine glory and sweetness, being full, and sufficient to fill and satisfy the soul, pouring forth itself in sweet communications, like the sun in its glory, sweetly and pleasantly diffusing light and life And I have sometimes had an affecting sense of the excellency of the word of God, as a word of life, as the light of life, a sweet, excellent, life-giving word, accompanied with a thirsting after that word, that it might dwell richly in my heart

Often, since I lived in this town, I have had very affecting views of my own sinfulness and vileness, very frequently to such a degree as to hold me in a kind of loud weeping, sometimes for a considerable time together, so that I have often been forced to shut myself up I have had a vastly greater sense of my own wickedness, and the badness of my own heart, than ever I had before my conversion It has often appeared to me, that if God should mark iniquity against me, I should appear the very worst of all mankind, of all that have been, since the beginning of the world to this time, and that I should have by far the lowest place in hell When others, that have come to talk with me about their soul concerns, have expressed the sense they have had of their own wickedness, by saying that it seemed to them, that they were as bad as the devil himself, I thought their expression seemed exceedingly faint and feeble, to represent my wickedness

My wickedness, as I am in myself, has long appeared to me perfectly ineffable, and swallowing up all thought and imagination, like an infinite deluge, or mountains over my head I know not how to express better what my sins appear to me to be, than by heaping infinite upon infinite, and multiplying infinite by infinite Very often, for these many years, these expressions are in my mind, and in my mouth 'Infinite upon infinite—Infinite upon infinite' When I look into my heart, and take a view of my wickedness, it looks like an abyss infinitely deeper than hell And it appears to me, that were it not for free grace, exalted and raised up to the infinite height of all the fulness and glory of the great Jehovah, and the arm of his power and grace stretched forth in all the majesty of his power, and in all the glory of his sovereignty, I should appear sunk down in my sins below hell itself, far beyond the sight of every thing, but the eye of sovereign grace, that can pierce even down to such a depth And yet, it seems to me, that my conviction of sin is exceedingly small, and faint, it is enough to amaze me, that I have no more sense of my sin I know certainly, that I have very little sense of my sinfulness. When I have had turns of weeping and crying for my sins, I thought I knew at the time, that my repentance was nothing to my sin.

I have greatly longed of late, for a broken heart, and to lie low before God, and, when I ask for humility, I cannot bear the thoughts of being no more humble than other Christians. It seems to me, that though their degrees of humility may be 10 suitable for them, yet it would be a vile self-exaltation to me, not to be the lowest in humility of all mankind. Others speak of their longing to be 'humbled to the dust', that may be a proper expression for them, but I always think of myself, that I ought, and it is an expression that has long been natural for me to use in prayer, 'to lie infinitely low before God.' And it is affecting to think, 20 how ignorant I was, when a young Christian, of the bottomless, infinite depths of wickedness, pride, hypocrisy and deceit, left in my heart.

I have a much greater sense of my universal, exceeding dependence on God's grace and strength, and mere good pleasure, of late, than I used formerly to have, and have experienced more of an abhorrence of my own righteousness. The very thought of 30 any joy arising in me, on any consideration of my own amiableness, performances, or experiences, or any goodness of heart or life, is nauseous and detestable to me. And yet I am greatly afflicted with a proud and self-righteous spirit, much more sensibly than I used to be formerly. I see that serpent rising and putting forth its head continually, every where, all around me.

Though it seems to me, that, in some respects, I was a far better Christian, for two or three years after my first conversion, than I am now, and lived in a more constant delight and pleasure, yet, of late years, I have had a more full and constant sense of the absolute sovereignty of God, and a delight in that sovereignty, and have had more of a sense of the glory of Christ, as a Mediator revealed in the gospel. On one Saturday night, in particular, I had such a discovery 40 of the excellency of the gospel above all other doctrines, that I could not but say to myself, 'This is my chosen light, my chosen doctrine', and of Christ, 'This is my chosen Prophet.' It appeared sweet, beyond all expression, to follow Christ, and to be taught, and enlightened, and instructed by him, to learn of him, and live to him. Another Saturday night (January, 1739), I had such a sense, how sweet and blessed a thing it was to walk in the way of duty, to do that which was right and meet to be done, and agreeable to the holy mind of God, that it caused me to break forth into a kind of loud weeping, which held me some time, so that I was forced to shut myself up, and fasten the doors. I could not but, as it were, cry out, 'How happy are they which do that which is right in the sight of God! They are blessed indeed, they are the happy ones!' I had, at the same time, a very affecting sense, how meet and suitable it was that God should govern the world, and order all things according to His own pleasure, and I rejoiced in it, that God reigned, and that His will was done.

SINNERS IN THE HANDS OF AN ANGRY GOD<sup>1</sup>

Deuteronomy xxxii 35 — Their foot shall slide in due time

30 IN this verse is threatened the vengeance of God on the wicked unbelieving Israel-

<sup>1</sup> The text of the sermon, delivered 8 July 1741, has been modernized by the editors. The scene was described by a contemporary 'While the people in the neighbouring towns were in great distress for their souls, the inhabitants of that town [Enfield, Connecticut] were very secure, loose and vain. A lecture had been appointed at Enfield, and the neighbouring people, the night before, were so affected at the thoughtlessness of the inhabitants, and in such fear that God would in His righteous judgment, pass them by, while the divine showers were falling all around them, as to be prostrate before Him a considerable part of it, supplicating mercy for their souls. When the time appointed for the lecture came, a number of the neighbouring ministers attended, and some from a distance. When they went into the meeting-house, the appearance of the assembly was thoughtless and vain. The people hardly conducted themselves with common decency. The Rev. Mr. Edwards, of Northampton, preached, and before the sermon was ended, the assembly appeared deeply impressed and bowed down, with an awful conviction of their sin and danger. There was such a breathing of distress, and weeping, that the preacher was obliged to speak to the people and desire silence, that he might be heard.' Trumbull, History of Connecticut (New London, Conn., 1898), II, 112.

For, preached Edwards on another occasion 'When ministers preach of hell, and warn sinners to avoid it, in a cold manner—though they may say in words that ites, that were God's visible people, and lived under means of grace, and that notwithstanding all God's wonderful works that he wrought towards that people, yet remained, as is expressed verse 28, void of counsel, having no understanding in them, and that, under all the cultivations of heaven, brought forth bitter and poisonous fruit, as in the two verses next preceding the text

The expression that I have chosen for my text, 'Their foot shall slide in due time,' seems to imply the following things relating to the punishment and destruction that these wicked Israelites were exposed to

1 That they were always exposed to destruction, as one that stands or walks in slippery places is always exposed to fall This is implied in the manner of their destruction's coming upon them, being represented by their foot's sliding The same is expressed, Psalm lxxiii 18 'Surely thou didst set them in slippery places, thou castedst them down into destruction'

2 It implies that they were always exposed to sudden, unexpected destruction, as he that walks in slippery places is every moment liable to fall, he can't foresee one moment whether he shall stand or fall the next, and when he does fall, he falls at once, without warning, which is also expressed in that Psalm lxxiii 18, 19 'Surely thou didst set them in slippery places thou castedst them down into destruction How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment!'

3 Another thing implied is, that they are liable to fall of themselves, without being thrown down by the hand of another, as he that stands or walks on slippery ground needs nothing but his own weight to throw him down

4 That the reason why they are not fallen already, and don't fall now, is only that God's appointed time is not come For it is said that when that due time, or appointed time comes, their foot shall slide Then they shall be left to fall, as they are inclined by their own weight. God won't hold them up in these slippery places any longer, but will let them go, and then, at that very instant, they shall fall to destruction, as he that stands in such slippery declining ground on the edge of a pit that he can't stand alone, when he is let go he immediately falls and is lost

The observation from the words that I would now insist upon is this,

There is nothing that keeps wicked men at any one moment out of hell, but the mere pleasure of God

By the mere pleasure of God, I mean His sovereign pleasure, His arbitrary will, restrained by no obligation, hindered by no manner of difficulty, any more than if nothing else but God's mere will had in the least degree or in any respect whatsoever any hand in the preservation of wicked men one moment

The truth of this observation may appear by the following considerations

1 There is no want of power in God to cast wicked men into hell at any moment Men's hands can't be strong when God rises up the strongest have no power to resist Him, nor can any deliver out of His hands

He is not only able to cast wicked men into hell, but He can most easily do it Sometimes an earthly prince meets with a great deal of difficulty to subdue a rebel that has found means to fortify himself, and has made himself strong by the number of his followers But it is not so with God There is no fortress that is any defence against the power of God Though hand join in hand, and vast multitudes of God's enemies combine and associate themselves, they are easily broken in pieces they are as great heaps of light chaff before the whirlwind, or large quantities of dry stubble before devouring flames We find it easy to tread on and crush a worm that we see crawling on the earth, so 'tis easy for us to cut or singe a slender thread that any thing hangs by, thus easy is it for God, when He pleases, to cast His enemies down to hell What are we, that we should think to stand before Him, at whose rebuke the earth trembles, and before whom the rocks are thrown down!

it is infinitely terrible—they contradict themselves For actions have a language as well as words

And certainly such earnestness and affection in speaking is beautiful, as becomes the nature and importance of the subject

Some talk of it as an unreasonable thing to fright persons to heaven, but I think it is a reasonable thing to endeavor to fright persons away from hell 'The Works of President Edwards (N Y, 1857), I, 538

2. They deserve to be cast into hell, so that divine justice never stands in the way, it makes no objection against God's using His power at any moment to destroy them. Yea, on the contrary, justice calls aloud for an infinite punishment of their sins. Divine justice says of the tree that brings forth such grapes of Sodom, 'Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?' Luke xii 7. The sword of divine justice is every moment brandished over their heads, and 'tis nothing but the hand of arbitrary mercy, and God's mere will, that holds it back.

3. They are already under a sentence of condemnation to hell. They don't only justly deserve to be cast down thither, but the sentence of the law of God, that eternal and immutable rule of righteousness that God has fixed between Him and mankind, is gone out against them, and stands against them, so that they are bound over already to hell. John iii 18 'He that believeth not is condemned already.' So that every unconverted man properly belongs to hell, that is his place, from thence he is. John viii 23 'Ye are from beneath', and thither he is bound, 'tis the place that justice, and God's word, and the sentence of His unchangeable law, assigns to him.

4. They are now the objects of that very same anger and wrath of God, that is expressed in the torments of hell, and the reason why they don't go down to hell at each moment is not because God, in whose power they are, is not then very angry with them, as angry as He is with many of those miserable creatures that He is now tormenting in hell, and do there feel and bear the fierceness of His wrath. Yea, God is a great deal more angry with great numbers that are now on earth, yea, doubtless, with many that are now in this congregation, that, it may be, are at ease and quiet, than He is with many of those that are now in the flames of hell.

So that it is not because God is unmindful of their wickedness, and don't resent it, that He don't let loose His hand and cut them off. God is not altogether such a one as themselves, though they may imagine Him to be so. The wrath of God burns against them, their damnation don't slumber, the pit is prepared, the fire is made ready, the furnace is now hot, ready to receive them, the flames do now rage and glow. The glittering sword is whet, and held over them, and the pit hath opened her mouth under them.

5. The devil stands ready to fall upon them, and seize them as his own, at what moment God shall permit him. They belong to him, he has their souls in his possession, and under his dominion. The Scripture represents them as his goods, Luke xi. 21. The devils watch them, they are ever by them, at their right hand, they stand waiting for them, like greedy hungry lions that see their prey, and expect to have it, but are for the present kept back, if God should withdraw His hand by which they are restrained, they would in one moment fly upon their poor souls. The old serpent is gaping for them, hell opens its mouth wide to receive them, and if God should permit it, they would be hastily swallowed up and lost.

6. There are in the souls of wicked men those hellish principles reigning, that would presently kindle and flame out into hell-fire if it were not for God's restraints. There is laid in the very nature of carnal men a foundation for the torments of hell: there are those corrupt principles, in reigning power in them, and in full possession of them, that are seeds of hell-fire. These principles are active and powerful, exceeding violent in their nature, and if it were not for the restraining hand of God upon them, they would soon break out, they would flame out after the same manner as the same corruptions, the same enmity does in the heart of damned souls, and would beget the same torments in 'em as they do in them. The souls of the wicked are in Scripture compared to the troubled sea, Isaiah lvi 20. For the present God restrains their wickedness by His mighty power, as He does the raging waves of the troubled sea, saying, 'Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further', but if God should withdraw that restraining power, it would soon carry all afore it. Sin is the ruin and misery of the soul, it is destructive in its nature, and if God should leave it without restraint, there would need nothing else to make the soul perfectly miserable. The corruption of the heart of man is a thing that is immoderate and boundless in its fury, and while wicked men live here, it is like fire pent up by God's restraints, whenas if it were let loose, it would set on fire the course of nature, and as the heart is now a sink of sin, so, if sin was not restrained, it would immediately turn the soul into a fiery oven, or a furnace of fire and brimstone

7 It is no security to wicked men for one moment, that there are no visible means of death at hand 'Tis no security to a natural man, that he is now in health, and that he don't see which way he should now immediately go out of the world by any accident, and that there is no visible danger in any respect in his circumstances The manifold and continual experience of the world in all ages shows that this is no evidence that a man is not on the very brink of eternity, and that the next step won't be into another world The unseen, unthought of ways and means of persons' going suddenly out of the world are innumerable and inconceivable Unconverted men walk over the pit of hell on a rotten covering, and there are innumerable places in this covering so weak that they won't bear their weight, and these places are not seen The arrows of death fly unseen at noonday, the sharpest sight can't discern them God has so many different, unsearchable ways of taking wicked men out of the world and sending 'em to hell, that there is nothing to make it appear that God had need to be at the expense of a miracle, or go out of the ordinary course of his providence, to destroy any wicked man, at any moment All the means that there are of sinners' going out of the world are so in God's hands, and so absolutely subject to his power and determination, that it don't depend at all less on the mere will of God, whether sinners shall at any moment go to hell, than if means were never made use of, or at all concerned in the case

8 Natural men's prudence and care to preserve their own lives, or the care of others to preserve them, don't secure 'em a moment This, divine providence and universal experience does also bear testimony to There is this clear evidence that men's own wisdom is no security to them from death, that if it were otherwise we should see some difference between the wise and politic men of the world and others, with regard to their liableness to early and unexpected death, but how is it in fact? Eccles 11 16 'How dieth the wise man? As the fool'

9. All wicked men's pains and contriv ance they use to escape hell, while they continue to reject Christ, and so remain wicked men, don't secure 'em from hell one moment Almost every natural man that hears of hell flatters himself that he shall escape it, he depends upon himself for his own security, he flatters himself in what he has done, in what he is now doing, or what he intends to do, every one lays out matters in his own mind how he shall avoid damnation, and flatters himself that he contrives well for himself, and that his schemes won't fail They hear indeed that there are but few saved, and that the bigger part of men that have died heretofore are gone to hell, but each one imagines that he lays out matters better for his own escape than others have done he don't intend to come to that place of torment, he says within himself, that he intends to take care that shall be effectual, and to order matters so for himself as not to fail

But the foolish children of men do miserably delude themselves in their own schemes, and in their confidence in their own strength and wisdom, they trust to nothing but a shadow The bigger part of those that heretofore have lived under the same means of grace, and are now dead, are undoubtedly gone to hell, and it was not because they were not as wise as those that are now alive, it was not because they did not lay out matters as well for themselves to secure their own escape If it were so that we could come to speak with them, and could inquire of them, one by one, whether they expected, when alive, and when they used to hear about hell, ever to be subjects of that misery, we, doubtless, should hear one and another reply, 'No, I never intended to come here I had laid out matters otherwise in my mind, I thought I should contrive well for myself I thought my scheme good I intended to take effectual care, but it came upon me unexpected, I did not look for it at that time, and in that manner, it came as a thief death outwitted me God's wrath was too quick for me O my cursed foolishness! I was flattering myself, and pleasing myself with vain dreams of what I would do hereafter, and when I was saying peace and safety, then sudden destruction came upon me'

10 God has laid himself under no obligation, by any promise, to keep any natural man out of hell one moment. God certainly has made no promises either of eternal life, or of any deliverance or preservation from eternal death, but what are contained in the covenant of grace, the promises that are given in Christ, in whom all the promises are yea and amen. But surely they have no interest in the promises of the covenant of grace that are not the children of the covenant, and that do not believe in any of the promises of the covenant, and have no interest in the Mediator of the covenant.

So that, whatever some have imagined and pretended about promises made to natural men's earnest seeking and knocking, 'tis plain and manifest, that whatever pains a natural man takes in religion, whatever prayers he makes, till he believes in Christ, God is under no manner of obligation to keep him a moment from eternal destruction.

So that thus it is, that natural men are held in the hand of God over the pit of hell, they have deserved the fiery pit, and are already sentenced to it, and God is dreadfully provoked, his anger is as great towards them as to those that are actually suffering the executions of the fierceness of his wrath in hell, and they have done nothing in the least to appease or abate that anger, neither is God in the least bound by any promise to hold 'em up one moment, the devil is waiting for them, hell is gaping for them, the flames gather and flash about them, and would fain lay hold on them and swallow them up, the fire pent up in their own hearts is struggling to break out, and they have no interest in any Mediator, there are no means within reach that can be any security to them. In short they have no refuge, nothing to take hold of, all that preserves them every moment is the mere arbitrary will, and uncovenanted, unobliged forbearance of an incensed God.

APPLICATION

The use may be of awakening to unconverted persons in this congregation. Thus that you have heard is the case of every one of you that are out of Christ. That world of misery, that lake of burning brimstone, is extended abroad under you. There is the dreadful pit of the glowing flames of the wrath of God, there is hell's wide gaping mouth open, and you have nothing to stand upon, nor any thing to take hold of. There is nothing between you and hell but the air, 'tis only the power and mere pleasure of God that holds you up.

You probably are not sensible of this, you find you are kept out of hell, but don't see the hand of God in it, but look at other things, as the good state of your bodily constitution, your care of your own life, and the means you use for your own preservation. But indeed these things are nothing, if God should withdraw his hand, they would avail no more to keep you from falling than the thin air to hold up a person that is suspended in it.

Your wickedness makes you as it were heavy as lead, and to tend downwards with great weight and pressure towards hell, and if God should let you go, you would immediately sink and swiftly descend and plunge into the bottomless gulf, and your healthy constitution, and your own care and prudence, and best contrivance, and all your righteousness, would have no more influence to uphold you and keep you out of hell than a spider's web would have to stop a falling rock. Were it not that so is the sovereign pleasure of God, the earth would not bear you one moment, for you are a burden to it, the creation groans with you, the creature is made subject to the bondage of your corruption, not willingly, the sun don't willingly shine upon you to give you light to serve sin and Satan, the earth don't willingly yield her increase to satisfy your lusts, nor is it willingly a stage for your wickedness to be acted upon, the air don't willingly serve you for breath to maintain the flame of life in your vitals, while you spend your life in the service of God's enemies. God's creatures are good, and were made for men to serve God with, and don't willingly subserve to any other purpose, and groan when they are abused to purposes so directly contrary to their nature and end. And the world would spew you out, were it not for the sovereign hand of Him who hath subjected it in hope. There are the black clouds of God's wrath now hanging directly over your heads, full of the dreadful storm, and big with thunder, and were it not for the restraining hand of God, it would immediately burst forth upon you. The sovereign pleasure of God, for the present, stays his rough wind, otherwise it would come with fury, and your destruction would come like a whirlwind, and you would be like the chaff of the summer threshing floor

The wrath of God is like great waters that are dammed for the present, they increase more and more, and rise higher and higher, till an outlet is given, and the longer the stream is stopped, the more rapid and mighty is its course, when once it is let loose 'Tis true, that judgment against your evil work has not been executed hitherto, the floods of God's vengeance have been withheld, but your guilt in the mean time is constantly increasing, and you are every day treasuring up more wrath, the waters are continually rising, and waxing more and more mighty, and there is nothing but the mere pleasure of God that holds the waters back, that are unwilling to be stopped, and press hard to go forward If God should only withdraw his hand from the floodgate, it would immediately fly open, and the fiery floods of the fierceness and wrath of God would rush forth with inconceivable fury, and would come upon you with omnipotent power, and if your strength were ten thousand times greater than it is, yea, ten thousand times greater than the strength of the stoutest, sturdiest devil in hell, it would be nothing to withstand or endure it

The bow of God's wrath is bent, and the arrow made ready on the string, and justice bends the arrow at your heart, and strains the bow, and it is nothing but the mere pleasure of God, and that of an angry God, without any promise or obligation at all, that keeps the arrow one moment from being made drunk with your blood

Thus are all you that never passed under a great change of heart by the mighty power of the Spirit of God upon your souls, all that were never born again, and made new creatures, and raised from being dead in sin to a state of new and before altogether unexperienced light and life (however you may have reformed your life in many things, and may have had religious affections, and may keep up a form of religion in your families and closets, and in the house of God, and may be strict in it), you are thus in the hands of an angry God, 'tis nothing but his mere pleasure that keeps you from being this moment swallowed up in everlasting destruction

However unconvinced you may now be of the truth of what you hear, by and by you will be fully convinced of it Those that are gone from being in the like circumstances with you see that it was so with them, for destruction came suddenly upon most of them, when they expected nothing of it, and while they were saying, 'Peace and safety' now they see, that those things that they depended on for peace and safety were nothing but thin air and empty shadows

The God that holds you over the pit of hell, much as one holds a spider or some loathsome insect over the fire, abhors you, and is dreadfully provoked, his wrath towards you burns like fire, he looks upon you as worthy of nothing else, but to be cast into the fire, he is of purer eyes than to bear to have you in his sight, you are ten thousand times so abominable in his eyes, as the most hateful and venomous serpent is in ours You have offended him infinitely more than ever a stubborn rebel did his prince and yet it is nothing but his hand that holds you from falling into the fire every moment 'Tis ascribed to nothing else, that you did not go to hell the last night, that you was suffered to awake again in this world after you closed your eyes to sleep, and there is no other reason to be given why you have not dropped into hell since you arose in the morning, but that God's hand has held you up There is no other reason to be given why you han't gone to hell since you have sat here in the house of God, provoking his pure eyes by your sinful wicked manner of attending his solemn worship Yea, there is nothing else that is to be given as a reason why you don't this very moment drop down into hell

O sinner! consider the fearful danger you are in 'Tis a great furnace of wrath, a wide and bottomless pit, full of the fire of wrath, that you are held over in the hand of that God whose wrath is provoked and incensed as much against you as against many of the damned in hell You hang by a slender thread, with the flames of divine wrath flashing about it, and ready every moment to singe it and burn it asunder, and you have no interest in any Mediator, and nothing to lay hold of to save yourself, nothing to keep off the flames of wrath, nothing of your own, nothing that you ever have done.

nothing that you can do, to induce God to spare you one moment

And consider here more particularly several things concerning that wrath that you are in such danger of

1 Whose wrath it is It is the wrath of the infinite God If it were only the wrath of man, though it were of the most potent prince, it would be comparatively little to be regarded The wrath of kings is very much dreaded, especially of absolute monarchs, that have the possessions and lives of their subjects wholly in their power, to be disposed of at their mere will Prov xx 2 'The fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion whoso provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul' The subject that very much enrages an arbitrary prince is liable to suffer the most extreme torments that human art can invent, or human power can inflict But the greatest earthly potentates, in their greatest majesty and strength, and when clothed in their greatest terrors, are but feeble, despicable worms of the dust, in comparison of the great and almighty Creator and King of heaven and earth it is but little that they can do when most enraged, and when they have exerted the utmost of their fury All the kings of the earth before God are as grasshoppers, they are nothing, and less than nothing both their love and their hatred is to be despised The wrath of the great King of kings is as much more terrible than theirs, as his majesty is greater Luke xii 4, 5 'And I say unto you my friends, Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do But I will forewarn you whom you shall fear Fear him, which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell, yea, I say unto you, Fear him'

2 'Tis the fierceness of his wrath that you are exposed to We often read of the fury of God, as in Isaiah lix 18 'According to their deeds, accordingly he will repay fury to his adversaries' So Isaiah lxvi 15 'For, behold, the Lord will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire' And so in many other places So we read of God's fierceness, Rev xix 15 There we read of 'the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God' The words are exceeding terrible if it had only been said, 'the wrath of God,' the words would have implied that which is infinitely dreadful but 'tis not only said so, but 'the fierceness and wrath of God' The fury of God! The fierceness of Jehovah! Oh, now dreadful must that be! Who can utter or conceive what such expressions carry in them! But it is not only said so, but 'the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God' As though there would be a very great manifestation of his almighty power in what the fierceness of his wrath should inflict, as though omnipotence should be as it were enraged, and exerted, as men are wont to exert their strength in the fierceness of their wrath Oh! then, what will be the consequence! What will become of the poor worm that shall suffer it! Whose hands can be strong! And whose heart endure! To what a dreadful, inexpressible, inconceivable depth of misery must the poor creature be sunk who shall be the subject of this!

Consider this, you that are here present, that yet remain in an unregenerate state That God will execute the fierceness of his anger implies that he will inflict wrath without any pity When God beholds the ineffable extremity of your case, and sees your torment so vastly disproportioned to your strength, and sees how your poor soul is crushed, and sinks down, as it were, into an infinite gloom, he will have no compassion upon you, he will not forbear the executions of his wrath, or in the least lighten his hand, there shall be no moderation or mercy, nor will God then at all stay his rough wind, he will have no regard to your welfare, nor be at all careful lest you should suffer too much in any other sense, than only that you should not suffer beyond what strict justice requires nothing shall be withheld because it is so hard for you to bear Ezek viii 18 'Therefore will I also deal in fury mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them' Now God stands ready to pity you, this is a day of mercy, you may cry now with some encouragement of obtaining mercy but when once the day of mercy is past, your most lamentable and dolorous cries and shrieks will be in vain, you will be wholly lost and thrown away of God, as to any regard to your welfare, God will have no other use to put you to, but only to suffer misery, you shall be continued in being to no other end, for you will be a vessel of wrath fitted to destruction, and there will be no other use of this vessel, but only to be filled full of wrath. God will be so far from pitying you when you cry to him, that 'tis said he will only 'laugh and mock,' Prov. 1 25, 26, &c

How awful are those words, Isaiah lxiii. 3, which are the words of the great God 'I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment.' 'Tis perhaps impossible to conceive of words that carry in them greater manifestations of these three things, viz., contempt and hatred and fierceness of indignation. If you cry to God to pity you, he will be so far from pitying you in your doleful case, or showing you the least regard or favor, that instead of that he'll only tread you under foot and though he will know that you can't bear the weight of omnipotence treading upon you, yet he won't regard that, but he will crush you under his feet without mercy, he'll crush out your blood, and make it fly, and it shall be sprinkled on his garments, so as to stain all his raiment. He will not only hate you, but he will have you in the utmost contempt, no place shall be thought fit for you but under his feet, to be trodden down as the mire of the streets.

3 The misery you are exposed to is that which God will inflict to that end, that he might show what that wrath of Jehovah is. God hath had it on his heart to show to angels and men, both how excellent his love is, and also how terrible his wrath is. Sometimes earthly kings have a mind to show how terrible their wrath is, by the extreme punishments they would execute on those that provoke 'em. Nebuchadnezzar, that mighty and haughty monarch of the Chaldean empire, was willing to show his wrath when enraged with Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, and accordingly gave order that the burning fiery furnace should be heated seven times hotter than it was before, doubtless, it was raised to the utmost degree of fierceness that human art could raise it, but the great God is also willing to show his wrath, and magnify his awful Majesty and mighty power in the extreme suffering of his enemies. Rom ix 22 'What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?' And seeing this is his design, and what he has determined, to show how terrible the unmix'd, unrestrained wrath, the fury and fierceness of Jehovah is, he will do it to effect. There will be something accomplished and brought to pass that will be dreadful with a witness. When the great and angry God hath risen up and executed his awful vengeance on the poor sinner, and the wretch is actually suffering the infinite weight and power of his indignation, then will God call upon the whole universe to behold that awful majesty and mighty power that is to be seen in it. Isa xxxiii 12, 13, 14 'And the people shall be as the burnings of lime, as thorns cut up shall they be burnt in the fire. Hear, ye that are far off, what I have done, and ye that are near, acknowledge my might. The sinners in Zion are afraid, fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites,' &c

Thus it will be with you that are in an unconverted state, if you continue in it, the infinite might, and majesty, and terrible-ness, of the Omnipotent God shall be magnified upon you in the ineffable strength of your torments. You shall be tormented in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb, and when you shall be in this state of suffering, the glorious inhabitants of heaven shall go forth and look on the awful spectacle, that they may see what the wrath and fierceness of the Almighty is, and when they have seen it, they will fall down and adore that great power and majesty. Isa lxi 23, 24 'And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord. And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.'

4 It is everlasting wrath. It would be dreadful to suffer this fierceness and wrath of Almighty God one moment, but you must suffer it to all eternity. There will be no end to this exquisite, horrible misery. When you look forward, you shall see a long forever, a boundless duration before you, which will swallow up your thoughts, and amaze your soul, and you will absolutely despair of ever having any deliverance, any end, any mitigation, any rest at all, you will know certainly that you must wear out long ages, millions of millions of ages, in wrestling and conflicting with this almighty, merciless vengeance, and then when you have so done, when so many ages have actually been spent by you in this manner, you will know that all is but a point to what remains. So that your punishment will indeed be infinite. Oh, who can express what the state of a soul in such circumstances is! All that we can possibly say about it gives but a very feeble, faint representation of it, it is inexpressible and inconceivable for 'who knows the power of God's anger?'

How dreadful is the state of those that are daily and hourly in danger of this great wrath and infinite misery! But this is the dismal case of every soul in this congregation that has not been born again, however moral and strict, sober and religious, they may otherwise be. Oh, that you would consider it, whether you be young or old! There is reason to think that there are many in this congregation now hearing this discourse, that will actually be the subjects of this very misery to all eternity. We know not who they are, or in what seats they sit, or what thoughts they now have. It may be they are now at ease, and hear all these things without much disturbance, and are now flattering themselves that they are not the persons, promising themselves that they shall escape. If we knew that there was one person, and but one, in the whole congregation, that was to be the subject of this misery, what an awful thing it would be to think of! If we knew who it was, what an awful sight would it be to see such a person! How might all the rest of the congregation lift up a lamentable and bitter cry over him! But alas! instead of one, how many is it likely will remember this discourse in hell! And it would be a wonder, if some that are now present should not be in hell in a very short time, before this year is out. And it would be no wonder if some persons that now sit here in some seats of this meeting-house in health, and quiet and secure, should be there before to-morrow morning. Those of you that finally continue in a natural condition, that shall keep out of hell longest, will be there in a little time! Your damnation don't slumber, it will come swiftly and, in all probability, very suddenly upon many of you. You have reason to wonder that you are not already in hell. 'Tis doubtless the case of some that heretofore you have seen and known, that never deserved hell more than you and that heretofore appeared as likely to have been now alive as you. Their case is past all hope, they are crying in extreme misery and perfect despair. But here you are in the land of the living and in the house of God, and have an opportunity to obtain salvation. What would not those poor, damned, hopeless souls give for one day's such opportunity as you now enjoy!

And now you have an extraordinary opportunity, a day wherein Christ has flung the door of mercy wide open, and stands in the door calling and crying with a loud voice to poor sinners, a day wherein many are flocking to him and pressing into the Kingdom of God. Many are daily coming from the east, west, north and south, many that were very likely in the same miserable condition that you are in are in now a happy state, with their hearts filled with love to him that has loved them and washed them from their sins in his own blood, and rejoicing in hope of the glory of God. How awful is it to be left behind at such a day! To see so many others feasting, while you are pining and perishing! To see so many rejoicing and singing for joy of heart, while you have cause to mourn for sorrow of heart and howl for vexation of spirit! How can you rest for one moment in such a condition? Are not your souls as precious as the souls of the people at Suffield, where they are flocking from day to day to Christ?

Are there not many here that have lived long in the world that are not to this day born again, and so are aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and have done nothing ever since they have lived but treasure up wrath against the day of wrath? Oh, sirs, your case in an especial manner is extremely dangerous, your guilt and hardness of heart is extremely great. Don't you see how generally persons of your years are passed over and left in the present remarkable and wonderful dispensation of God's mercy? You had need to consider yourselves and wake thoroughly out of sleep, you cannot bear the fierceness and the wrath of the infinite God

And you that are young men and young women, will you neglect this precious season that you now enjoy, when so many others of your age are renouncing all youthful vanities and flocking to Christ! You especially have now an extraordinary opportunity, but if you neglect it, it will soon be with you as it is with those persons that spent away all the precious days of youth in sin and are now come to such a dreadful pass in blindness and hardness

And you children that are unconverted, don't you know that you are going down to hell to bear the dreadful wrath of that God that is now angry with you every day and every night? Will you be content to be the children of the devil, when so many other children in the land are converted and are become the holy and happy children of the King of kings?

And let every one that is yet out of Christ and hanging over the pit of hell, whether they be old men and women or middle-aged or young people or little children, now hearken to the loud calls of God's word and providence. This acceptable year of the Lord that is a day of such great favor to some will doubtless be a day of as remarkable vengeance to others. Men's hearts harden and their guilt increases apace at such a day as this, if they neglect their souls. And never was there so great danger of such persons being given up to hardness of heart and blindness of mind. God seems now to be hastily gathering in his elect in all parts of the land, and probably the bigger part of adult persons that ever shall be saved will be brought in now in a little time, and that it will be as it was on that great outpouring of the Spirit upon the Jews in the Apostles' days, the election will obtain and the rest will be blinded. If this should be the case with you, you will eternally curse this day, and will curse the day that ever you was born to see such a season of the pouring out of God's Spirit, and will wish that you had died and gone to hell before you had seen it. Now undoubtedly it is as it was in the days of John the Baptist, the axe is in an extraordinary manner laid at the root of the trees, that every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit may be hewn down and cast into the fire.

Therefore let every one that is out of Christ now awake and fly from the wrath to come. The wrath of Almighty God is now undoubtedly hanging over great part of this congregation. Let every one fly out of Sodom. 'Haste and escape for your lives, look not behind you, escape to the mountain, lest ye be consumed.'

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

1706-1790

A QUERY ON STYLE<sup>1</sup>

QUERY How shall we judge of the goodness of a writing? Or what qualities should a writing have to be good and perfect of its kind?

ANSWER To be good, it ought to have a tendency to benefit the reader by improving his virtue or his knowledge. But, not regarding the intention of the author, the method should be just, that is, it should proceed regularly from things known to things unknown, distinctly and clearly without confusion. The words used should be the most expressive that the language affords, provided that they are the most generally understood. Nothing should be expressed in two words that can be as well expressed in one, that is, no synonyms should be used, or very rarely, but the whole should be so placed as to be agreeable to the ear in reading, summarily it should be smooth, clear, and short, for the contrary qualities are displeasing.

But, taking the query otherwise, an ill man may write an ill thing well, that is, having an ill design, he may use the properest style and arguments (considering who are to be readers) to attain his ends. In this sense, that is best wrote, which is best adapted for obtaining the end of the writer.

FROM THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY

DEAR SON: I have ever had pleasure in obtaining any little anecdotes of my ancestors. You may remember the inquiries I made among the remains of my relations when you were with me in England, and the journey I undertook for that purpose. Now imagining it may be equally agreeable to you to know the circumstances of my life, many of which you are yet unacquainted with, and expecting a week's uninterrupted leisure in my present country retirement, I sit down to write them for you. To which I have besides some other inducements. Having emerged from the poverty and obscurity in which I was born and bred, to a state of affluence and some degree of reputation in the world, and having gone so far through life with a considerable share of felicity, the conducting means I made use of, which with the blessing of God so well succeeded, my posterity may like to know, as they may find some of them suitable to their own situations, and therefore fit to be imitated.

That felicity, when I reflected on it, has induced me sometimes to say, that were it offered to my choice, I should have no objection to a repetition of the same life from its beginning, only asking the advantages authors have in a second edition to correct some faults of the first. So would I, if I might, besides correcting the faults, change some sinister accidents and events of it for others more favorable. But though this were denied, I should still accept the offer. However, since such a repetition is not to be expected, the next thing most like living one's life over again seems to be a recollection of that life, and to make that recollection as durable as possible by putting it down in writing.

Hereby, too, I shall indulge the inclination, so natural in old men, to be talking of themselves and their own past actions, and I shall indulge it without being troublesome to others, who, through respect to age, might conceive themselves obliged to give me a hearing, since this may be read or not as any one pleases. And, lastly (I may as well confess it, since my denial of it will be believed by nobody), perhaps I shall a good deal gratify my own vanity. Indeed, I scarce ever heard or saw the introductory words, 'Without vanity I may say,' etc., but some vain thing immediately followed. Most people dislike vanity in others, whatever share they have of it themselves, but I give it fair quarter wherever I meet with it, being persuaded that it is often productive of good to the possessor, and to others that are within his sphere of action, and therefore, in many cases, it would not be quite absurd if a man were to thank God for his vanity among the other comforts of life —

And now I speak of thanking God, I desire with all humility to acknowledge that I owe the mentioned happiness of my past life to His kind providence, which led me to the means I used and gave them success. My belief of this induces me to hope, though I must not presume, that the same goodness will still be exercised towards me in continuing that happiness, or in enabling me to bear a fatal reverse, which I may experience as others have done, the complexion of my future fortune being known to Him only, in whose power it is to bless to us even our afflictions.

The notes one of my uncles (who had the same kind of curiosity in collecting family anecdotes), once put into my hands, furnished me with several particulars relating to our ancestors. From these notes I learned that the family had lived in the same village, Ecton, in Northamptonshire, for three hundred years, and how much longer he knew not (perhaps from the time when the name Franklin, that before was the name of an order of people, was assumed by them for a surname, when others took surnames all over the kingdom), on a freehold of about thirty acres, aided by the smith's business, which had continued in the family till his time, the eldest son being always bred to that business, a custom which he and my father followed as to their eldest sons. When I searched the registers at Ecton, I found an account of their births, marriages and burials from the year 1555 only, there being no register kept in that parish at any time preceding. By that register I perceived that I was the youngest son of the youngest son for five generations back. My grandfather Thomas, who was born in 1598, lived at Ecton till he grew too old to follow business longer, when he went to live with his son John, a dyer at Banbury, in Oxfordshire, with whom my father served an apprenticeship. There my grandfather died and lies buried. We saw his gravestone in 1758. His eldest son Thomas lived in the house at Ecton, and left it with the land to his only child, a daughter, who, with her husband, one Fisher, of Wellingborough, sold it to Mr. Isted, now lord of the manor there. My grandfather had four sons that grew up, viz. Thomas, John, Benjamin, and Josiah. I will give you what account I can of them, at this distance from my papers, and if these are not lost in my absence, you will among them find many more particulars.

Thomas was bred a smith under his father, but, being ingenious, and encouraged in learning (as all his brothers likewise were) by an Esquire Palmer, then the principal gentleman in that parish, he qualified himself for the business of scrivener, became a considerable man in the county affairs, was a chief mover of all public-spirited undertakings for the county or town of Northampton, and his own village, of which many instances were told us, and he was at Ecton much taken notice of and patronized by the then Lord Halifax. He died in 1702, January 6, old style, just four years to a day before I was born. The account we received of his life and character from some old people at Ecton, I remember, struck you as something extraordinary, from its similarity to what you knew of mine. 'Had he died on the same day,' you said, 'one might have supposed a transmigration.'

John was bred a dyer, I believe of woollens. Benjamin was bred a silk-dyer, serving an apprenticeship at London. He was an ingenious man. I remember him well, for when I was a boy he came over to my father in Boston, and lived in the house with us some years. He lived to a great age. His grandson, Samuel Franklin, now lives in Boston. He left behind him two quarto volumes, ms. of his own poetry, consisting of little occasional pieces addressed to his friends and relations, of which the following, sent to me, is a specimen. He had formed a shorthand of his own, which he taught me, but never practising it, I have now forgot it. I was named after this uncle, there being a particular affection between him and my father. He was very pious, a great attender of sermons of the best preachers, which he took down in his shorthand, and had with him many volumes of them. He was also much of a politician, too much, perhaps, for his station. There fell lately into my hands, in London, a collection he had made of all the principal pamphlets relating to public affairs from 1641 to 1717. Many of the volumes are wanting, as appears by the numbering, but there still remains eight volumes folio and twenty-four in quarto and in octavo. A dealer in old books met with them, and knowing me by my sometimes buying of him, he brought them to me. It seems my uncle must have left them here when he went to America, which was above fifty years since. There are many of his notes in the margins.

This obscure family of ours was early in the Reformation, and continued Protestants through the reign of Queen Mary, when they were sometimes in danger of trouble on account of their zeal against popery. They had got an English Bible, and to conceal and secure it, it was fastened open with tapes under and within the frame of a joint-stool. When my great-great-grandfather read it to his family, he turned up the joint-stool upon his knees, turning over the leaves then under the tapes. One of the children stood at the door to give notice if he saw the apparitor coming, who was an officer of the spiritual court. In that case the stool was turned down again upon its feet, when the Bible remained concealed under it as before. This anecdote I had from my uncle Benjamin. The family continued all of the Church of England till about the end of Charles the Second's reign, when some of the ministers that had been ousted for nonconformity, holding conventicles in Northamptonshire, Benjamin and Josiah adhered to them, and so continued all their lives. The rest of the family remained with the Episcopal Church.

Josiah, my father, married young, and carried his wife with three children into New England, about 1682. The conventicles having been forbidden by law, and frequently disturbed, induced some considerable men of his acquaintance to remove to that country, and he was prevailed with to accompany them thither, where they expected to enjoy their mode of religion with freedom. By the same wife he had four children more born there, and by a second wife ten more, in all seventeen, of which I remember thirteen sitting at one time at his table, who all grew up to be men and women, and married. I was the youngest son, and the youngest child but two, and was born in Boston, New England. My mother, the second wife, was Abiah Folger, daughter of Peter Folger, one of the first settlers of New England, of whom honorable mention is made by Cotton Mather, in his church history of that country, entitled Magnalia Christi Americana, as 'a godly, learned Englishman,' if I remember the words rightly. I have heard that he wrote sundry small occasional pieces, but only one of them was printed, which I saw now many years since. It was written in 1675, in the homespun verse of that time and people, and addressed to those then concerned in the government there. It was in favor of liberty of conscience, and in behalf of the Baptists, Quakers, and other sectaries that had been under persecution, ascribing the Indian wars, and other distresses that had befallen the country, to that persecution, as so many judgments of God to punish so heinous an offense, and exhorting a repeal of those uncharitable laws. The whole appeared to me as written with a good deal of decent plainness and manly freedom. The six last concluding lines I remember, though I have forgotten the two first of the stanza, but the purport of them was that his censures proceeded from good will, and, therefore he would be known as the author

'Because to be a libeller (says he)

I hate it with my heart,

From Sherburne town, where now I dwell,

My name I do put here,

Without offense your real friend,

It is Peter Folger.'

My elder brothers were all put apprentices to different trades. I was put to the grammar school at eight years of age, my father intending to devote me, as the tithe of his sons, to the service of the Church. My early readiness in learning to read (which must have been very early, as I do not remember when I could not read), and the opinion of all his friends that I should certainly make a good scholar, encouraged him in this purpose of his. My uncle Benjamin, too, approved of it, and proposed to give me all his shorthand volumes of sermons, I suppose as a stock to set up with if I would learn his character. I continued, however, at the grammar school not quite one year, though in that time I had risen gradually from the middle of the class of that year to be the head of it, and farther was removed into the next class above it, in order to go with that into the third at the end of the year. But my father, in the meantime, from a view of the expense of a college education, which having so large a family he could not well afford, and the mean living many so educated were afterwards able to obtain—reasons that he gave to his friends in my hearing—altered his first intention, took me from the grammar school, and sent me to a school for writing and arithmetic, kept by a then famous man, Mr George Brownell, very successful in his profession generally, and that by mild, encouraging methods. Under him I acquired fair writing pretty soon, but I failed in the arithmetic, and made no progress in it. At ten years old I was taken home to assist my father in his business, which was that of a tallow-chandler and soap-boiler, a business he was not bred to, but had assumed on his arrival in New England, and on finding his dying trade would not maintain his family, being in little request. Accordingly, I was employed in cutting wick for the candles, filling the dipping mold and the molds for cast-candles, attending the shop, going of errands, etc.

I disliked the trade, and had a strong inclination for the sea, but my father declared against it, however, living near the water, I was much in and about it, learned early to swim well, and to manage boats, and when in a boat or canoe with other boys, I was commonly allowed to govern, especially in any case of difficulty, and upon other occasions I was generally a leader among the boys, and sometimes led them into scrapes, of which I will mention one instance, as it shows an early projecting public spirit, though not then justly conducted.

There was a salt marsh that bounded part of the mill pond, on the edge of which, at high water, we used to stand to fish for minnows By much tramping, we had made it a mere quagmire My proposal was to build a wharf there fit for us to stand upon, and I showed my comrades a large heap of stones, which were intended for a new house near the marsh, and which would very well suit our purpose Accordingly, in the evening, when the workmen were gone, I assembled a number of my playfellows, and working with them diligently like so many emmets, sometimes two or three to a stone, we brought them all away and built our little wharf The next morning the workmen were surprised at missing the stones, which were found in our wharf Inquiry was made after the removers, we were discovered and complained of, several of us were corrected by our fathers, and, though I pleaded the usefulness of the work, mine convinced me that nothing was useful which was not honest

I think you may like to know something of his person and character He had an excellent constitution of body, was of middle stature, but well set, and very strong He was ingenious, could draw prettily, was skilled a little in music, and had a clear pleasing voice, so that when he played psalm tunes on his violin and sung withal, as he sometimes did in an evening after the business of the day was over, it was extremely agreeable to hear He had a mechanical genius too, and, on occasion, was very handy in the use of other tradesmen's tools. But his great excellence lay in a sound understanding and solid judgment in prudential matters, both in private and public affairs In the latter, indeed, he was never employed, the numerous family he had to educate and the straitness of his circumstances keeping him close to his trade, but I remember well his being frequently visited by leading people, who consulted him for his opinion in affairs of the town or of the church he belonged to, and showed a good deal of respect for his judgment and advice. He was also much consulted by private persons about their affairs when any difficulty occurred, and frequently chosen an arbitrator between contending parties At his table he liked to have, as often as he could, some sensible friend or neighbor to converse with, and always took care to start some ingenious or useful topic for discourse, which might tend to improve the minds of his children By this means he turned our attention to what was good, just, and prudent in the conduct of life, and little or no notice was ever taken of what related to the victuals on the table, whether it was well- or ill-dressed, in or out of season, of good or bad flavor, preferable or inferior to this or that other thing of the kind, so that I was brought up in such a perfect inattention to those matters as to be quite indifferent what kind of food was set before me, and so unobservant of it that to this day, if I am asked, I can scarce tell a few hours after dinner what I dined upon This has been a convenience to me in travelling, where my companions have been sometimes very unhappy for want of a suitable gratification of their more delicate, because better instructed, tastes and appetites

My mother had likewise an excellent constitution she suckled all her ten children I never knew either my father or mother to have any sickness but that of which they died, he at 89, and she at 85 years of age They lie buried together at Boston, where I some years since placed a marble over their grave, with this inscription

and Abiah his wife he here interred*

They lived lovingly together in wedlock fifty-five years

*Without an estate, or any gainful employment,
By constant labor and industry, with God's blessing*

They maintained a large family comfortably, and brought up thirteen children and seven grandchildren reputably

*From this instance, reader, Be encouraged to diligence in thy calling,
And distrust not Providence*

He was a pious and prudent man, She, a discreet and virtuous woman

Their youngest son, In filial regard to their memory, Places this stone

*J F born 1655, died 1744, Aetat 89.
A.F born 1667, died 1752, —85*

By my rambling digressions I perceive myself to be grown old I used to write more methodically But one does not dress for private company as for a public ball 'Tis perhaps only negligence

To return I continued thus employed in my father's business for two years, that is, till I was twelve years old, and my brother John, who was bred to that business, having left my father, married and set up for himself at Rhode Island, there was all appearance that I was destined to supply his place, and become a tallow-chandler But my dislike to the trade continuing, my father was under apprehensions that if he did not find one for me more agreeable, I should break away and get to sea, as his son Josiah had done to his great vexation He therefore sometimes took me to walk with him, and see joiners, bricklayers, turners, braziers, etc., at their work, that he might observe my inclination, and endeavor to fix it on some trade or other on land It has ever since been a pleasure to me to see good workmen handle their tools, and it has been useful to me, having learned so much by it as to be able to do little jobs myself in my house when a workman could not readily be got, and to construct little machines for my experiments, while the intention of making the experiment was fresh and warm in my mind My father at last fixed upon the cutler's trade, and my uncle Benjamin's son Samuel, who was bred to that business in London, being about that time established in Boston, I was sent to be with him some time on liking But his expectations of a fee with me displeasing my father, I was taken home again

From a child I was fond of reading, and all the little money that came into my hands was ever laid out in books Pleased with the Pilgrim's Progress, my first collection was of John Bunyan's works, in separate little volumes I afterward sold them to enable me to buy R. Burton's Historical Collections, they were small chapmen's books, and cheap, forty or fifty in all My father's little library consisted chiefly of books in polemic divinity, most of which I read, and have since often regretted that, at a time when I had such a thirst for knowledge, more proper books had not fallen in my way, since it was now resolved I should not be a clergyman Plutarch's Lives there was in which I read abundantly, and I still think that time spent to great advantage There was also a book of De Foe's, called an Essay on Projects, and another of Dr Mather's, called Essays to do Good, which perhaps gave me a turn of thinking that had an influence on some of the principal future events of my life

This bookish inclination at length determined my father to make me a printer, though he had already one son, James, of that profession In 1717 my brother James returned from England with a press and letters to set up his business in Boston I liked it much better than that of my father, but still had a hankering for the sea To prevent the apprehended effect of such an inclination, my father was impatient to have me bound to my brother I stood out some time, but at last was persuaded, and signed the indentures when I was yet but twelve years old I was to serve as an apprentice till I was twenty-one years of age, only I was to be allowed journeyman's wages during the last year In a little time I made great proficiency in the business, and became a useful hand to my brother I now had access to better books An acquaintance with the apprentices of booksellers enabled me sometimes to borrow a small one, which I was careful to return soon and clean Often I sat up in my room reading the greatest part of the night, when the book was borrowed in the evening and to be returned early in the morning lest it should be missed or wanted And after some time an ingenious tradesman, Mr. Matthew Adams, who had a pretty collection of books, and who frequented our printing-house, took notice of me, invited me to his library, and very kindly lent me such books as I chose to read

I now took a fancy to poetry, and made some little pieces My brother, thinking it might turn to account, encouraged me, and put me on composing occasional ballads One was called the Lighthouse Tragedy, and contained an account of the drowning of Captain Worthulake, with his two daughters, the other was a sailor song, on the taking of Teach (or Blackbeard) the pirate They were wretched stuff, in the Grubstreet ballad style, and when they were printed he sent me about the town to sell them The first sold wonderfully, the event, being recent, having made a great noise This flattered my vanity, but my father discouraged me by ridiculing my performances, and telling me verse-makers were generally beggars So I escaped being a poet, most probably a very bad one But as prose writing has been of great use to me in the course of my life, and was a principal means of my advancement, I shall tell you how, in such a situation, I acquired what little ability I have in that way

There was another bookish lad in the town, John Collins by name, with whom I was intimately acquainted We sometimes disputed, and very fond we were of argument, and very desirous of confuting one another, which disputatious turn, by the way, is apt to become a very bad habit, making people often extremely disagreeable in company by the contradiction that is necessary to bring it into practice, and thence, besides souring and spoiling the conversation, [is] productive of disgusts and perhaps enmities where you may have occasion for friendship I had caught it by reading my father's books of dispute about religion Persons of good sense, I have since observed, seldom fall into it, except lawyers, university men, and men of all sorts that have been bred at Edinburgh

A question was once, somehow or other, started between Collins and me, of the propriety of educating the female sex in learning, and their abilities for study He was of opinion that it was improper, and that they were naturally unequal to it I took the contrary side, perhaps a little for dispute's sake He was naturally more eloquent, had a ready plenty of words, and sometimes, as I thought, bore me down more by his fluency than by the strength of his reasons As we parted without settling the point, and were not to see one another again for some time, I sat down to put my arguments in writing, which I copied fair and sent to him He answered, and I replied Three or four letters of a side had passed, when my father happened to find my papers and read them Without entering into the discussion, he took occasion to talk to me about the manner of my writing, observed that, though I had the advantage of my antagonist in correct spelling and pointing (which I owed to the printing-house), I fell far short in elegance of expression, in method and in perspicuity, of which he convinced me by several instances I saw the justice of his remarks, and thence grew more attentive to the manner in writing, and determined to endeavor at improvement.

About this time I met with an odd volume of the Spectator It was the third I had never before seen any of them I bought it, read it over and over, and was much delighted with it I thought the writing excellent, and wished, if possible, to imitate it With that view I took some of the papers, and, making short hints of the sentiment in each sentence, laid them by a few days, and then, without looking at the book, tried to complete the papers again, by expressing each hinted sentiment at length, and as fully as it had been expressed before, in any suitable words that should come to hand Then I compared my 'Spectator' with the original, discovered some of my faults, and corrected them But I found I wanted a stock of words, or a readiness in recollecting and using them, which I thought I should have acquired before that time if I had gone on making verses, since the continual occasion for words of the same import but of different length to suit the measure, or of different sound for the rhyme, would have laid me under a constant necessity of searching for variety, and also have tended to fix that variety in my mind, and make me master of it Therefore I took some of the tales and turned them into verse And, after a time, when I had pretty well forgotten the prose, turned them back again I also sometimes jumbled my collections of hints into confusion, and after some weeks endeavored to reduce them into the best order, before I began to form the full sentences and complete the paper This was to teach me method in the arrangement of thoughts By comparing my work afterwards with the original, I discovered many faults and amended them, but I sometimes had the pleasure of fancying that, in certain particulars of small import, I had been lucky enough to improve the method or the language, and this encouraged me to think I might possibly in time come to be a tolerable English writer, of which I was extremely ambitious

My time for these exercises and for reading was at night, after work or before it began in the morning, or on Sundays, when I contrived to be in the printing-house alone, evading as much as I could the common attendance on public worship which my father used to exact of me when I was under his care, and which indeed I still thought a duty, though I could not, as it seemed to me, afford time to practise it

When about sixteen years of age I happened to meet with a book, written by one Tryon, recommending a vegetable diet I determined to go into it My brother, being yet unmarried, did not keep house, but boarded himself and his apprentices in another family My refusing to eat flesh occasioned an inconveniency, and I was frequently chid for my singularity I made myself acquainted with Tryon's manner of preparing some of his dishes, such as boiling potatoes or rice, making hasty pudding, and a few others, and then proposed to my brother, that if he would give me weekly half the money he paid for my board, I would board myself He instantly agreed to it, and I presently found that I could save half what he paid me This was an additional fund for buying books But I had another advantage in it My brother and the rest going from the printing-house to their meals, I remained there alone, and, despatching presently my light repast (which often was no more than a biscuit or a slice of bread, a handful of raisins or a tart from the pastry-cook's, and a glass of water), had the rest of the time till their return for study, in which I made the greater progress, from that greater clearness of head and quicker apprehension which usually attend temperance in eating and drinking

And now it was that, being on some occasion made ashamed of my ignorance in figures, which I had twice failed in learning when at school, I took Cocker's book of arithmetic, and went through the whole by myself with great ease I also read Seller's and Sturmy's books of navigation, and became acquainted with the little geometry they contain, but never proceeded far in that science And I read about this time Locke On Human Understanding, and The Art of Thinking, by Messrs du Port Royal

While I was intent on improving my language, I met with an English grammar (I think it was Greenwood's), at the end of which there were two little sketches of the arts of rhetoric and logic, the latter finishing with a specimen of a dispute in the Socratic method, and soon after I procured Xenophon's Memorable Things of Socrates, wherein there are many instances of the same method I was charmed with it, adopted it, dropped my abrupt contradiction and positive argumentation, and put on the humble inquirer and doubter And being then, from reading Shaftesbury and Collins, become a real doubter in many points of our religious doctrine, I found this method safest for myself and very embarrassing to those against whom I used it, therefore I took a delight in it, practised it continually, and grew very artful and expert in drawing people, even of superior knowledge, into concessions, the consequences of which they did not foresee, entangling them in difficulties out of which they could not extricate themselves, and so obtaining victories that neither myself nor my cause always deserved I continued this method some few years, but gradually left it, retaining only the habit of expressing myself in terms of modest diffidence, never using, when I advanced any thing that may possibly be disputed, the words 'certainly,' 'undoubtedly,' or any others that give the air of positiveness to an opinion, but rather say, 'I conceive' or 'I apprehend' a thing to be so or so, 'it appears to me,' or 'I should think it so or so for such and such reasons,' or 'it is so, if I am not mistaken' This habit, I believe, has been of great advantage to me when I have had occasion to inculcate my opinions, and persuade men into measures that I have been from time to time engaged in promoting And, as the chief ends of conversation are 'to inform' or 'to be informed,' 'to please' or 'to persuade,' I wish well meaning, sensible men would not lessen their power of doing good by a positive, assuming manner that seldom fails to disgust, tends to create opposition, and to defeat every one of those purposes for which speech was given to us, to wit, giving or receiving information or pleasure For, if you would 'inform,' a positive, dogmatical manner in advancing your sentiments may provoke contradiction and prevent a candid attention If you wish information and improvement from the knowledge of others, and yet at the same time express yourself as firmly fixed in your present opinions, modest, sensible men, who do not love disputation, will probably leave you undisturbed in the possession of your error. And by such a manner, you can seldom hope to recommend yourself in 'pleasing' your hearers, or to persuade those whose concurrence you desire Pope says, judiciously,

'Men should be taught as if you taught them not,
And things unknown proposed as things forgot,'

farther recommending it to us,

'To speak, tho' sure, with seeming diffidence.'

And he might have coupled with this line that which he has coupled with another, I think less properly,

'For want of modesty is want of sense '

If you ask, 'why less properly,' I must repeat the lines,

'Immodest words admit of no defense,
For want of modesty is want of sense '

Now, is not want of sense (where a man is so unfortunate as to want it) some apology for his want of modesty? and would not the lines stand more justly thus?

'Immodest words admit but this defense,
That want of modesty is want of sense '

This however, I should submit to better judgments

My brother had, in 1720 or '21, begun to print a newspaper. It was the second that appeared in America, and was called the New England Courant. The only one before it was the Boston News-Letter. I remember his being dissuaded by some of his friends from the undertaking, as not likely to succeed, one newspaper being in their judgment enough for America. At this time, 1771, there are not less than five-and-twenty. He went on however with the undertaking, and after having worked in composing the types and printing off the sheets, I was employed to carry the papers thro' the streets to the customers.

He had some ingenious men among his friends, who amused themselves by writing little pieces for this paper, which gained it credit and made it more in demand, and these gentlemen often visited us. Hearing their conversations, and their accounts of the approbation their papers were received with, I was excited to try my hand among them. But being still a boy and suspecting that my brother would object to printing anything of mine in his paper if he knew it to be mine, I contrived to disguise my hand, and, writing an anonymous paper, I put it in at night under the door of the printing-house. It was found in the morning, and communicated to his writing friends when they called in as usual. They read it, commented on it in my hearing, and I had the exquisite pleasure of finding it met with their approbation, and that, in their different guesses at the author, none were named but men of some character among us for learning and ingenuity. I suppose now that I was rather lucky in my judges, and that perhaps they were not really so very good ones as I then esteemed them.

Encouraged, however, by this, I wrote and conveyed in the same way to the press several more papers which were equally approved, and I kept my secret till my small fund of sense for such performances was pretty well exhausted, and then I discovered it, when[ce] I began to be considered a little more by my brother's acquaintance, and in a manner that did not quite please him, as he thought, probably with reason, that it tended to make me too vain. And, perhaps, this might be one occasion of the differences that we began to have about this time. Though a brother, he considered himself as my master, and me as his apprentice, and, accordingly, expected the same services from me as he would from another, while I thought he demeaned me too much in some he required of me, who from a brother expected more indulgence. Our disputes were often brought before our father, and I fancy I was either generally in the right, or else a better pleader, because the judgment was generally in my favor. But my brother was passionate, and had often beaten me, which I took extremely amiss, and, thinking my apprenticeship very tedious, I was continually wishing for some opportunity of shortening it, which at length offered in a manner unexpected

One of the pieces in our newspaper on some political point, which I have now forgotten, gave offense to the Assembly. He was taken up, censured, and imprisoned for a month, by the speaker's warrant, I suppose, because he would not discover his author. I too was taken up and examined before the council, but, though I did not give them any satisfaction, they contented themselves with admonishing me, and dismissed me, considering me, perhaps, as an apprentice, who was bound to keep his master's secrets

During my brother's confinement, which I resented a good deal, notwithstanding our private differences, I had the management of the paper, and I made bold to give our rulers some rubs in it, which my brother took very kindly, while others began to consider me in an unfavorable light, as a young genius that had a turn for libelling and satire. My brother's discharge was accompanied with an order of the House (a very odd one), that 'James Franklin should no longer print the paper called the New England Courant'

There was a consultation held in our printing-house among his friends, what he should do in this case. Some proposed to evade the order by changing the name of the paper, but my brother, seeing inconveniences in that, it was finally concluded on as a better way, to let it be printed for the future under the name of Benjamin Franklin. And to avoid the censure of the Assembly, that might fall on him as still printing it by his apprentice, the contrivance was that my old indenture should be returned to me, with a full discharge on the back of it, to be shown on occasion, but to secure to him the benefit of my service, I was to sign new indentures for the remainder of the term, which were to be kept private. A very flimsy scheme it was, but, however, it was immediately executed, and the paper went on accordingly, under my name for several months

At length, a fresh difference arising between my brother and me, I took upon me to assert my freedom, presuming that he would not venture to produce the new indentures. It was not fair in me to take this advantage, and thus I therefore reckon one of the first errata of my life. But the unfairness of it weighed little with me, when under the impressions of resentment for the blows his passion too often urged him to bestow upon me. Though he was otherwise not an ill-natured man, perhaps I was too saucy and provoking

When he found I would leave him, he took care to prevent my getting employment in any other printing-house of the town, by going round and speaking to every master, who accordingly refused to give me work. I then thought of going to New York, as the nearest place where there was a printer, and I was rather inclined to leave Boston when I reflected that I had already made myself a little obnoxious to the governing party, and, from the arbitrary proceedings of the Assembly in my brother's case, it was likely I might, if I stayed, soon bring myself into scrapes, and farther, that my indiscrete disputations about religion began to make me pointed at with horror by good people as an infidel or atheist. I determined on the point, but my father now siding with my brother, I was sensible that, if I attempted to go openly, means would be used to prevent me. My friend Collins, therefore, undertook to manage a little for me. He agreed with the captain of a New York sloop for my passage, under the notion of my being a young acquaintance of his, that had got a naughty girl with child, whose friends would compel me to marry her, and therefore I could not appear or come away publicly. So I sold some of my books to raise a little money, was taken on board privately, and as we had a fair wind, in three days I found myself in New York, near three hundred miles from home, a boy of but seventeen, without the least recommendation to or knowledge of any person in the place, and with very little money in my pocket

My inclinations for the sea were by this time worn out, or I might now have gratified them. But, having a trade, and supposing myself a pretty good workman, I offered my service to the printer in the place, old Mr. William Bradford, who had been the first printer in Pennsylvania, but removed from thence upon the quarrel of George Keith. He could give me no employment, having little to do and help enough already. But, says he, 'My son at Philadelphia has lately lost his principal hand, Aquila Rose, by death, if you go thither, I believe he may employ you' Philadelphia was a hundred miles further I set out, however, in a boat for Amboy, leaving my chest and things to follow me round by sea

In crossing the bay, we met with a squall that tore our rotten sails to pieces, prevented our getting into the Kill, and drove us upon Long Island In our way, a drunken Dutchman, who was a passenger too, fell overboard, when he was sinking, I reached through the water to his shock-pate, and drew him up, so that we got him in again His ducking sobered him a little, and he went to sleep, taking first out of his pocket a book, which he desired I would dry for him It proved to be my old favorite author, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, in Dutch, finely printed on good paper, with copper cuts, a dress better than I had ever seen it wear in its own language I have since found that it has been translated into most of the languages of Europe, and suppose it has been more generally read than any other book, except perhaps the Bible Honest John was the first that I know of who mixed narration and dialogue, a method of writing very engaging to the reader, who in the most interesting parts finds himself, as it were, brought into the company and present at the discourse De Foe in his Crusoe, his Moll Flanders, Religious Courtship, Family Instructor, and other pieces, has imitated it with success, and Richardson has done the same in his Pamela, etc

When we drew near the island, we found it was at a place where there could be no landing, there being a great surf on the stony beach So we dropped anchor, and swung round towards the shore Some people came down to the water edge and halloed to us, as we did to them, but the wind was so high, and the surf so loud, that we could not hear so as to understand each other There were canoes on the shore, and we made signs, and halloed that they should fetch us, but they either did not understand us, or thought it impracticable So they went away, and night coming on, we had no remedy but to wait till the wind should abate, and, in the mean time, the boatman and I concluded to sleep, if we could, and so crowded into the scuttle, with the

Dutchman, who was still wet, and the spray beating over the head of our boat, leaked through to us, so that we were soon almost as wet as he In this manner we lay all night, with very little rest But the wind abating the next day, we made a shift to reach Amboy before night, having been thirty hours on the water, without victuals, or any drink but a bottle of filthy rum, the water we sailed on being salt

In the evening I found myself very feverish, and went in to bed, but, having read somewhere that cold water drank plentifully was good for a fever, I followed the prescription, sweat plentifully most of the night, my fever left me, and in the morning, crossing the ferry, I proceeded on my journey on foot, having fifty miles to Burlington, where I was told I should find boats that would carry me the rest of the way to Philadelphia

It rained very hard all the day, I was thoroughly soaked, and by noon a good deal tired, so I stopped at a poor inn, where I stayed all night, beginning now to wish that I had never left home I cut so miserable a figure, too, that I found, by the questions asked me, I was suspected to be some runaway servant, and in danger of being taken up on that suspicion However, I proceeded the next day, and got in the evening to an inn, within eight or ten miles of Burlington, kept by one Dr Brown

He entered into conversation with me while I took some refreshment, and, finding I had read a little, became very sociable and friendly Our acquaintance continued as long as he lived He had been, I imagine, an itinerant doctor, for there was no town in England, or country in Europe, of which he could not give a very particular account He had some letters, and was ingenious, but much of an unbeliever, and wickedly undertook, some years after, to travesty the Bible in doggerel verse, as Cotton had done Virgil By this means he set many of the facts in a very ridiculous light, and might have hurt weak minds if his work had been published, but it never was

At his house I lay that night, and the next morning reached Burlington, but had the mortification to find that the regular boats were gone a little before my coming, and no other expected to go before Tuesday, this being Saturday Wherefore I returned to an old woman in the town, of whom I had bought gingerbread to eat on the water, and asked her advice. She invited me to lodge at her house till a passage by water should offer, and being tired with my foot travelling, I accepted the invitation. She understanding I was a printer would have had me stay at that town and follow my business, being ignorant of the stock necessary to begin with. She was very hospitable, gave me a dinner of ox-cheek with great good will, accepting only a pot of ale in return. And I thought myself fixed till Tuesday should come. However, walking in the evening by the side of the river, a boat came by, which I found was going towards Philadelphia, with several people in her. They took me in, and, as there was no wind, we rowed all the way, and about midnight, not having yet seen the city, some of the company were confident we must have passed it, and would row no farther, the others knew not where we were, so we put towards the shore, got into a creek, landed near an old fence, with the rails of which we made a fire, the night being cold, in October, and there we remained till daylight. Then one of the company knew the place to be Cooper's Creek, a little above Philadelphia, which we saw as soon as we got out of the creek, and arrived there about eight or nine o'clock on the Sunday morning, and landed at the Market Street wharf.

I have been the more particular in this description of my journey, and shall be so of my first entry into that city, that you may in your mind compare such unlikely beginnings with the figure I have since made there. I was in my working dress, my best clothes being to come round by sea. I was dirty from my journey, my pockets were stuffed out with shirts and stockings, I knew no soul nor where to look for lodging. I was fatigued with travelling, rowing and want of rest, I was very hungry, and my whole stock of cash consisted of a Dutch dollar, and about a shilling in copper. The latter I gave the people of the boat for my passage, who at first refused it, on account of my rowing, but I insisted on their taking it, a man being sometimes more generous when he has but a little money than when he has plenty, perhaps through fear of being thought to have but little.

Then I walked up the street, gazing about, till near the market-house I met a boy with bread. I had made many a meal on bread, and, inquiring where he got it, I went immediately to the baker's he directed me to, in Second Street, and asked for biscuit, intending such as we had in Boston, but they, it seems, were not made in Philadelphia. Then I asked for a three-penny loaf, and was told they had none such, so not considering or knowing the difference of money, and the greater cheapness nor the names of his bread, I bade him give me three-penny worth of any sort. He gave me three great puffy rolls. I was surprised at the quantity, but took it, and, having no room in my pockets, walked off with a roll under each arm, and eating the other. Thus I went up Market Street as far as Fourth Street, passing by the door of Mr Read, my future wife's father, when she, standing at the door, saw me, and thought I made, as I certainly did, a most awkward, ridiculous appearance. Then I turned and went down Chestnut Street and part of Walnut Street, eating my roll all the way, and, coming round, found myself again at Market Street Wharf, near the boat I came in, to which I went for a draught of the river water, and, being filled with one of my rolls, gave the other two to a woman and her child that came down the river in the boat with us, and were waiting to go farther.

Thus refreshed, I walked again up the street, which by this time had many clean-dressed people in it, who were all walking the same way. I joined them, and thereby was led into the great meeting-house of the Quakers near the market. I sat down among them, and, after looking round awhile and hearing nothing said, being very drowsy through labor and want of rest the preceding night, I fell fast asleep, and continued so till the meeting broke up, when one was kind enough to rouse me. This was, therefore, the first house I was in, or slept in, in Philadelphia.

Walking down again towards the river, and, looking in the faces of people, I met a young Quaker man, whose countenance I liked, and, accosting him, requested he would tell me where a stranger could get lodging. We were then near the sign of the Three Mariners. 'Here,' says he, 'is one place that entertains strangers, but it is not a reputable house, if thee wilt walk with me, I'll show thee a better ' He brought me to the Crooked Billet in Water Street Here I got a dinner And, while I was eating it, several sly questions were asked me, as it seemed to be suspected from my youth and appearance, that I might be some runaway.

After dinner, my sleepiness returned, and being shown to a bed, I lay down without undressing, and slept till six in the evening, was called to supper, went to bed again very early and slept soundly till next morning Then I made myself as tidy as I could, and went to Andrew Bradford, the printer's I found in the shop the old man, his father, whom I had seen at New York, and who, travelling on horseback, had got to Philadelphia before me He introduced me to his son, who received me civilly, gave me a breakfast, but told me he did not at present want a hand, being lately supplied with one But there was another printer in town, lately set up, one Keimer, who, perhaps, might employ me, if not, I should be welcome to lodge at his house, and he would give me a little work to do now and then till fuller business should offer

The old gentleman said he would go with me to the new printer, and when we found him, 'Neighbor,' says Bradford, 'I have brought to see you a young man of your business, perhaps you may want such a one ' He asked me a few questions, put a composing stick in my hand to see how I worked, and then said he would employ me soon, though he had just then nothing for me to do And, taking old Bradford, whom he had never seen before, to be one of the townspeople that had a good will for him, entered into a conversation on his present undertaking and prospects, while Bradford, not discovering that he was the other printer's father, on Keimer's saying he expected soon to get the greatest part of the business into his own hands, drew him on by artful questions, and starting little doubts, to explain all his views, what interest he relied on, and in what manner he intended to proceed I, who stood by and heard all, saw immediately that one of them was a crafty old sophister, and the other a mere novice Bradford left me with Keimer, who was greatly surprised when I told him who the old man was small, worn-out font of English, which he was then using himself, composing in it an elegy on Aquila Rose, before mentioned, an ingenious young man, of excellent character, much respected in the town, clerk of the Assembly, and a pretty poet Keimer made verses too, but very indifferently He could not be said to write them, for his manner was to compose them in the types directly out of his head So there being no copy, but one pair of cases, and the elegy likely to require all the letters, no one could help him I endeavored to put his press (which he had not yet used, and of which he understood nothing) into order fit to be worked with, and, promising to come and print off his elegy as soon as he should have got it ready, I returned to Bradford's, who gave me a little job to do for the present, [and] there I lodged and dined A few days after, Keimer sent for me to print off the elegy And now he had got another pair of cases, and a pamphlet to reprint, on which he set me to work

These two printers I found poorly qualified for their business Bradford had not been bred to it, and was very illiterate, and Keimer, though something of a scholar, was a mere compositor, knowing nothing of presswork He had been one of the French prophets, and could act their enthusiastic agitations At this time he did not profess any particular religion, but something of all on occasion, was very ignorant of the world, and had, as I afterward found, a good deal of the knave in his composition He did not like my lodging at Bradford's while I worked with him He had a house, indeed, but without furniture, so he could not lodge me, but he got me a lodging at Mr Read's, before mentioned, who was the owner of his house, and, my chest and clothes being come by this time, I made rather a more respectable appearance in the eyes of Miss Read than I had done when she first happened to see me eating my roll in the street

I began now to have some acquaintance among the young people of the town, that were lovers of reading, with whom I spent my evenings very pleasantly, and gaining money by my industry and frugality, I lived very agreeably, forgetting Boston as much as I could, and not desiring that any there should know where I resided, except my friend Collins, who was in my secret, and kept it when I wrote to him

THE WAY TO WEALTH<sup>1</sup>

COURTEOUS READER,

I have heard that nothing gives an author so great pleasure as to find his works respectfully quoted by other learned authors. This pleasure I have seldom enjoyed, for though I have been, if I may say it without vanity, an eminent author of almanacs annually now a full quarter of a century, my brother authors in the same way, for what reason I know not, have ever been very sparing in their applauses, and no other author has taken the least notice of me, so that, did not my writings produce me some solid pudding, the great deficiency of praise would have quite discouraged me

I concluded at length that the people were the best judges of my merit, for they <sup>1</sup> In continuing his Autobiography in 1788, Franklin recalled 'In 1732 I first published my Almanac, under the name of Richard Saunders, it was continued by me about twenty five years, commonly called Poor Richard's Almanac. I endeavored to make it both entertaining and useful, and it accordingly came to be in such demand, that I reaped considerable profit from it, vending annually near ten thousand. And observing that it was generally read, scarce any neighborhood in the province being without it, I considered it as a proper vehicle for conveying instruction among the common people, who bought scarcely any other books, I therefore filled all the little spaces that occurred between the remarkable days in the calendar with proverbial sentences, chiefly such as inculcated industry and frugality, as the means of procuring wealth, and thereby securing virtue, it being more difficult for a man in want, to act always honestly, as, to use here one of those proverbs, it is hard for an empty sack to stand upright

'These proverbs, which contained the wisdom of many ages and nations, I assembled and formed into a connected discourse prefixed to the Almanac of 175[8], as the harangue of a wise old man to the people attending an auction. The bringing all these scattered counsels thus into a focus enabled them to make greater impression. The piece, being universally approved, was copied in all the newspapers of the Continent, reprinted in Britain on a broad side, to be stuck up in houses, two translations were made of it in French, and great numbers bought by the clergy and gentry, to distribute gratis among their poor parishioners and tenants. In Pennsylvania, as it discouraged useless expense in foreign superfluities, some thought it had its share of influence in producing that growing plenty of money which was observable for several years after its publication.' Bigelow, ed., *The Life of Benjamin buy my works, and besides, in my rambles where I am not personally known, I have frequently heard one or other of my adages repeated, with 'as Poor Richard says' at the end on't. This gave me some satisfaction, as it showed not only that my instructions were regarded, but discovered likewise some respect for my authority, and I own that, to encourage the practice of remembering and repeating those wise sentences, I have sometimes quoted myself with great gravity

Judge, then, how much I must have been gratified by an incident I am going to relate to you. I stopped my horse lately where a great number of people were collected at a vendue of merchant goods. The hour of sale not being come, they were conversing on the badness of the times, and one of the company called to a plain, clean old man with white locks. 'Pray, Father Abraham, what think you of the times?' Won't these heavy taxes quite run the country? How shall we be ever able to pay them? What would you advise us to?' Father Abraham stood up and replied, 'If you'd have my advice, I'll give it you in short, for "A word to the wise is enough," and "Many words won't fill a bushel," as Poor Richard says.' They joined in desiring him to speak his mind, and gathering round him, he proceeded as follows

'Friends,' says he, 'and neighbors, the taxes are indeed very heavy, and if those laid on by the government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them, but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us.
We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly, and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us by allowing an abatement. However, let us hearken to good advice, and something may be done for us, "God helps them that help themselves," as Poor Richard says in his almanac of 1733

'It would be thought a hard government that should tax its people one-tenth part of their time, to be employed in its service.
But idleness taxes many of us much more, if we reckon all that is spent in absolute sloth, or doing of nothing, with that which is spent in idle employments or amusements that amount to nothing. Sloth, by bringing on diseases, absolutely shortens life "Sloth, like rust, consumes faster than labor wears, while the used key is always bright," as Poor Richard says "But dost thou love life? Then do not squander time, for that's the stuff life is made of," as Poor Richard says How much more than is necessary do we spend in sleep, forgetting that "The sleeping fox catches no poultry," and that "There will be sleeping enough in the grave," as Poor Richard says

"If time be of all things the most precious, wasting time must be," as Poor Richard says, "the greatest prodigality", since, as he elsewhere tells us, "Lost time is never found again", and "What we call time enough always proves little enough" Let us then up and be doing, and doing to the purpose, so by diligence shall we do more with less perplexity "Sloth makes all things difficult, but industry all easy," as Poor Richard says, and "He that riseth late must trot all day, and shall scarce overtake his business at night", while "Laziness travels so slowly that poverty soon overtakes him," as we read in Poor Richard, who adds, "Drive thy business, let not that drive thee", and "Early to bed, and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise"

"So what signifies wishing and hoping for better times? We may make these times better if we bestir ourselves "Industry need not wish," as Poor Richard says, and "He that lives upon hope will die fasting" "There are no gains without pains", "Then help, hands, for I have no lands," or if I have, they are smartly taxed And, as Poor Richard likewise observes, "He that hath a trade hath an estate, and he that hath a calling, hath an office of profit and honor", but then the trade must be worked at, and the calling well followed, or neither the estate nor the office will enable us to pay our taxes If we are industrious, we shall never starve, for, as Poor Richard says, "At the working man's house hunger looks in but dares not enter" Nor will the bailiff or the constable enter, for "Industry pays debts, while despair increaseth them," says Poor Richard What though you have found no treasure, nor has any rich relation left you a legacy, "Diligence is the mother of good luck," as Poor Richard says, and "God gives all things to industry" "Then plough deep while sluggards sleep, and you shall have corn to sell and to keep," says Poor Dick Work while it is called today, for you know not how much you may be hindered tomorrow, which makes Poor Richard say, "One today is worth two tomorrows," and farther, "Have you somewhat to do tomorrow, do it today" If you were a servant, would you not be ashamed that a good master should catch you idle? Are you then your own master, "Be ashamed to catch yourself idle," as Poor Dick says When there is so much to be done for yourself, your family, your country, and your gracious King, be up by peep of day, "Let not the sun look down and say, 'Inglorious here he lies'" Handle your tools without mittens; remember that "The cat in gloves catches no mice," as Poor Richard says 'Tis true there is much to be done, and perhaps you are weak-handed, but stick to it steadily, and you will see great effects, for "Constant dropping wears away stones," and "By diligence and patience the mouse ate in two the cable", and "Little strokes fell great oaks," as Poor Richard says in his almanac—the year I cannot just now remember

"Methinks I hear some of you say, "Must a man afford himself no leisure?" I will tell thee, my friend, what Poor Richard says "Employ thy time well, if thou meanest to gain leisure", and, "Since thou art not sure of a minute, throw not away an hour" Leisure is time for doing something useful, this leisure the diligent man will obtain, but the lazy man never, so that, as Poor Richard says, "A life of leisure and a life of laziness are two things" Do you imagine that sloth will afford you more comfort than labor? No, for as Poor Richard says, "Trouble springs from idleness, and grievous toil from needless ease" "Many, without labor, would live by their wits only, but they break for want of stock" Whereas industry gives comfort, and plenty, and respect "Fly pleasures, and they'll follow you" "The diligent spinner has a large shift", and, "Now I have a sheep and a cow, everybody bids me good morrow", all which is well said by Poor Richard

"But with our industry we must likewise be steady, settled, and careful, and oversee our own affairs with our own eyes, and not trust too much to others, for, as Poor Richard says,

"I never saw an oft-removèd tree, Nor yet an oft-removèd family, That throve so well as those that settled be "

And again, "Three removes is as bad as a fire", and again, "Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee", and again, "If you would have your business done, go, if not, send " And again,

"He that by the plough would thrive Himself must either hold or drive "

And again, "The eye of a master will do more work than his hands", and again, "Want of care does us more damage than want of knowledge", and again, "Not to oversee workmen is to leave them your purse open " Trusting too much to others' care is the ruin of many, for, as the almanac says, "In the affairs of this world men are saved not by faith but by the want of it", but a man's own care is profitable, for, saith Poor Dick, "Learning is to the studious, and riches to the careful, as well as power to the bold, and heaven to the virtuous", and farther, "If you would have a faithful servant and one that you like, serve yourself " And again, he adviseth to circumspection and care, even in the smallest matters, because sometimes "A little neglect may breed great mischief", adding "For want of a nail the shoe was lost, for want of a shoe the horse was lost, and for want of a horse the rider was lost, being overtaken and slain by the enemy, all for want of care about a horseshoe nail "

"So much for industry, my friends, and attention to one's own business, but to these we must add frugality if we would make our industry more certainly successful. A man may, if he knows not how to save as he gets, keep his nose all his life to the grindstone, and die not worth a groat at last "A fat kitchen makes a lean will," as Poor Richard says, and

"Many estates are spent in the getting, Since women for tea forsook spinning and knitting,
And men for punch forsook hewing and splitting "

"If you would be wealthy," says he in another almanac, "think of saving as well as of getting the Indies have not made Spain rich, because her outgoes are greater than her incomes "

'Away then with your expensive follies, and you will not then have so much cause to complain of hard times, heavy taxes, and chargeable families, for, as Poor Dick says,

"Women and wine, game and deceit Make the wealth small and the wants great."

And farther, "What maintains one vice would bring up two children " You may think, perhaps, that a little tea, or a little punch now and then, diet a little more costly, clothes a little finer, and a little entertainment now and then can be no great matter, but remember what Poor Richard says, "Many a little makes a mickle", and farther, "Beware of little expenses, a small leak will sink a great ship", and again, "Who dainties love, shall beggars prove", and moreover, "Fools make feasts, and wise men eat them "

'Here you are all got together at this vendue of fineries and knickknacks You call them goods, but if you do not take care, they will prove evils to some of you You expect they will be sold cheap, and perhaps they may for less than they cost, but if you have no occasion for them, they must be dear to you Remember what Poor Richard says, "Buy what thou hast no need of, and ere long thou shalt sell thy necessaries " And again, "At a great pennyworth pause a while " He means that perhaps the cheapness is apparent only, and not real, or the bargain, by straitening thee in thy business, may do thee more harm than good For in another place he says, "Many have been ruined by buying good pennyworths " Again, Poor Richard says, "'Tis foolish to lay out money in a purchase of repentance", and yet this folly is practiced every day at vendues for want of minding the almanac "Wise men," as Poor Dick says, "learn by others' harms, fools scarcely by their own"; but felix quem faciunt aliena pericula cautum <sup>1</sup> Many a one, for the sake of finery on the back, have gone with a hungry belly and half starved their families

"Silks and satins, scarlet and velvets," as Poor Richard says, "put out the kitchen fire"

"These are not the necessities of life, they can scarcely be called the conveniences; and yet, only because they look pretty, how many want to have them! The artificial wants of mankind thus become more numerous than the natural, and, as Poor Dick says, "For one poor person, there are an hundred indigent" By these and other extravagancies the genteel are reduced to poverty and forced to borrow of those whom they formerly despised, but who through industry and frugality have maintained their standing, in which case it appears plainly that "A ploughman on his legs is higher than a gentleman on his knees," as Poor Richard says. Perhaps they have had a small estate left them, which they knew not the getting of, they think 'tis day and will never be night, that a little to be spent out of so much is not worth minding "A child and a fool," as Poor Richard says, "imagine twenty shillings and twenty years can never be spent", but "Always taking out of the meal-tub, and never putting in, soon comes to the bottom", then as Poor Dick says, "When the well's dry, they know the worth of water" But thus they might have known before if they had taken his advice "If you would know the value of money, go and try to borrow some", or "He that goes a-borrowing goes a-sorrowing", and indeed so does he that lends to such people, when he goes to get it in again Poor Dick farther advises, and says,

"Fond pride of dress is sure a very curse; E'er fancy you consult, consult your purse "

And again, "Pride is as loud a beggar as want, and a great deal more saucy" When you have bought one fine thing, you must buy ten more, that your appearance may be all of a piece, but Poor Dick says, "'Tis easier to suppress the first desire than to satisfy all that follow it" And 'tis as truly folly for the poor to ape the rich as for the frog to swell in order to equal the ox

"Great estates may venture more, But little boats should keep near shore "

'Tis, however, a folly soon punished; for "Pride that dines on vanity sups on contempt," as Poor Richard says And in another place, "Pride breakfasted with plenty, dined with poverty, and supped with infamy" And after all, of what use is this pride of appearance, for which so much is risked, so much is suffered? It cannot promote health, or ease pain, it makes no increase of merit in the person, it creates envy, it hastens misfortune

"What is a butterfly? At best He's but a caterpillar drest
The gaudy fop's his picture just," as Poor Richard says

"But what madness must it be to run in debt for these superfluities! We are offered by the terms of this vendue six months' credit, and that perhaps has induced some of us to attend it, because we cannot spare the ready money and hope now to be fine without it But, ah, think what you do when you run in debt, you give to another power over your liberty! If you cannot pay at the time, you will be ashamed to see your creditor, you will be in fear when you speak to him, you will make poor pitiful sneaking excuses, and by degrees come to lose your veracity, and sink into base downright lying, for, as Poor Richard says, "The second vice is lying, the first is running in debt" And again, to the same purpose, "Lying rides upon debt's back" Whereas a free-born Englishman ought not to be ashamed or afraid to see or speak to any man living But poverty often deprives a man of all spirit and virtue "'Tis hard for an empty bag to stand upright," as Poor Richard truly says

"What would you think of that prince or that government who should issue an edict forbidding you to dress like a gentleman or a gentlewoman on pain of imprisonment or servitude? Would you not say that you were free, have a right to dress as you please, and that such an edict would be a breach of your privileges, and such a government tyrannical? And yet you are about to put yourself under that tyranny, when you run in debt for such dress! Your creditor has authority at his pleasure to deprive you of your liberty by confining you in gaol for life, or to sell you as a servant, if you should not be able to pay him! When you have got your bargain, you may perhaps think little of payment, but "Creditors," Poor Richard tells us, "have better memories than debtors", and in another place says, "Creditors are a superstitious sect, great observers of set days and times" The day comes round before you are aware, and the demand is made before you are prepared to satisfy it, or, if you bear your debt in mind, the term which at first seemed so long will, as it lessens, appear extremely short Time will seem to have added wings to his heels as well as shoulders "Those have a short Lent," saith Poor Richard, "who owe money to be paid at Easter" Then since, as he says, "The borrower is a slave to the lender, and the debtor to the creditor," disdain the chain, preserve your freedom, and maintain your independency Be industrious and free, be frugal and free At present, perhaps, you may think yourself in thriving circumstances, and that you can bear a little extravagance without injury, but,

"For age and want, save while you may,
No morning sun lasts a whole day," as Poor Richard says Gain may be temporary and uncertain, but ever while you live expense is constant and certain, and "'Tis easier to build two chimneys than to keep one in fuel," as Poor Richard says So, "Rather go to bed supperless than rise in debt "

"Get what you can, and what you get hold,
'Tis the stone that will turn all your lead into gold,"

as Poor Richard says And when you have got the philosopher's stone, sure you will no longer complain of bad times or the difficulty of paying taxes

'Thus doctrine, my friends, is reason and wisdom; but after all, do not depend too much upon your own industry, and frugality, and prudence, though excellent things, for they may all be blasted without the blessing of Heaven, and therefore ask that blessing humbly, and be not uncharitable to those that at present seem to want it, but comfort and help them Remember, Job suffered, and was afterwards prosperous

'And now to conclude, "Experience keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other, and scarce in that", for it is true, "We may give advice, but we cannot give conduct," as Poor Richard says. However, remember this "They that won't be counselled can't be helped," as Poor Richard says, and farther, that "If you will not hear reason, she'll surely rap your knuckles " "

Thus the old gentleman ended his harangue The people heard it and approved the doctrine, and immediately practiced the contrary, just as if it had been a common sermon, for the vendue opened, and they began to buy extravagantly, notwithstanding all his cautions and their own fear of taxes I found the good man had thoroughly studied my almanacs and digested all I had dropped on these topics during the course of five and twenty years The frequent mention he made of me must have tired anyone else, but my vanity was wonderfully delighted with it, though I was conscious that not a tenth part of the wisdom was my own which he ascribed to me, but rather the gleanings I had made of the sense of all ages and nations However, I resolved to be the better for the echo of it, and though I had at first determined to buy stuff for a new coat, I went away resolved to wear my old one a little longer Reader, if thou wilt do the same, thy profit will be as great as mine I am, as ever, thine to serve thee

THE SALE OF THE HESSIANS

FROM THE COUNT DE SCHAUMBERGH TO THE BARON HOHENDORF, COMMAND-ING THE HESSIAN TROOPS IN AMERICA

Rome, February 18, 1777

Monsieur Le Baron.—On my return from Naples, I received at Rome your letter of the 27th December of last year I have learned with unspeakable pleasure the courage our troops exhibited at Frenton, and you cannot imagine my joy on being told that of the 1,950 Hessians engaged in the fight, but 345 escaped. There were just 1,605 men killed, and I cannot sufficiently commend your prudence in sending an exact list of the dead to my minister in London. This precaution was the more necessary, as the report sent to the English ministry does not give but 1,455 dead. This would make 483,450 florins instead of 643,500 which I am entitled to demand under our convention. You will comprehend the prejudice which such an error would work in my finances, and I do not doubt you will take the necessary pains to prove that Lord North's list is false and yours correct.

The Court of London objects that there were a hundred wounded who ought not to be included in the list, nor paid for as dead, but I trust you will not overlook my instructions to you on quitting Cassel, and that you will not have tried by human succor to recall the life of the unfortunates whose days could not be lengthened but by the loss of a leg or an arm. That would be making them a pernicious present, and I am sure they would rather die than live in a condition no longer fit for my service. I do not mean by this that you should assassinate them, we should be humane, my dear Baron, but you may insinuate to the surgeons with entire propriety that a crippled man is a reproach to their profession, and that there is no wiser course than to let every one of them die when he ceases to be fit to fight.

I am about to send to you some new recruits. Don't economize them. Remember glory before all things. Glory is true wealth. There is nothing degrades the soldier like the love of money. He must care only for honor and reputation, but this reputation must be acquired in the midst of dangers. A battle gained without costing the conqueror any blood is an inglorious success, while the conquered cover themselves with glory by perishing with their arms in their hands. Do you remember that of the 300 Lacedæmonians who defended the defile of Thermopylæ, not one returned? How happy should I be could I say the same of my brave Hessians!

It is true that their king, Leonidas, perished with them, but things have changed, and it is no longer the custom for princes of the empire to go and fight in America for a cause with which they have no concern. And besides, to whom should they pay the thirty guineas per man if I did not stay in Europe to receive them? Then, it is necessary also that I be ready to send recruits to replace the men you lose. For this purpose

I must return to Hesse. It is true, grown men are becoming scarce there, but I will send you boys. Besides, the scarcer the commodity the higher the price. I am assured that the women and little girls have begun to till our lands, and they get on not badly. You did right to send back to Europe that Dr. Crumerus who was so successful in curing dysentery. Don't bother with a man who is subject to looseness of the bowels. That disease makes bad soldiers. One coward will do more mischief in an engagement than ten brave men will do good. Better that they burst in their barracks than fly in a battle, and tarnish the glory of our arms. Besides, you know that they pay me as killed for all who die from disease, and I don't get a farthing for runaways. My trip to Italy, which has cost me enormously, makes it desirable that there should be a great mortality among them. You will therefore promise promotion to all who expose themselves, you will exhort them to seek glory in the midst of dangers, you will say to Major Maundorff that I am not at all content with his saving the 345 men who escaped the massacre of Trenton. Through the whole campaign he has not had ten men killed in consequence of his orders. Finally, let it be your principal object to prolong the war and avoid a decisive engagement on either side, for I have made arrangements for a grand Italian opera, and I do not wish to be obliged to give it up. Meantime I pray God, my dear Baron de Hohendorf, to have you in his holy and gracious keeping.

THE EPHEMERA

AN EMBLEM OF HUMAN LIFE<sup>1</sup>

You may remember, my dear friend, that when we lately spent that happy day in the delightful garden and sweet society of the Moulin Joli, I stopt a little in one of our walks, and staid some time behind the company. We had been shown numberless skeletons of a kind of little fly, called an ephemera, whose successive generations, we were told, were bred and expired within the day I happened to see a living company of them on a leaf, who appeared to be engaged in conversation. You know I understand all the inferior animal tongues my too great application of the study of them is the best excuse I can give for the little progress I have made in your charming language. I listened through curiosity to the discourse of these little creatures, but as they, in their national vivacity, spoke three or four together, I could make but little of their conversation. I found, however, by some broken expressions that I heard now and then, they were disputing warmly on the merits of two foreign musicians, one a cousin, the other a moscheto, in which dispute they spent their time, seemingly as regardless of the shortness of life as if they had been sure of living a month. Happy people! thought I, you live certainly under a wise, just, and mild government, since you have no public grievances to complain of, nor any subject of contention but the perfections and imperfections of foreign music. I turned my head from them to an old grey-headed one, who was single on another leaf, and talking to himself. Being amused with his soliloquy, I put it down in writing, in hopes it will likewise amuse her to whom I am so much indebted for the most pleasing of all amusements, her delicious company and heavenly harmony.

'It was,' said he, 'the opinion of learned two leagues hence, part of the country-seat of another friend, where we visit every summer, and spend the day in the pleasing society of the ingenious, learned, and very polite persons who inhabit it. At the time when the letter was written, all conversations at Paris were filled with disputes about the music of Gluck and Piccini, a German and Italian musician, who divided the town into violent parties. A friend of this lady having obtained a copy of it, under a promise not to give another, did not observe that promise, so that many have been taken, and it is become as public as such a thing can well be, that is not printed, but I could not dream of its being heard of at Madrid! The thought was partly taken from a little piece of some unknown writer, which I met with fifty years since in a newspaper, and which the sight of the Ephemera brought to my recollection.' Smyth, ed., The Writings of Benjamin Franklin (N Y, 1906), VIII, 99-100.

philosophers of our race, who lived and flourished long before my time, that this vast world, the Moulin Joli, could not itself subsist more than eighteen hours, and I think there was some foundation for that opinion, since by the apparent motion of the great luminary that gives life to all nature, and which in my time has evidently declined considerably towards the ocean at the end of our earth, it must then finish its course, be extinguished in the waters that surround us, and leave the world in cold and darkness, necessarily producing universal death and destruction. I have lived seven of those hours, a great age, being no less than four hundred and twenty minutes of time. How very few of us continue so long! I have seen generations born, flourish, and expire. My present friends are the children and grandchildren of the friends of my youth, who are now, alas, no more! And I must soon follow them, for, by the course of nature, though still in health, I cannot expect to live above seven or eight minutes longer. What now avails all my toil and labor, in amassing honey-dew on this leaf, which I cannot live to enjoy! What the political struggles I have been engaged in, for the good of my compatriot inhabitants of this bush, or my philosophical studies for the benefit of our race in general! for, in politics, what can laws do without morals? Our present race of ephemerae will in a course of minutes become corrupt, like those of other and older bushes, and consequently as wretched. And in philosophy how small our progress! Alas! art is long, and life is short! My friends would comfort me with the idea of a name, they say, I shall leave behind me, and they tell me I have lived long enough to nature and to glory. But what will fame be to an ephemera who no longer exists? And what will become of all history in the eighteenth hour, when the world itself, even the whole Moulin Joli, shall come to its end, and be buried in universal ruin?

To me, after all my eager pursuits, no solid pleasures now remain, but the reflection of a long life spent in meaning well, the sensible conversation of a few good lady ephemerae, and now and then a kind smile and a tune from the ever amiable Brillante.

B FRANKLIN

THE WHISTLE

TO MADAME BRILLON

Passy, November 10, 1779

I RECEIVED my dear friend's two letters, one for Wednesday and one for Saturday. This is again Wednesday. I do not deserve one for today, because I have not answered the former. But indolent as I am, and averse to writing, the fear of having no more of your pleasing epistles if I do not contribute to the correspondence, obliges me to take up my pen. And as Mr B has kindly sent me word that he sets out tomorrow to see you, instead of spending this Wednesday evening as I have done its namesakes, in your delightful company, I sit down to spend it in thinking of you, in writing to you, and in reading over and over again your letters.

I am charmed with your description of Paradise, and with your plan of living there. And I approve much of your conclusion, that, in the mean time, we should draw all the good we can from this world. In my opinion we might all draw more good from it than we do, and suffer less evil, if we would take care 'not to give too much for our whistles.' For to me it seems that most of the unhappy people we meet with, are become so by neglect of that caution,

You ask what I mean?—You love stories, and will excuse my telling one of myself. When I was a child of seven years old, my friends on a holiday filled my little pocket with halfpence. I went directly to a shop where they sold toys for children, and being charmed with the sound of a whistle that I met by the way, in the hands of another boy, I voluntarily offered and gave all my money for it. When I came home, whistling all over the house, much pleased with my whistle, but disturbing all the family, my brothers, sisters, and cousins, understanding the bargain I had made, told me I had given four times as much for it as it was worth, put me in mind what good things I might have bought with the rest of the money, and laughed at me so much for my folly, that I cried with vexation, and the reflection gave me more chagrin than the whistle gave me pleasure.

This however was afterwards of use to me, the impression continuing on my mind, so that often, when I was tempted to buy some unnecessary thing, I said to myself, 'Do not give too much for the whistle'; and I saved my money.

As I grew up, came into the world, and observed the actions of men, I thought I met many, 'who gave too much for the whistle.'—When I saw one ambitious of court favor, sacrificing his time in attendance at levees, his repose, his liberty, his virtue, and perhaps his friend, to obtain it, I have said to myself, 'This man gives too much for his whistle.'—When I saw another fond of popularity, constantly employing himself in political bustles, neglecting his own affairs, and ruining them by that neglect, 'He pays,' says I, 'too much for his whistle.'—If I knew a miser, who gave up every kind of comfortable living, all the pleasure of doing good to others, all the esteem of his fellow-citizens, and the joys of benevolent friendship for the sake of accumulating wealth, 'Poor man,' says I, 'you pay too much for your whistle.'—When I met with a man of pleasure, sacrificing every laudable improvement of his mind or of his fortune, to mere corporeal satisfactions, and ruining his health in their pursuit, 'Mistaken man,' says I, 'you are providing pain for yourself instead of pleasure, you pay too much for your whistle.'—If I see one fond of appearance, or fine clothes, fine houses, fine furniture, fine equipages, all above his fortune, for which he contracts debts, and ends his career in a prison, 'Alas!' says I, 'he has paid dear, very dear, for his whistle.'—When I saw a beautiful, sweet-tempered girl, married to an ill-natured brute of a husband, 'What a pity,' says I, 'that she should pay so much for a whistle.'—In short, I conceived that great part of the miseries of mankind were brought upon them by the false estimates they have made of the value of things, and by their 'giving too much for their whistles.'

Yet I ought to have charity for these unhappy people, when I consider that with all this wisdom of which I am boasting there are certain things in the world so tempting, for example, the apples of King John, which happily are not to be bought, for if they were put to sale by auction, I might very easily be led to ruin myself in the purchase, and find that I had once more 'given too much for the whistle'

Adieu, my dearest friend, and believe me ever yours very sincerely and with unalterable affection

B FRANKLIN.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN FRANKLIN AND THE GOUT

Midnight, October 22, 1780.

FRANKLIN Eh! Oh! Eh! What have I done to merit these cruel sufferings?

GOUT Many things, you have ate and drank too freely, and too much indulged those legs of yours in their indolence

FRANKLIN Who is it that accuses me?

GOUT It is I, even I, the Gout

FRANKLIN What! my enemy in person?

GOUT No, not your enemy

FRANKLIN I repeat it, my enemy, for you would not only torment my body to death, but ruin my good name, you reproach me as a glutton and a tippler, now all the world, that knows me, will allow that I am neither the one nor the other

GOUT The world may think as it pleases, it is always very complaisant to itself, and sometimes to its friends, but I very well know that the quantity of meat and drink proper for a man, who takes a reasonable degree of exercise, would be too much for another, who never takes any

FRANKLIN I take—Eh! Oh!—as much exercise—Eh!—as I can, Madam Gout You know my sedentary state, and on that account, it would seem, Madam Gout, as if you might spare me a little, seeing it is not altogether my own fault

GOUT Not a jot, your rhetoric and your politeness are thrown away, your apology avails nothing If your situation in life is a sedentary one, your amusements, your recreations, at least, should be active You ought to walk or ride, or, if the weather prevents that, play at billiards But let us examine your course of life While the mornings are long, and you have leisure to go abroad, what do you do? Why, instead of gaining an appetite for breakfast, by salutary exercise, you amuse yourself, with books, pamphlets, or newspapers, which commonly are not worth the reading Yet you eat an inordinate breakfast, four dishes of tea, with cream, and one or two buttered toasts, with slices of hung beef, which I fancy are not things the most easily digested Immediately afterward you sit down to write at your desk, or converse with persons who apply to you on business Thus the time passes till one, without any kind of bodily exercise But all this I could pardon, in regard, as you say, to your sedentary condition But what is your practice after dinner? Walking in the beautiful gardens of those friends, with whom you have dined, would be the choice of men of sense, yours is to be fixed down to chess, where you are found engaged for two or three hours! This is your perpetual recreation, which is the least eligible of any for a sedentary man, because, instead of accelerating the motion of the fluids, the rigid attention it requires helps to retard the circulation and obstruct internal secretions Wrapt in the speculations of this wretched game, you destroy your constitution What can be expected from such a course of living, but a body replete with stagnant humors, ready to fall a prey to all kinds of dangerous maladies, if I, the Gout, did not occasionally bring you relief by agitating those humors, and so purifying or dissipating them? If it was in some nook or alley in Paris, deprived of walks, that you played awhile at chess after dinner, this might be excusable, but the same taste prevails with you in Passy, Auteuil, Montmartre, or Sanoy, places where there are the finest gardens and walks, a pure air, beautiful women, and most agreeable and instructive conversation, all which you might enjoy by frequenting the walks But these are rejected for this abominable game of chess Fie, then, Mr Franklin! But amidst my instructions, I had almost forgot to administer my wholesome corrections, so take that twinge,—and that FRANKLIN Oh! Eh! Oh! Ohhh! As much instruction as you please, Madam Gout, and as many reproaches, but pray, Madam, a truce with your corrections!

GOUT No, Sir, no,—I will not abate a particle of what is so much for your good,—therefore—

FRANKLIN Oh! Ehhh!—It is not fair to say I take no exercise, when I do very often, going out to dine and returning in my carriage.

GOUT That, of all imaginable exercises, is the most slight and insignificant, if you allude to the motion of a carriage suspended on springs. By observing the degree of heat obtained by different kinds of motion, we may form an estimate of the quantity of exercise given by each. Thus, for example, if you turn out to walk in winter with cold feet, in an hour's time you will be in a glow all over, ride on horseback, the same effect will scarcely be perceived by four hours' round trotting, but if you loll in a carriage, such as you have mentioned, you may travel all day, and gladly enter the last inn to warm your feet by a fire. Flatter yourself then no longer, that half an hour's airing in your carriage deserves the name of exercise. Providence has appointed few to roll in carriages, while he has given to all a pair of legs, which are machines infinitely more commodious and serviceable. Be grateful, then, and make a proper use of yours. Would you know how they forward the circulation of your fluids, in the very action of transporting you from place to place, observe when you walk, that all your weight is alternately thrown from one leg to the other, this occasions a great pressure on the vessels of the foot, and repels their contents, when relieved, by the weight being thrown on the other foot, the vessels of the first are allowed to replenish, and, by a return of this weight, this repulsion again succeeds, thus accelerating the circulation of the blood. The heat produced in any given time, depends on the degree of this acceleration, the fluids are shaken, the humors attenuated, the secretions facilitated, and all goes well, the cheeks are ruddy, and health is established. Behold your fair friend at Auteuil, a lady who received from bounteous nature more really useful science, than half a dozen such pretenders to philosophy as you have been able to extract from all your books. When she honors you with a visit, it is on foot. She walks all hours of the day, and leaves indolence, and its concomitant maladies, to be endured by her horses. In this see at once the preservative of her health and personal charms. But when you go to Auteuil, you must have your carriage, though it is no further from Passy to Auteuil than from Auteuil to Passy.

FRANKLIN Your reasonings grow very tiresome.

GOUT I stand corrected. I will be silent and continue my office, take that, and that.

FRANKLIN. Oh! Ohh! Talk on, I pray you!

GOUT No, no, I have a good number of twinges for you tonight, and you may be sure of some more tomorrow.

FRANKLIN. What, with such a fever! I shall go distracted. Oh! Eh! Can no one bear it for me?

GOUT Ask that of your horses, they have served you faithfully.

FRANKLIN How can you so cruelly sport with my torments?

GOUT Sport! I am very serious. I have here a list of offences against your own health distinctly written, and can justify every stroke inflicted on you.

FRANKLIN Read it then.

GOUT It is too long a detail, but I will briefly mention some particulars.

FRANKLIN Proceed. I am all attention.

GOUT Do you remember how often you have promised yourself, the following morning, a walk in the grove of Boulogne, in the garden de la Muette, or in your own garden, and have violated your promise, alleging, at one time, it was too cold, at another too warm, too windy, too moist, or what else you pleased, when in truth it was too nothing, but your insuperable love of ease?

FRANKLIN That I confess may have happened occasionally, probably ten times in a year.

GOUT Your confession is very far short of the truth, the gross amount is one hundred and ninety-nine times.

FRANKLIN Is it possible?

GOUT So possible, that it is fact, you may rely on the accuracy of my statement. You know M. Brillon's gardens, and what fine walks they contain, you know the handsome flight of an hundred steps, which lead from the terrace above to the lawn below. You have been in the practice of visiting this amiable family twice a week, after dinner, and it is a maxim of your own, that 'a man may take as much exercise in walking a mile, up and down stairs, as in ten on level ground.' What an opportunity was here for you to have had exercise in both these ways! Did you embrace it, and how often?

FRANKLIN I cannot immediately answer that question

GOUT I will do it for you, not once

FRANKLIN Not once?

GOUT Even so During the summer you went there at six o'clock You found the charming lady, with her lovely children and friends, eager to walk with you, and entertain you with their agreeable conversation, and what has been your choice? Why to sit on the terrace, satisfying yourself with the fine prospect, and passing your eye over the beauties of the garden below, without taking one step to descend and walk about in them On the contrary, you call for tea and the chess-board, and lo! you are occupied in your seat till nine o'clock, and that besides two hours' play after dinner, and then, instead of walking home, which would have bestirred you a little, you step into your carriage How absurd to suppose that all this carelessness can be reconcilable with health, without my interposition!

FRANKLIN. I am convinced now of the justness of Poor Richard's remark, that 'Our debts and our sins are always greater than we think for'

GOUT So it is You philosophers are sages in your maxims, and fools in your conduct FRANKLIN But do you charge among my crimes, that I return in a carriage from Mr Brillons?

GOUT Certainly, for, having been seated all the while, you cannot object the fatigue of the day, and cannot want therefore the relief of a carriage FRANKLIN What then would you have me do with my carriage?

GOUT Burn it if you choose, you would at least get heat out of it once in this way, or, if you dislike that proposal, here's another for you, observe the poor peasants, who work in the vineyards and grounds about the villages of Passy, Auteuil, Chailot, &c, you may find every day, among these deserving creatures, four or five old men and women, bent and perhaps crippled by weight of years, and too long and too great labor After a most fatiguing day, these people have to trudge a mile or two to their smoky huts Order your coachman to set them down This is an act that will be good for your soul, and, at the same time, after your visit to the Brillons, if you return on foot, that will be good for your body

FRANKLIN Ah! how tiresome you are!

GOUT Well, then, to my office, it should not be forgotten that I am your physician There.

FRANKLIN Ohhh! what a devil of a physician!

GOUT How ungrateful you are to say so! Is it not I who, in the character of your physician, have saved you from the palsy, dropsy, and apoplexy? one or other of which would have done for you long ago, but for me

FRANKLIN I submit, and thank you for the past, but entreat the discontinuance of your visits for the future, for, in my mind, one had better die than be cured so dolefully Permit me just to hint, that I have also not been unfriendly to you I never feed physician or quack of any kind, to enter the list against you, if then you do not leave me to my repose, it may be said you are ungrateful too

GOUT I can scarcely acknowledge that as any objection As to quacks, I despise them, they may kill you indeed, but cannot injure me And, as to regular physicians, they are at last convinced that the gout, in such a subject as you are, is no disease, but a remedy, and wherefore cure a remedy?—but to our business,—there

FRANKLIN Oh! oh!—for Heaven's sake leave me! and I promise faithfully never more to play at chess, but to take exercise daily, and live temperately

GOUT I know you too well You promise fair, but, after a few months of good health, you will return to your old habits, your fine promises will be forgotten like the forms of last year's clouds Let us then finish the account, and I will go But I leave you with an assurance of visiting you again at a proper time and place, for my object is your good, and you are sensible now that I am your real friend

JOHN WOOLMAN

1720-1772

FROM THE JOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN

CHILDHOOD AND EDUCATION<sup>1</sup>

I HAVE often felt a motion of love to leave some hints of my experience of the goodness of God, and pursuant thereto, in the thirty-sixth year of my age, I begin this work

I was born in Northampton, in Burlington County in West Jersey, in the year of our Lord 1720, and before I was seven years old, I began to be acquainted with the operations of divine love. Through the care of my parents, I was taught to read near as soon as I was capable of it, and as I went from school one Seventh Day, I remember, while my companions went to play by the way, I went forward out of sight, and setting down I read the twenty-second chapter of the Revelation 'He shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb,' etc., and in the reading of it my mind was drawn to seek after that pure habitation which I then believed God had prepared for His servants. The place where I sat and the sweetness that attended my mind remain fresh in my memory

This and the like gracious visitations had that effect upon me that when boys used ill language it troubled me, and through the continued mercies of God I was preserved from it. The pious instructions of my parents were often fresh in my mind when I happened to be among wicked children, and were of use to me

My parents, having a large family of children, used frequently on First Days after meeting to put us to read in the Holy Scriptures, or some religious books, one after another, the rest sitting by without much conversation, which I have since often thought was a good practice. From what I had read, I believed there had been in past ages people who walked in uprightness before God in a degree exceeding any that I knew, or heard of, now living, and the apprehension of there being less steadiness and firmness amongst people in this age than in past ages often troubled me while I was still young.

I had a dream about the ninth year of my age, as follows. I saw the moon rise near the west, and run a regular course eastward, so swift[ly] that in about a quarter of an hour she reached our meridian, when there descended from her a small cloud on a direct line to the earth, which lighted on a pleasant green about twenty yards from the door of my father's house (in which I thought I stood) and was immediately turned into a beautiful green tree. The moon appeared to run on with equal swiftness, and soon set in the east, at which time the sun arose at the place where it commonly doth in the summer, and shining with full radiance in a serene air, it appeared as pleasant a morning as ever I saw

All this time I stood still in the door, in an awful frame of mind, and I observed that as heat increased by the rising sun, it wrought so powerfully on the little green tree that the leaves gradually withered, and before noon it appeared dry and dead. There then appeared a being, small of size, moving swiftly from the north southward, called a 'sun worm'

Though I was a child, this dream was instructive to me

Another thing remarkable in my childhood was that once as I went to a neighbor's house, I saw on the way a robin sitting on her nest, and as I came near she went off but, having young ones, flew about and with many cries expressed her concern for them. I stood and threw stones at her till, one striking her, she fell down dead. At first I was pleased with the exploit, but after a few minutes was seized with horror, as having in a sportive way killed an innocent creature while she was careful for her young. I beheld her lying dead, and thought those young ones for which she was so careful must now perish for want of their dam to nourish them, and after some painful considerations on the subject, I climbed up the tree, took all the young birds, and killed them, supposing that better than to leave them to pine away and die miserably, and believed in this case that Scripture proverb was fulfilled 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel' I then went on my errand, but for some hours could think of little else but the cruelties I had committed, and was much troubled

Thus He whose tender mercies are over all His works hath placed that in the human mind which incites to exercise goodness towards every living creature, and thus being singly attended to, people become tender-hearted and sympathizing, but being frequently and totally rejected, the mind shuts itself up in a contrary disposition

About the twelfth year of my age, my father being abroad, my mother reproved me for some misconduct, to which I made an undutiful reply, and the next First Day, as I was with my father returning from meeting, he told me he understood I had behaved amiss to my mother, and advised me to be more careful in future I knew myself blamable, and in shame and confusion remained silent Being thus awakened to a sense of my wickedness, I felt remorse in my mind, and getting home I retired and prayed to the Lord to forgive me, and I do not remember that I ever after that spoke unhandsomely to either of my parents, however foolish in some other things

Having attained the age of sixteen, I began to love wanton company, and though I was preserved from profane language or scandalous conduct, still I perceived a plant in me which produced much wild grapes Yet my merciful Father forsook me not utterly, but at times through His grace I was brought seriously to consider my ways, and the sight of my backsliding affected me with sorrow, but for want of rightly attending to the reproofs of instruction, vanity was added to vanity, and repentance Upon the whole my mind was more and more alienated from the truth, and I hastened towards destruction. While I meditate on the gulf towards which I traveled, and reflect on my youthful disobedience, my heart is affected with sorrow

way grew more difficult. Though I had heretofore found comfort in reading the Holy Scriptures, and thinking on heavenly things, I was now estranged therefrom I knew I was going from the flock of Christ, and had no resolution to return, hence serious reflections were uneasy to me, and youthful vanities and diversions my greatest pleasure Running in this road I found many like myself, and we associated in that which is reverse to true friendship But in this swift race it pleased God to visit me with sickness, so that I doubted of recovering, and then did darkness, horror, and amazement with full force seize me, even when my pain and distress of body was very great, I thought it would have been better for me never to have had a being than to see the day which I now saw I was filled with confusion, and in great affliction both of mind and body I lay and bewailed myself. I had not confidence to lift up my cries to God, whom I had thus offended, but in a deep sense of my great folly I was humbled before Him, and at length that Word which is as a fire and a hammer broke and dissolved my rebellious heart, and then my cries were put up in contrition, and in the multitude of His mercies I found inward relief, and felt a close engagement that, if He was pleased to restore my health, I might walk humbly before Him

After my recovery, this exercise remained with me a considerable time, but by degrees giving way to youthful vanities, they gained strength, and getting with wanton young people I lost ground The Lord had been very gracious, and spoke peace to me in the time of my distress, and I now most ungratefully turned again to folly, on which account at times I felt sharp reproof, but did not get low enough to cry for help I was not so hardy as to commit things scandalous, but to exceed in vanity and promote mirth was my chief study Still I retained a love and esteem for pious people, and their company brought an awe upon me My dear parents several times admonished me in the fear of the Lord, and their admonition entered into my heart and had a good effect for a season but not getting deep enough to pray rightly, the tempter when he came found entrance. I remember once, having spent a part of a day in wantonness, as I went to bed at night there lay in a window near my bed a Bible, which I opened, and first cast my eye on the text 'We lie down in our shame, and our confusion covers us.' This I knew to be my case, and meeting with so unexpected a reproof, I was somewhat affected with it, and went to bed under remorse of conscience, which I soon cast off again.

Thus time passed on, my heart was replenished with mirth and wantonness, while pleasing scenes of vanity were presented to my imagination, till I attained the age of eighteen years, near which time I felt the judgments of God in my soul like a consuming fire, and looking over my past life, the prospect was moving. I was often sad, and longed to be delivered from those vanities, then again my heart was strongly inclined to them, and there was in me a sore conflict. At times I turned to folly, and then again sorrow and confusion took hold of me. In a while I resolved totally to leave off some of my vanities, but there was a secret reserve in my heart of the more refined part of them, and I was not low enough to find true peace. Thus for some months I had great troubles and disquiet, there remaining in me an unsubjected will which rendered my labors fruitless, till at length, through the merciful continuance of heavenly visitations, I was made to bow down in spirit before the Most High. I remember one evening I had spent some time in reading a pious author, and walking out alone, I humbly prayed to the Lord for His help, that I might be delivered from those vanities which so ensnared me. Thus being brought low, He helped me, and as I learned to bear the cross, I felt refreshment to come from His presence. But not keeping in that strength which gave victory, I lost ground again, the sense of which greatly afflicted me, and I sought deserts and lonely places, and there with tears did confess my sins to God, and humbly craved help of Him, and I may say with reverence He was near to me in my troubles, and in those times of humiliation opened my ear to discipline.

I was now led to look seriously at the means by which I was drawn from the pure truth, and I learned this that if I would live in the life which the faithful servants of God lived in, I must not go into company as heretofore in my own will, but all the cravings of sense must be governed by a divine principle. In times of sorrow and abasement these instructions were sealed upon me, and I felt the power of Christ prevail over all selfish desires, so that I was preserved in a good degree of steadiness, and being young and believing at that time that a single life was best for me, I was strengthened to keep from such company as had often been a snare to me.

I kept steady to meetings, spent First Days in the afternoon chiefly in reading the Scriptures and other good books, and was early convinced in my mind that true religion consisted in an inward life, wherein the heart doth love and reverence God the Creator, and learn to exercise true justice and goodness not only toward all men but also toward the brute creatures. That as the mind was moved by an inward principle to love God as an invisible, incomprehensible Being, by the same principle it was moved to love Him in all His manifestations in the visible world. That as by His breath the flame of life was kindled in all animal and sensible creatures, to say we love God as unseen, and at the same time exercise cruelty toward the least creature moving by His life or by life derived from Him, was a contradiction in itself.

I found no narrowness respecting sects and opinions, but believe that sincere upright-hearted people in every society who truly love God were accepted by Him.

As I lived under the cross, and simply followed the openings of truth, my mind from day to day was more enlightened, my former acquaintance were left to judge of me as they would, for I found it safest for me to live in private and keep these things sealed up in my own breast. While I silently ponder on that change which was wrought in me, I find no language equal to it, nor any means to convey to another a clear idea of it. I looked upon the works of God in this visible creation, and an awfulness covered me, my heart was tender and often contrite, and a universal love to my fellow creatures increased in me. This will be understood by such who have trodden in the same path.

Some glances of real beauty is perceivable in their faces who dwell in true meekness, some tincture of true harmony in the sound of that voice to which divine love gives utterance, and some appearance of right order in their temper and conduct whose passions are fully regulated, yet all these do not fully show forth that inward life to such who have not felt it, but this white stone and new name is known rightly to such only who have it.

FROM TRAVELS

THE evening was temperately cool and calm. The crocodiles began to roar and appear in uncommon numbers along the shores and in the river. I fixed my camp in an open plain, near the utmost projection of the promontory, under the shelter of a large live oak which stood on the highest part of the ground and but a few yards from my boat. From this open, high situation, I had a free prospect of the river, which was a matter of no trivial consideration to me, having good reason to dread the subtle attacks of the alligators, who were crowding about my harbor. Having collected a good quantity of wood for the purpose of keeping up a light and smoke during the night, I began to think of preparing my supper, when, upon examining my stores, I found but a scanty provision. I thereupon determined, as the most expeditious way of supplying my necessities, to take my bob and try for some trout. About one hundred yards above my harbor began a cove or bay of the river, out of which opened a large lagoon. The mouth or entrance from the river to it was narrow, but the waters soon after spread and formed a little lake, extending into the marshes, its entrance and shores within I observed to be verged with floating lawns of the Pistia and Nymphaea and other aquatic plants, these I knew were excellent haunts for trout.

The verges and islets of the lagoon were elegantly embellished with flowering plants and shrubs, the laughing coots with wings half-spread were tripping over the little coves and hiding themselves in the tufts of grass, young broods of the painted summer teal, skimming the still surface of the waters, and following the watchful parent unconscious of danger, were frequently surprised by the voracious trout, and he, in turn, as often by the subtle greedy alligator. Behold him rushing forth from the flags and reeds. His enormous body swells. His plaited tail brandished high, floats upon the lake. The waters like a cataract descend from his opening jaws. Clouds of smoke issue from his dilated nostrils. The earth trembles with his thunder. When immediately from the opposite coast of the lagoon, emerges from the deep his rival champion. They suddenly dart upon each other. The boiling surface of the lake marks their rapid course, and a terrific conflict commences. They now sink to the bottom folded together in horrid wreaths. The water becomes thick and discolored. Again they rise, their jaws clap together, echoing through the deep surrounding forests. Again they sink, when the contest ends at the muddy bottom of the lake, and the vanquished makes a hazardous escape, hiding himself in the muddy turbulent waters and sedge on a distant shore. The proud victor exulting returns to the place of action. The shores and forests resound his dreadful roar, together with the triumphing shouts of these plaited tribes around, witness of the horrid combat . . .

The noise of the crocodiles kept me awake the greater part of the night, but when I arose in the morning, contrary to my expectations, there was perfect peace, very few of them to be seen, and those were asleep on the shore. Yet I was not able to suppress my fears and apprehensions of being attacked by them in the future, and indeed yesterday's combat with them, notwithstanding I came off in a manner victorious, or at least made a safe retreat, had left sufficient impression on my mind to damp my courage, and it seemed too much for one of my strength, being alone in a very small boat, to encounter such collected danger. To pursue my voyage up the river, and be obliged every evening to pass such dangerous defiles, appeared to me as perilous as running the gauntlet betwixt two rows of Indians armed with knives and firebrands. I however resolved to continue my voyage one day longer, if I possibly could with safety, and then return down the river, should I find the like difficulties to oppose. Accordingly I got everything on board, charged my gun, and set sail cautiously along shore. As I passed by Battle Lagoon, I began to tremble and keep a good lookout, when suddenly a huge alligator rushed out of the reeds, and with a tremendous roar came up, and darted as swift as an arrow under my boat, emerging upright on my lee quarter, with open jaws, and belching water and smoke that fell upon me like rain in a hurricane. I laid soundly about his head with my club and beat him off, and after plunging and darting about my boat, he went off on a straight line through the water, seemingly with the rapidity of lightning, and entered the cape of the lagoon. I now employed my time to the very best advantage in paddling close along shore, but could not forbear looking now and then behind me, and presently perceived one of them coming up again. The water of the river hereabouts was shoal and very clear, the monster came up with the usual roar and menaces, and passed close by the side of my boat, when I could distinctly see a young brood of alligators to the number of one hundred or more, following after her in a long train. They kept close together in a column without straggling off to the one side or the other, the young appeared to be of an equal size, about fifteen inches in length, almost black, with pale yellow transverse-waved clouds or blotches, much like rattlesnakes in color. I now lost sight of my enemy again.

Still keeping close along shore, on turning a point or projection of the river bank, at once I beheld a great number of hillocks or small pyramids, resembling haycocks, ranged like an encampment along the banks. They stood fifteen or twenty yards distant from the water, on a high marsh, about four feet perpendicular above the water. I knew them to be the nests of the crocodile, having had a description of them before, and now expected a furious and general attack, as I saw several large crocodiles swimming abreast of these buildings. These nests being so great a curiosity to me, I was determined at all events immediately to land and examine them. Accordingly I ran my bark on shore at one of their landing places, which was a sort of nick or little dock, from which ascended a sloping path or road up to the edge of the meadow, where their nests were, most of them were deserted, and the great thick whitish eggshells lay broken and scattered upon the ground round about them.

The nests or hillocks are of the form of an obtuse cone, four feet high and four or five feet in diameter at their bases, they are constructed with mud, grass and herbage. At first they lay a floor of this kind of tempered mortar on the ground, upon which they deposit a layer of eggs, and upon this a stratum of mortar, seven or eight inches in thickness, and then another layer of eggs, and in this manner one stratum upon another, nearly to the top. I believe they commonly lay from one to two hundred eggs in a nest. These are hatched, I suppose, by the heat of the sun, and perhaps the vegetable substances mixed with the earth, being acted upon by the sun, may cause a small degree of fermentation, and so increase the heat in those hillocks. The ground for several acres about these nests showed evident marks of a continual resort of alligators, the grass was everywhere beaten down, hardly a blade or straw was left standing, whereas, all about, at a distance, it was five or six feet high, and as thick as it could grow together. The female, as I imagine, carefully watches her own nest of eggs until they are all hatched, or perhaps while she is attending her own brood, she takes under her care and protection, as many as she can get at one time, either from her own particular nest or others. But certain it is, that the young are not left to shift for themselves, having had frequent opportunities of seeing the female alligator leading about the shores her train of young ones, just as a hen does her brood of chickens, and she is equally assiduous and courageous in defending the young, which are under her care, and providing for their subsistence. And when she is basking upon the warm banks, with her brood around her, you may hear the young ones continually whining and barking, like young puppies. I believe but few of a brood live to the years of full growth and magnitude, as the old feed on the young as long as they can make prey of them.

The alligator when full grown is a very large and terrible creature, and of prodigious strength, activity and swiftness in the water. I have seen them twenty feet in length, and some are supposed to be twenty-two or twenty-three feet. Their body is as large as that of a horse, their shape exactly resembles that of a lizard, except their tail, which is flat or cuneiform, being compressed on each side, and gradually diminishing from the abdomen to the extremity, which, with the whole body is covered with horny plates or squammæ, impenetrable when on the body of the live animal, even to a rifle ball, except about their head and just behind their fore-legs or arms, where it is said they are only vulnerable. The head of a full-grown one is about three feet, and the mouth opens nearly the same length, the eyes are small in proportion and seem sunk deep in the head, by means of the prominence of the brows, the nostrils are large, inflated and prominent on the top, so that the head in the water resembles, at a distance, a great chunk of wood floating about. Only the upper jaw moves, which they raise almost perpendicular, so as to form a right angle with the lower one. In the fore-part of the upper jaw, on each side, just under the nostrils, are two very large, thick, strong teeth or tusks, not very sharp, but rather the shape of a cone, these are as white as the finest polished ivory, and are not covered by any skin or lips, and always in sight, which gives the creature a frightful appearance, in the lower jaw are holes opposite to these teeth, to receive them, when they clap their jaws together it causes a surprising noise, like that which is made by forcing a heavy plank with violence upon the ground, and may be heard at a great distance.

But what is yet more surprising to a stranger, is the incredible loud and terrifying roar, which they are capable of making, especially in the spring season, their breeding time. It most resembles very heavy distant thunder, not only shaking the air and waters, but causing the earth to tremble, and when hundreds and thousands are roaring at the same time, you can scarcely be persuaded but that the whole globe is violently and dangerously agitated.

An old champion, who is perhaps absolute sovereign of a little lake or lagoon (when fifty less than himself are obliged to content themselves with swelling and roaring in little coves round about) darts forth from the reedy coverts all at once, on the surface of the waters, in a right line, at first seemingly as rapid as lightning, but gradually more slowly until he arrives at the center of the lake, when he stops. He now swells himself by drawing in wind and water through his mouth, which causes a loud sonorous rattling in the throat for near a minute, but it is immediately forced out again through his mouth and nostrils, with a loud noise, brandishing his tail in the air, and the vapor ascending from his nostrils like smoke. At other times, when swollen to an extent ready to burst, his head and tail lifted up, he spins or twirls round on the surface of the water. He acts his part like an Indian chief when rehearsing his feats of war, and then rearing, the exhibition is continued by others who dare to step forth, and strive to excel each other, to gain the attention of the favorite female.

Having gratified my curiosity at this general breeding place and nursery of crocodiles, I continued my voyage up the river without being greatly disturbed by them. In my way I observed islets or floating fields of the bright green Pistia, decorated with other amphibious plants, as Senecio Jacobea, Perficaria amphibia, Coreopsis bidens, Hydrocotyle fluitans, and many others of less note.

The swamps on the banks and islands of the river are generally three or four feet above the surface of the water, and very level, the timber large and growing thinly, more so than what is observed to be in the swamps below Lake George. The black rich earth is covered with moderately tall and very succulent tender grass, which when chewed is sweet and agreeable to the taste, somewhat like young sugar cane It is a jointed decumbent grass, sending out radiculae at the joints into the earth, and so spreads itself by creeping over its surface

The large timber trees which possess the low lands are Acer rubrum, Ac negundo, Ac glaucum, Ulmus sylvatica, Fraxinus excelsior, Frax aquatica, Ulmus suberifer, Gleditsia monosperma, Gledit triacanthus, Diospyros Virginica, Nyssa aquatica, Nyssa sylvatica, Juglans cinerea, Quercus dentata, Quercus phillos, Hopea tinctoria, Corypha palma, Morus rubra, and many more The palm grows on the edges of the banks, where they are raised higher than the adjacent level ground by the accumulation of sand, river-shells, etc I passed along several miles by those rich swamps, the channels of the river which encircle the several fertile islands I had passed, now uniting, formed one deep channel near three hundred yards over The banks of the river on each side began to rise and present shelly bluffs, adorned by beautiful orange groves, laurels and live oaks And now appeared in sight a tree that claimed my whole attention it was the Carica papaya, both male and female, which were in flower, and the latter both in flower and fruit, some of which were ripe, as large and of the form of a pear, and of a most charming appearance

This admirable tree is certainly the most beautiful of any vegetable production I know of, the towering laurel magnolia and exalted palm indeed exceed it in grandeur and magnificence, but not in elegance, delicacy, and gracefulness It rises erect, with a perfectly straight tapering stem, to the height of fifteen or twenty feet, which is smooth and polished, of a bright ash color resembling leaf silver, curiously inscribed with the footsteps of the fallen leaves, and these vestiges are placed in a very regular uniform imbricated order, which has a fine effect, as if the little column were elegantly carved all over Its perfectly spherical top is formed of very large lobe-sinuate leaves, supported on very long footstalks, the lower leaves are the largest as well as their petioles the longest, and make a graceful sweep or flourish, like the long f or the branches of a sconce candlestick The ripe and green fruit are placed round about the stem or trunk, from the lowermost leaves, where the ripe fruit are,

and upwards almost to the top, the heart or inmost pithy part of the trunk is in a manner hollow, or at best consists of very thin porous medullae or membranes The tree very seldom branches or divides into limbs, I believe never unless the top is by accident broken off when very young I saw one which had two tops or heads, the stem of which divided near the earth It is always green, ornamented at the same time with flowers and fruit, which like figs come out singly from the trunk or stem

After resting and refreshing myself in these delightful shades, I left them with reluctance Embarking again after the fervid heats of the meridian sun was abated, for some time I passed by broken ridges of shelly high land, covered with groves of live oak, palm, Olea americana, and orange trees, frequently observing floating islets and green fields of the Pistia near the shores of the river and lagoons

Here is in this river and in the waters all over Florida a very curious and handsome species of birds The people call them snakebirds I think I have seen paintings of them on the Chinese screens and other India pictures They seem to be a species of cormorant or loon (Colymbus cauda elongata), but far more beautiful and delicately formed than any other species that I have ever seen The head and neck of this bird are extremely small and slender, the latter very long indeed, almost out of all proportion, the bill long, straight, and slender, tapering from its ball to a sharp point, all the upper side, the abdomen and thighs, are as black and glossy as a raven's, covered with feathers so firm and elastic that they in some degree resemble fish-scales, the breast and upper part of the belly are covered with feathers of a cream color, the tail is very long, of a deep black, and tipped with a silvery white, and when spread represents an unfurled fan They delight to sit in little peaceable communities, on the dry limbs of trees hanging over the still waters, with their wings and tails expanded, I suppose to cool and air themselves, when at the same time they behold their images in the watery mirror At such times, when we approach them, they drop off the limbs into the water as if dead, and for a minute or two are not to be seen, when on a sudden, at a vast distance, their long slender head and neck only appear and have very much the appearance of a snake, and no other part of them are to be seen when swimming in the water, except sometimes the tip end of their tail. In the heat of the day they are seen in great numbers, sailing very high in the air, over lakes and rivers.

I doubt not but if this bird had been an inhabitant of the Tiber in Ovid's days it would have furnished him with a subject for some beautiful and entertaining metamorphoses. I believe it feeds entirely on fish, for its flesh smells and tastes intolerably strong of it, it is scarcely to be eaten unless constrained by insufferable hunger.

The air continued sultry, and scarcely enough wind to flutter the leaves on the trees. The eastern coast of the river now opens, and presents to view ample plains, consisting of grassy marshes and green meadows, and affords a prospect almost unlimited and extremely pleasing. The opposite shore exhibits a sublime contrast—a high bluff bearing magnificent forests of grand magnolia, glorious palms, fruitful orange groves, live oaks, bays, and other trees. This grand elevation continues four or five hundred yards, describing a gentle curve on the river, ornamented by a sublime grove of palms, consisting of many hundreds of trees together—they entirely shade the ground under them. Above and below the bluff, the grounds gradually descend to the common level swamps on the river, at the back of this eminence open to view expansive green meadows or savannas, in which are to be seen glittering ponds of water, surrounded at a great distance by high open pine forests and hummocks, and islets of oaks and bays projecting into the savannas. After ranging about these solitary groves and peaceful shades, I re-embarked and continued some miles up the river, between elevated banks of the swamps or low lands, when on the east shore, in a capacious cove or winding of the river, were pleasing floating fields of Pistia, and in the bottom of this cove opened to view a large creek or branch of the river, which I knew to be the entrance to a beautiful lake, on the banks of which was the farm I was going to visit, and which I designed should be the last extent of my voyage up the river.

About noon the weather became extremely sultry, not a breath of wind stirring, hazy or cloudy, with very heavy distant thunder, which was answered by the crocodiles, sure presage of a storm.

Soon after ascending this branch of the river, on the right hand presents to view a delightful little bluff, consisting chiefly of shells, and covered with a dark grove of red cedar, Zanthoxylum and myrtle. I could not resist the temptation to stop here, although the tremendous thunder all around the hemisphere alarmed me greatly, having a large lake to cross. From this grove appears to view an expansive and pleasing prospect. The beautiful long lake in front, about north-east from me, its most distant east shores adorned with dark, high forests of stately trees, north and south almost endless green plains and meadows, embellished with islets and projecting promontories of high, dark forests, where the pyramidal Magnolia grandiflora, Palma elata, and shady oak, conspicuously tower.

Being heretofore so closely invested by high forests and deep swamps of the great river, I was prevented from seeing the progress and increase of the approaching tempest, the terrific appearance of which now at once confounded me. How purple and fiery appeared the tumultuous clouds, swiftly ascending or darting from the horizon upwards! they seemed to oppose and dash against each other, the skies appeared streaked with blood or purple flame overhead, the flaming lightning streaming and darting about in every direction around, seems to fill the world with fire, whilst the heavy thunder keeps the earth in a constant tremor. I had yet some hopes of crossing the lake to the plantation in sight. On the opposite shore of the creek before me, and on the cape as we enter the lake, stood a large islet or grove of oaks and palms. Here I intended to seek shelter and abide till the fury of the hurricane was overpast, if I found it too violent to permit me to cross the lake. In consequence of this precipitate determination, I stepped into my boat and pushed off. What a dreadful rushing and roaring there is everywhere around me! and to my utter confusion and astonishment, I could not find from what particular quarter its strongest current or direction came, whereby I might have a proper chance of taking measures of securing a harbor or running from it. The high forests behind me bend to the blast, and the sturdy limbs of the trees crack. I had by this time got up abreast of the grove or hummock. The hurricane close by, pursuing me, I found it dangerous and imprudent in the highest degree to put in here, as the groves were already torn up, and the spreading limbs of the ancient live oaks were flying over my head, and carried about in the air as leaves and stubble. I ran by and boldly entered the lake (being hurried in by a strong current, which seemed a prodigy, the violent wind driving the stream of the creek back again into the lake), and as soon as possible took shelter under the high reedy bank of the lake, made fast my bark to the boughs of a low shrubby hickory, that leaned over the water. Such was the violence of the wind, that it raised the waters on the opposite shores of the lake several feet perpendicular, and there was a rapid flow of water from the creek into it, which was contrary to its natural course. Such floods of rain fell during the space of half or three quarters of an hour, that my boat was filled, and I expected every moment when I should see her sink to the bottom of the lake, and the violence of the wind kept the cable so constantly extended, that it was beyond my ability to get to her. My box which contained my books of specimens and other collections, was floating about in her, and for a great part of the time the rain came down with such rapidity and fell in such quantities, that every object was totally obscured, excepting the continual streams or rivers of lightning, pouring from the clouds. All seemed a frightful chaos. When the wind and rain abated, I was overjoyed to see the face of nature again appear.

It took me an hour or more to clear the water out of my bark. I then crossed the lake before a brisk and favorable breeze (it was about a mile over), and landed safely at the plantation.

When I arrived, my friend was affrighted to see me, and immediately inquired of me in what manner I came there, supposing it impossible (until I had showed him my boat) that I could have arrived by water, through so tremendous a hurricane.

My hospitable friend, after supplying me with necessaries, prevailed on me to accept of the company and assistance of his purveyor, one day's voyage down the river, whom I was to set on shore at a certain bluff, upwards of twenty miles below, but not above one third that distance by land, he was to be out in the forests one day, on a hunt for turkeys.

10 The current of the river being here confined within its perpendicular banks, ran briskly down. We cheerfully descended the grand river St. Juan, enjoying enchanting prospects.

Before night we reached the destined port, at a spacious orange grove. Next morning we separated, and I proceeded down the river. The prospects on either hand are now pleasing, and I view them at leisure, and without toil or dread.

20 Induced by the beautiful appearance of the green meadows, which open to the eastward, I determined not to pass this Elysium without a visit. Behold the loud, sonorous, watchful savanna cranes (grus pratensis) with musical clangor, in detached squadrons. They spread their light elastic sail, at first they move from the earth heavy and slow, they labor and beat the dense air, they form the line with wide extended wings, tip to tip, they all rise and fall together as one bird, now they mount aloft, gradually wheeling about, each squadron performs its evolution, encircling the expansive plains, observing each one their own orbit, then lowering sail, descend on the verge of some glittering lake, whilst other squadrons, ascending aloft in spiral circles, bound on interesting discoveries, wheel round and double the promontory, in the silvery regions of the clouded skies, where, far from the scope of eye, they carefully observe the verdant meadows on the borders of the East Lake, then contract their plumes and descend to the earth, where, resting a while on some verdant eminence, near the flowery border of the lake, with dignified, yet slow, respectful steps, approach the kindred band, they confer, and treat for habitation, the bounds and precincts being settled, they confederate and take possession.

Since I have turned my observation upon the birds of this country, I shall notice another very singular one, which though already most curiously and exactly figured by Catesby, which seems to be nearly allied to those before mentioned, I mean the bird which he calls the wood pelican. This is a large bird, perhaps near three feet high when standing erect The bill is very long and strong, bending with a moderate curve from the base to the tip, the upper mandible is the largest, and receives the edges of the nether one into its whole length, the edges are very sharp and firm, the whole of a dark ash or horn color, the forehead round the base of the beak and sides of the head is bare of feathers, and of a dark greenish color, in which space is placed the eyes, which are very large, the remainder of the head and neck is of a nut brown color, the back of a light bluish grey, upper part of the wings, breast, and belly, almost white, with some slight dashes of grey, the quill-feathers and tail, which are very short, are of a dark slate color, almost black, the legs, which are very long, and bare of feathers a great length above the knees are of a dark dull greenish color they have a small bag or pouch under their throat they feed on serpents, young alligators, frogs, and other reptiles

This solitary bird does not associate in flocks, but is generally seen alone, commonly near the banks of great rivers, in vast marshes or meadows, especially such as are caused by inundations, and also in the vast deserted rice plantations he stands alone on the topmost limb of tall dead cypress trees, his neck contracted or drawn in upon his shoulders, and beak resting like a long scythe upon his breast In this pensive posture and solitary situation, it looks extremely grave, sorrowful, and melancholy, as if in the deepest thought They are never seen on the salt seacoast, and yet are never found at a great distance from it I take this bird to be of a different genus from the tantalus, and perhaps approaches the nearest to the Egyptian ibis of any other bird yet known <sup>1</sup>

Having agreeably diverted away the intolerable heats of sultry noon in fruitful fragrant groves, with renewed vigor I again resume my sylvan pilgrimage. The afternoon and evening moderately warm, and exceeding pleasant views from the river and its varied shores I passed by Battle Lagoon and the bluff, without much opposition, but the crocodiles were already assembling in the pass Before night I came to, at a charming orange grove bluff, on the east side of the little lake, and after fixing my camp on a high open situation, and collecting a plenty of dry wood for fuel, I had time to get some fine trout for supper, and joyfully return to my camp

What a most beautiful creature is this fish before me! gliding to and fro, and figuring in the still clear waters, with his orient attendants and associates the yellow bream or sun fish It is about eight inches in length, nearly of the shape of the trout, but rather larger in proportion over the shoulders and breast the mouth large, and the branchiostega opens wide, the whole fish is of a pale gold (or burnished brass) color, darker on the back and upper sides, the scales are of a proportionable size, regularly placed, and everywhere variably powdered with red, russet, silver, blue, and green specks, so laid on the scales as to appear like real dust or opaque bodies, each apparent particle being so projected by light and shade, and the various attitudes of the fish, as to deceive the sight, for in reality nothing can be of a more plain and polished surface than the scales and whole body of the fish The fins are of an orange color, and, like all the species of the bream, the

Oh, what joy
To see a sanctuary for our country's youth Informed with such a spirit as might be Its own protection, a primeval grove, Where, though the shades of cheerfulness were filled, Nor indigent of songs warbled from crowds In under-coverts yet the countenance Of the whole place should bear a stamp of awe,
A habitation sober and demure For ruminating creatures, a domain For quiet things to wander in, a haunt In which the heron should delight to feed
By the shy rivers, and the pelican Upon the cypress spire in lonely thought Might sit and sun himself ultimate angle of the branchiostega terminates by a little spatula, the extreme end of which represents a crescent of the finest ultramarine blue, encircled with silver and velvet black, like the eye in the feathers of a peacock's train. He is a fish of prodigious strength and activity in the water, a warrior in a gilded coat of mail, and gives no rest or quarter to small fish, which he preys upon. They are delicious food and in great abundance.<sup>1</sup>

The orange grove is but narrow, betwixt the river banks and ancient Indian fields, where there are evident traces of the habitations of the ancients, surrounded with groves of live oak, laurel, magnolia, Zanthoxylum, liquidambar, and others

1 John Livingston Lowes, in discussing the background of Coleridge's "The Ancient Mariner" and in particular the lines

Within the shadow of the ship,
I watched their rich attire Blue, glossy green, and velvet black,
They coiled and swam, and every track Was a flash of golden fire (277-81)

says, after citing certain probable influences: "But neither Father Bourzes's fishes nor Cook's protozoa are 'velvet black' or, for that matter, black at all. Where did the rich array of the water-snakes acquire its shadowed livery? Probably none of the books which Coleridge was reading during the gestation of 'The Ancient Mariner' left more lively images in his memory than Bartram's Travels. The fascinating fifth chapter of Part Two in particular had awakened him to all manner of poetic possibilities, and had prompted copious transcriptions in the Note Book. And these transcripts form, as it happens, a significant cluster. The alligators (punctuated by Hartley's moonlit tears) were set down from pages 127-30 of the Travels, the 'little peaceable community' of snake-birds, from pages 132-33, the antiphonal roarings of the crocodiles and the thunder, from page 140, the wilderness plot, green, fountainous, and unviolated, from page 157, and the Gordonia lasianthus, from pages 161-62. Coleridge's memory, it is clear, had been greedily absorbing impressions from these thirty-odd pages, as Gideon's fleece drank up the dew. Now on pages 153-54 of the Travels, at the very heart of the cluster, flanked on both sides by passages which Coleridge actually transcribed, appears a long and vivid description of 'the yellow bream or sun fish.' 'What a most beautiful creature is this fish before me!' exclaims Bartram, 'gliding to and fro, and figuring in the still clear waters, with his orient attendants and associates.' 'The whole fish,' he goes on, 'is of a pale gold (or burnished brass) color the scales are powdered with red, russet, silver, blue and green specks,' while at the gills is 'a little spatula encircled with silver, and velvet black.'" Lowes, The Road to Xanadu (Boston, 1930), 46-47

How harmonious and soothing is this native sylvan music now at still evening! inexpressibly tender are the responsive cooings of the innocent dove, in the fragrant Zanthoxylum groves, and the variable and tuneful warblings of the nonpareil, with the more sprightly and elevated strains of the blue linnet and golden icterus. This is indeed harmony, even amidst the incessant croaking of the frogs: the shades of silent night are made more cheerful, with the shrill voice of the whip-poor-will and active mock-bird.

My situation high and airy, a brisk and cool breeze steadily and incessantly passing over the clear waters of the lake, and fluttering over me through the surrounding groves, wings its way to the moonlight savannas, while I repose on my sweet and healthy couch of the soft Tillandsia ulneadecites, and the latter gloomy and still hours of night passed rapidly away as it were in a moment. I arose, strengthened and cheerful, in the morning.

At evening I arrived at Cedar Point, my former safe and pleasant harbor, at the east cape of the great lake, where I had noticed some curious shrubs and plants. Here I rested, and on the smooth and gentle current launch again into the little ocean of Lake George, meaning now, on my return, to coast his western shores in search of new beauties in the bounteous kingdom of Flora.

I was however induced to deviate a little from my intended course, and touch at the enchanting little Isle of Palms. This delightful spot, planted by nature, is almost an entire grove of palms, with a few pyramidal magnolias, live-oaks, golden orange, and the animating Zanthoxylum. What a beautiful retreat is here! blessed, unviolated spot of earth! rising from the limpid waters of the lake, its fragrant groves and blooming lawns invested and protected by encircling ranks of the Yucca gloriosa. A fascinating atmosphere surrounds this blissful garden, the balmy Lantana, ambrosial Citra, perfumed Cinnamon, perspiring their mingled odors, wafted through Zanthoxylum groves. I at last broke away from the enchanting spot, and stepped on board my boat, hoisted sail and soon approached the coast of the main, at the cool eve of day, then traversing a capacious, semicircular cove of the lake, verged by low, extensive, grassy meadows, I at length by dusk made a safe harbor, in a little lagoon, on the seashore or strand of a bold sandy point, which descended from the surf of the lake. This was a clean sandy beach, hard and firm by the beating surf, when the wind sets from the east coast. I drew up my light vessel on the sloping shore, that she might be safe from the beating waves in case of a sudden storm of wind in the night. A few yards back the land was a little elevated, and overgrown with thickets of shrubs and low trees, consisting chiefly of Zanthoxylum, Olea Americana, Rhamus frangula, Sideroxylon, Morus, Prelea, Halesia, Quercus, Myrica cerifera and others. These groves were but low, yet sufficiently high to shelter me from the chilling dews, and being but a few yards distance from my vessel, here I fixed my encampment. A brisk wind arising from the lake, drove away the clouds of mosquitoes into the thickets. I now, with difficulty and industry, collected a sufficiency of dry wood to keep up a light during the night, and to roast some trout which I had caught when descending the river. Their heads I stewed in the juice of oranges, which, with boiled rice, afforded me a wholesome and delicious supper. I hung the remainder of my broiled fish on the snags of some shrubs over my head. I at last, after reconnoitring my habitation, returned, spread abroad my skins and blanket upon the clean sands by my fireside, and betook myself to repose.

How glorious[ly] the powerful sun, minister of the Most High in the rule and government of this earth, leaves our hemisphere, retiring from our sight beyond the western forests! I behold with gratitude his departing smiles, tinging the fleecy roseate clouds, now riding far away on the eastern horizon. Behold they vanish from sight in the azure skies!

All now silent and peaceable, I suddenly fell asleep. At midnight I awake, when, raising my head erect, I find myself alone in the wilderness of Florida, on the shores of Lake George. Alone indeed, but under the care of the Almighty, and protected by the invisible hand of my guardian angel.

When quite awake, I started at the heavy tread of some animal, the dry limbs of trees upon the ground crack under his feet, the close shrubby thickets part and bend under him as he rushes off.

I rekindled up my sleepy fire, lay in contact with the exfoliated, smoking brands damp with the dew of heaven.

The bright flame ascends and illuminates the ground and groves around me.

When looking up, I found my fish carried off, though I had thought them safe on the shrubs just over my head, but their scent, carried to a great distance by the damp nocturnal breezes, I suppose were too powerful attractions to resist.

Perhaps it may not be time lost, to rest awhile here, and reflect on the unexpected and unaccountable incident, which however pointed out to me an extraordinary deliverance or protection of my life, from the rapacious wolf that stole my fish from over my head.

How much easier and more eligible might it have been for him to have leaped upon my breast in the dead of sleep, and torn my throat, which would have instantly deprived me of life, and then glutted his stomach for the present with my warm blood, and dragged off my body, which would have made a feast afterwards for him and his howling associates! I say would not this have been a wiser step, than to have made protracted and circular approaches, and then after, by chance, espying the fish over my head, with the greatest caution and silence rear up and take them off the snags one by one, then make off with them, and that so cunningly as not to awaken me until he had fairly accomplished his purpose?

The morning being clear, I set sail with a favorite breeze, coasting along the shores, when on a sudden the waters became transparent, and discovered the sandy bottom, and the several nations of fish, passing and repassing each other. Following this course I was led to the cape of the little river, descending from Six Mile Springs, and meanders six miles from its source through green meadows. I entered this pellucid stream, sailing over the heads of innumerable squadrons of fish, which, although many feet deep in the water, were distinctly to be seen. I passed by charming islets of flourishing trees, as palm, red bay, ash, maple, nyssa, and others. As I approached the distant high forest on the main, the river widened, floating fields of the green Pistia surrounded me, the rapid stream winding through them. What an alluring scene was now before me! A vast basin or little lake of crystal waters, half encircled by swelling hills, clad with orange and odoriferous Illicium groves, the towering magnolia, itself a grove, and the exalted palm, as if conscious of their transcendent glories, tossed about their lofty heads, painting, with mutable shades, the green floating fields beneath. The social prattling coot enrobed in blue, and the squealing water-hen, with wings half-expanded, tripped after each other over the watery mirror

I put in at an ancient landing-place, which is a sloping ascent to a level grassy plain, an old Indian field. As I intended to make my most considerable collections at this place, I proceeded immediately to fix my encampment but a few yards from my safe harbor, where I securely fastened my boat to a live oak which overshadowed my port

A SNOW STORM AS IT AFFECTS THE AMERICAN FARMER<sup>1</sup>

No man of the least degree of sensibility can journey through any number of years in whatever climate without often being compelled to make many useful observations on the different phenomena of Nature which surround him, and without involuntarily being struck either with awe or admiration in beholding some of the elementary conflicts in the midst of which he lives. A great thunder storm, an extensive flood, a desolating hurricane, a sudden and intense frost, an overwhelming snow storm, a sultry day,—each of these different scenes exhibits singular beauties even in spite of the damage they cause. Often whilst the heart laments the loss to the citizen, the enlightened mind, seeking for the natural causes, and astonished at the effects, awakes itself to surprise and wonder.

Of all the scenes which this climate offers, none has struck me with a greater degree of admiration than the ushering in of our winters, and the vehemence with which their first rigor seizes and covers the earth, a rigor which, when once descended, becomes one of the principal favors and blessings this climate has to boast of. I mean to view it as connected with the welfare of husbandry; as a great flood of congealed water sheltering the grass and the grains of our fields, and overwhelming men, beasts, birds living under the care of man [He] in the midst of this sudden alteration has to provide food and shelter for so many animals, on the preservation of which the husbandman's welfare entirely depends. This single thought is really tremendous from grass and pastures growing in our meadows and in our fields, from various other means by which the tenants of our farms lived before, they must suddenly pass to provenders, to grains, and to other resources gathered by Man when the face of the earth teemed with a luxuriant vegetation.

'Tis at this period that the functions of a great farmer become more extended and more difficult. 'Tis from his stores that all must draw their subsistence. He must know whether they will be sufficient to reach the other end of the wintry career. He must see whether all have a sufficient quantity daily delivered to them, whether each class is properly divided, whether water can be procured, what diseases and accidents may happen. These are a few sketches of that energetic circle of foresight, knowledge, and activity which fill the space of five months, to which you must add the care of a large family as to raiment, fuel, and victuals.

The tenants of his house, like the beasts of his farm, must now depend on the collected stores of the preceding season, sagaciously distributed and prepared by the industry of his wife. There lies the aurum potable of an American farmer. He may work and gather the choicest fruits of his farm, but if female economy fails, he loses the comfort of good victuals. He sees wholesome meats, excellent flours converted into indifferent food, whilst his neighbor, more happy, though less rich, feeds on well-cooked dishes, well-composed puddings. For such is our lot if we are blessed with a good wife, we may boast of living better than any people of the same rank on the globe.

Various tokens, long since known, guide the farmer in his daily progress and various occupations from the autumnal fall of the leaves. If he is prudent and active, he makes himself ready against the worst which Nature can give. Sheds, stables, barn-yards, partitions, racks, and mangers must be carefully reviewed and repaired, the stores of corn-stalks, straw, and hay must be securely placed where neither rain nor snow can damage them.

Great rains at last replenish the springs, the brooks, the swamps, and impregnate the earth. Then a severe frost succeeds which prepares it to receive the voluminous coat of snow which is soon to follow, though it is often preceded by a short interval of smoke and mildness, called the Indian Summer. This is in general the invariable rule: winter is not said properly to begin until these few moderate days and the rising of the waters have announced it to Man. This great mass of liquid once frozen spreads everywhere natural bridges, opens communications impassable before. The man of foresight neglects nothing, he has saved every object which might be damaged or lost, he is ready.

The wind, which is a great regulator of the weather, shifts to the northeast, the air becomes bleak and then intensely cold, the light of the sun becomes dimmed as if an eclipse had happened, a general night seems coming on. At last imperceptible atoms make their appearance, they are few and descend slowly, a sure prognostic of a great snow. Little or no wind is as yet felt. By degrees the number as well as the size of these white particles is increased, they descend in larger flakes, a distant wind is heard, the noise swells and seems to advance, the new element at last appears and overspreads everything. In a little time the heavy clouds seem to approach nearer the earth and discharge a winged flood, driving along towards the southwest, howling at every door, roaring in every chimney, whistling with asperous sound through the naked limbs of the trees, these are the shrill notes which mark the weight of the storm. Still the storm increases as the night approaches, and its great obscurity greatly adds to the solemnity of the scene.

Sometimes the snow is preceded by melted hail which, like a shining varnish, covers and adorns the whole surface of the earth, of buildings and trees, a hurtful time for the cattle which it chills and oppresses. Mournful and solitary they retire to what shelter they can get, and, forgetting to eat, they wait with instinctive patience until the storm is over. How amazingly changed is the aspect of Nature! From the dusky hues of the autumnal shades, everything becomes refulgently white, from soft, miry roads, we pass all at once to solid icy bridges. What could an inhabitant of Africa say or think in contemplating this northern phenomenon? Would not it raise in his mind a greater degree of astonishment than his thunder storms and his vertical suns?

A general alarm is spread through the farm. The master calls all his hands, opens the gates, lets down the bars, calls and counts all his stock as they come along. The oxen, the cows, remembering ancient experience, repair to the place where they were foddered the preceding winter, the colts wild, whilst they could unrestrained bound on the grassy fields, suddenly deprived of that liberty, become tame and docile to the hands which stroke and feed them. The sheep, more encumbered than the rest, slowly creep along, and by their incessant bleating show their instinctive apprehension, they are generally the first which attract our attention and care. The horses are led to their stables, the oxen to their stalls, the rest are confined under their proper sheds and districts. All is safe, but no fodder need be given them yet, the stings of hunger are necessary to make them eat cheerfully the dried herbage and forget the green one on which they so lately fed. Heaven be praised, no accident has happened, all is secured from the inclemency of the storm. The farmer's vigilant eye has seen every operation performed, has numbered every head, and as a good master provided for the good welfare of all

At last he returns home loaded with hail and snow melting on his rough but warm clothes, his face is red with the repeated injury occasioned by the driving wind. His cheerful wife, not less pleased, welcomes him home with a mug of gingered cider, and whilst she helps him to dried and more comfortable clothes, she recounts to him the successful pains she has taken also in collecting all her ducks, geese, and all the rest of her numerous poultry; a province less extensive indeed but not less useful. But no sooner this simple tale is told than the cheerfulness of her mind is clouded by a sudden thought. Her children went to a distant school early in the morning whilst the sun shone, and ere any ideas were formed of this storm. They are not yet returned. What is become of them? Has the master had tenderness enough to tarry awhile and watch over his little flock until the arrival of some relief? Or has he rudely dismissed them in quest of his own safety?

These alarming thoughts are soon communicated to her husband who, starting up in all the glow of paternal anxiety, orders one of his negroes to repair to the schoolhouse with Bonny, the old faithful mare, who, like his wife, by her fecundity has replenished his farm. 'Tis done. She is mounted bare-back and hurried through the storm to the schoolhouse, at the door of which each child is impatiently waiting for this paternal assistance. At the sight of honest Tom, the negro, their joy is increased by the pleasure of going home on horseback. One is mounted before, and two behind. Rachel, the poor widow's little daughter, with tears in her eyes, sees her playmates, just before her equals, as she thought, now provided with a horse and an attendant,—a sad mortification. This is the first time she ever became sensible of the difference of her situation. Her distressed mother, not less anxious to fetch her child, prays to heaven that some charitable neighbor may bring her along. She, too, has a cow to take care of, a couple of pigs hitherto tenderly fed at the door, three or four ewes, perhaps, demanding her shelter round some part of her lonely log-house. Kind heaven hears her prayers. Honest Tom lifts her [Rachel] up and, for want of room, places her on Bonny's neck, there she is upheld by the oldest boy. Thus fixed with difficulty, they turn about and boldly face the driving storm, they all scream and are afraid of falling, at last they clunch together and are hushed. With cheerfulness and instinctive patience, Bonny proceeds along, and, sensible of the valuable cargo, highly lifting her legs, she securely treads along, shaking now and then her ears as the drifted snow penetrates into them.

A joyful meeting ensues. The thoughts of avoided danger increase the pleasure of the family. The milk-biscuit, the shortcake, the newly-baked apple-pie are immediately produced, and the sudden joy these presents occasion expels every idea of cold and snow. In this country of hospitality and plenty it would be a wonder indeed if little Rachel had not partaken of the same bounty. She is fed, made to warm herself, she has forgot the little reflections she had made at the schoolhouse door, she is happy, and to complete the goodly act, she is sent home on the same vehicle. The unfeigned thanks, the honest blessings of the poor widow, who was just going to set out, amply repays the trouble that has been taken, happy wages of this charitable attention.

The messenger returns. Everything is safe both within and without. At that instant the careful negro, Jack, who has been busily employed in carrying wood to the shed that he may not be at a loss to kindle fire in the morning, comes into his master's room carrying on his hip an enormous back-log without which a fire is supposed to be imperfectly made and to be devoid of heat. All hands rise, the fire is made to blaze, the hearth is cleaned, and all the cheerful family sit around. Rest after so many laborious operations brings along with it an involuntary silence, even among the children who grow sleepy with their victuals in their hands, as they grow warm. 'Lord, hear, how it blows!' says one. 'My God, what a storm!' says another. 'Mammy, where does all this snow come from?' asks a third. 'Last year's storm, I think, was nothing to this,' observes the wife. 'I hope all is fast about the house. How happy it is for us that we had daylight to prepare us for it.'

The father now and then opens the door to pass judgment, and to contemplate the progress of the storm 'Tis dark, 'tis pitch-dark,' he says, 'a fence four rods off cannot be distinguished The locust-trees hard by the door bend under the pressure of the loaded blast Thank God, all is secured I'll fodder my poor cattle well in the morning if it please Him I should live to see it' And this pious sentiment serves him as a reward for all his former industry, vigilance, and care The negroes, friends to the fire, smoke and crack some coarse jokes, and, well-fed and clad, they contentedly make their brooms and ladles without any further concerns on their minds. Thus the industrious family, all gathered together under one roof, eat their wholesome supper, drink their mugs of cider, and grow imperceptibly less talkative and more thoughtless, as they grow more sleepy Now and then, when the redoubled fury of the storm rattles in the chimney, they seem to awake They look at the door again and again, but 'tis the work of omnipotence, it is unavoidable, their neighbors feel it as well as themselves Finally they go to bed, not to that bed of slavery or sorrow as is the case in Europe with people of their class, but on the substantial collection of honest feathers picked and provided by the industrious wife There, stretched between flannel sheets and covered with warm blankets made of their own sheep's wool, they enjoy the luxury of sound, undisturbed repose, earned by the fatigues of the preceding day The Almighty has no crime to punish in this innocent family, why should He permit ominous dreams and terrific visions to disturb the imaginations of these good people?

As soon as day reappears, the American farmer awakes and calls all his hands While some are busy in kindling the fires, the rest with anxiety repair to the barns and sheds What a dismal aspect presents itself to their view! The roads, the paths are no longer visible The drifted snow presents obstacles which must be removed with the shovel The fences and the trees, bending under the weight of snow which encumbers them, bend in a thousand shapes, but by a lucky blast of wind they are discharged, and they immediately recover their natural situation The cattle who had hitherto remained immovable, their tails to the wind, appear strangely disfigured by the long accession and adherence of the snow to their bodies On the sight of the master, suddenly animated, they heavily shake themselves clean, and crowd from all parts in expectation of that fodder which the industry of Man has provided for them Where their number is extensive, various and often distant are their allotments, which are generally in the vicinity of the stacks of hay In that case, when the barn-yard work is done, the farmer mounts his horse, followed by his men armed with pitch-forks He counts again the number of each sort, and sees that each receives a sufficient quantity The strong are separated from the weak, oxen with oxen, yearlings with yearlings, and so on through every class For cattle, like men, conscious of their superior force will abuse it when unrestrained by any law, and often live on their neighbor's property.

What a care, what an assiduity does this life require! Who on contemplating the great and important field of action performed every year by a large farmer, can refrain from valuing and praising as they ought this useful, this dignified class of men? These are the people who, scattered on the edge of this great continent, have made it to flourish, and have without the dangerous assistance of mines, gathered, by the sweat of their honest brows and by the help of their ploughs, such a harvest of commercial emoluments for their country, uncontaminated either by spoils or rapine These are the men who in future will replenish this huge continent even to its utmost unknown limits, and render this new found part of the world by far the happiest, the most potent as well as the most populous of any Happy people! May the poor, the wretched of Europe, animated by our example, invited by our laws, avoid the fetters of their country, and come in shoals to partake of our toils as well as of our happiness!

The next operation is to seek for convenient watering-places Holes must be cut through the ice, 'tis done The veteran, experienced cattle lead the way, tread down the snow, and form a path, the rest soon follow Two days' experience [teaches] them all the way to this place as well as the station they must occupy in their progress thither, the stoutest marching first and the weakest closing the rear. The succeeding operations with regard to the preservation of the cattle entirely depend on the judgment of the farmer. He knows, according to the weather, when it is best to give them either straw, corn-stalks, or hay. In very hard weather they are more hungry and better able to consume the coarse fodder, corn-stalks are reserved for sheep and young cattle, hay is given to all in thaws

Soon after this great fall of snow the wind shifts to the northwest and blows with great impetuosity, it gathers and drives the loose element. Everything seems to be involved a second time in a general whirlwind of white atoms, not so dangerous indeed as those clouds of sand raised in the deserts of Arabia. This second scourge is rather worse than the first, because it renders parts of the roads seemingly impassable. 'Tis then that with empty sleighs the neighborhood gather, and by their united efforts open a communication along the road. If new snow falls, new endeavors must be made use of to guard against the worst of inconveniences. For, to live, it is necessary to go to market, to mill, to the woods. This is, besides, the season of merriment and mutual visiting. All the labors of the farm are now reduced to those of the barn, to the fetching of fuel and to cleaning their own flax. The fatigues of the preceding summer require now some relaxation. What can be more conducive to it than the great plenty of wholesome food we all have? Cider is to be found in every house. The convenience of travelling invites the whole country to society, pleasure, and visiting. Bees are made, by which a number of people with their sleighs resort to the inviter's house, and there in one day haul him as much wood as will serve him a whole year. Next day 'tis another man's turn, admirable contrivance which promotes good-will, kindness, and mutual assistance. By means of these associations often the widows and orphans are relieved.

After two or three falls of snow the weather becomes serene though cold. New communications are opened over lakes and rivers and through forests hitherto impassable. The ox rests from his summer labor, and the horse amply fed now does all the work. His celerity is strengthened by the steel shoes with which his hoofs are armed, he is fit to draw on the snow as well as on the ice. Immense is the value of this season: logs for future buildings are easily drawn to the saw-mills, ready-piled stones are with equal ease brought to the intended spot; grain is conveyed to the different landings on our small rivers, from whence in the spring small vessels carry it to the sea-port towns, and from which again larger ones convey it away to the different marts of the world. The constancy of this serenely cold weather is one of the greatest blessings which seldom fails us. More to the southward their winters are often interrupted by thaws and rains which are unfavorable to transportation as well as to the cattle. [This is] a happy suspension of toils and labors, happy rest without which the vegetation of our cold climates would soon be exhausted. On the other hand, 'tis an expensive season in every respect: nothing profitable can be done, and clothes of the warmest sorts must be provided for everyone. Great parts of the profits of summer are expended in carrying a family through this wintry career,—but let not that reflection diminish our happiness! We are robust, healthy, and strong, the milder climates of the South have nothing that can compensate for these advantages. It is true that the class of men who work for the farmers have less employment, but nevertheless they live with comfort and in such abundance as is proportioned to their situation, everyone has bread and meat. As for the real poor, we have none in this happy country, those who through age and infirmities are past labor, are provided for by the township to which they belong. Such are the Mohawk and Canadian winters. A long ramble like this through a cold Canadian storm requires rest, silence, and sleep. After so long an excursion we may with propriety wish each other good night.

WHAT IS AN AMERICAN?

I WISH I could be acquainted with the feelings and thoughts which must agitate the heart and present themselves to the mind of an enlightened Englishman, when he first lands on this continent. He must greatly rejoice that he lived at a time to see this fair country discovered and settled, he must necessarily feel a share of national pride, when he views the chain of settlements which embellishes these extended shores. When he says to himself, this is the work of my countrymen, who, when convulsed by factions, afflicted by a variety of miseries and wants, restless and impatient, took refuge here. They brought along with them their national genius, to which they principally owe what liberty they enjoy, and what substance they possess. Here he sees the industry of his native country displayed in a new manner, and traces in their works the embryos of all the arts, sciences, and ingenuity which flourish in Europe. Here he beholds fair cities, substantial villages, extensive fields, an immense country filled with decent houses, good roads, orchards, meadows, and bridges, where an hundred years ago all was wild, woody and uncultivated! What a train of pleasing ideas this fair spectacle must suggest, it is a prospect which must inspire a good citizen with the most heartfelt pleasure. The difficulty consists in the manner of viewing so extensive a scene. He is arrived on a new continent, a modern society offers itself to his contemplation, different from what he had hitherto seen. It is not composed, as in Europe, of great lords who possess everything, and of a herd of people who have nothing. Here are no aristocratical families, no courts, no kings, no bishops, no ecclesiastical dominion, no invisible power giving to a few a very visible one, no great manufacturers employing thousands, no great refinements of luxury. The rich and the poor are not so far removed from each other as they are in Europe. Some few towns excepted, we are all tillers of the earth, from Nova Scotia to West Florida. We are a people of cultivators, scattered over an immense territory, communicating with each other by means of good roads and navigable rivers, united by the silken bands of mild government, all respecting the laws, without dreading their power, because they are equitable. We are all animated with the spirit of an industry which is unfettered and unrestrained, because each person works for himself. If he travels through our rural districts he views not the hostile castle, and the haughty mansion, contrasted with the clay-built hut and miserable cabin, where cattle and men help to keep each other warm, and dwell in meanness, smoke, and indigence. A pleasing uniformity of decent competence appears throughout our habitations. The meanest of our log-houses is a dry and comfortable habitation. Lawyer or merchant are the fairest titles our towns afford, that of a farmer is the only appellation of the rural inhabitants of our country. It must take some time ere he can reconcile himself to our dictionary, which is but short in words of dignity, and names of honor. There, on a Sunday, he sees a congregation of respectable farmers and their wives, all clad in neat homespun, well mounted, or riding in their own humble wagons. There is not among them an esquire, saving the unlettered magistrate. There he sees a parson as simple as his flock, a farmer who does not riot on the labor of others. We have no princes, for whom we toil, starve, and bleed. We are the most perfect society now existing in the world. Here man is free as he ought to be, nor is this pleasing equality so transitory as many others are. Many ages will not see the shores of our great lakes replenished with inland nations, nor the unknown bounds of North America entirely peopled. Who can tell how far it extends? Who can tell the millions of men whom it will feed and contain? for no European foot has as yet travelled half the extent of this mighty continent!

The next wish of this traveller will be to know whence came all these people? they are a mixture of English, Scotch, Irish, French, Dutch, Germans, and Swedes. From this promiscuous breed, that race now called Americans have arisen. The eastern provinces must indeed be excepted, as being the unmixed descendants of Englishmen. I have heard many wish that they had been more intermixed also for my part, I am no wisher, and think it much better as it has happened. They exhibit a most conspicuous figure in this great and variegated picture, they too enter for a great share in the pleasing perspective displayed in these thirteen provinces. I know it is fashionable to reflect on them, but I respect them for what they have done, for the accuracy and wisdom with which they have settled their territory, for the decency of their manners, for their early love of letters, their ancient college, the first in this hemisphere; for their industry, which to me who am but a farmer, is the criterion of everything. There never was a people, situated as they are, who with so ungrateful a soil have done more in so short a time. Do you think that the monarchical ingredients which are more prevalent in other governments, have purged them from all foul stains? Their histories assert the contrary.

In this great American asylum, the poor of Europe have by some means met together, and in consequence of various causes, to what purpose should they ask one another what countrymen they are? Alas, two thirds of them had no country. Can a wretch who wanders about, who works and starves, whose life is a continual scene of sore affliction or pinching penury, can that man call England or any other kingdom his country? A country that had no bread for him, whose fields procured him no harvest, who met with nothing but the frowns of the rich, the severity of the laws, with jails and punishments, who owned not a single foot of the extensive surface of this planet? No! urged by a variety of motives, here they came. Every thing has tended to regenerate them, new laws, a new mode of living, a new social system, here they are become men. In Europe they were as so many useless plants, wanting vegetative mould, and refreshing showers, they withered, and were mowed down by want, hunger, and war, but now by the power of transplantation, like all other plants they have taken root and flourished! Formerly they were not numbered in any civil lists of their country, except in those of the poor, here they rank as citizens. By what invisible power has this surprising metamorphosis been performed? By that of the laws and that of their industry. The laws, the indulgent laws, protect them as they arrive, stamping on them the symbol of adoption, they receive ample rewards for their labors, these accumulated rewards procure them lands, those lands confer on them the title of freemen, and to that title every benefit is affixed which men can possibly require. This is the great operation daily performed by our laws. From whence proceed these laws? From our government. Whence the government? It is derived from the original genius and strong desire of the people ratified and confirmed by the crown. This is the great chain which links us all, this is the picture which every province exhibits, Nova Scotia excepted. There the crown has done all, either there were no people who had genius, or it was not much attended to. The consequence is, that the province is very thinly inhabited indeed, the power of the crown in conjunction with the mosquitoes has prevented men from settling there. Yet some parts of it flourished once, and it contained a mild harmless set of people. But for the fault of a few leaders, the whole were banished. The greatest political error the crown ever committed in America, was to cut off men from a country which wanted nothing but men!

What attachment can a poor European emigrant have for a country where he had nothing? The knowledge of the language, the love of a few kindred as poor as himself, were the only cords that tied him. His country is now that which gives him land, bread, protection, and consequence. Ubi pams ibi patria,<sup>1</sup> is the motto of all emigrants. What then is the American, this new man? He is either an European, or the descendant of an European, hence that strange mixture of blood, which you will find in no other country. I could point out to you a family whose grandfather was an Englishman, whose wife was Dutch, whose son married a French woman, and whose present four sons have now four wives of different nations. He is an American, who, leaving behind him all his ancient prejudices and manners, receives new ones from the new mode of life he has embraced, the new government he obeys, and the new rank he holds. He becomes an American by being received in the broad lap of our great Alma Mater. Here individuals of all nations are melted into a new race of men, whose labors and posterity will one day cause great changes in the world. Americans are the western pilgrims, who are carrying along with them that great mass of arts, sciences, vigor, and industry which began long since in the east, they will finish the great circle. The Americans were once scattered all over Europe, here they are incorporated into one of the finest systems of population which has ever appeared, and which will hereafter become distinct by the power of the different climates they inhabit. The

American ought therefore to love this country much better than that wherein either he or his forefathers were born. Here the rewards of his industry follow with equal steps the progress of his labor, his labor is founded on the basis of nature, self-interest, can it want a stronger allure-ment? Wives and children, who before in vain demanded of him a morsel of bread, now, fat and frolicsome, gladly help their father to clear those fields whence exuberant crops are to arise to feed and to clothe them all, without any part being claimed, either by a despotic prince, a rich abbot, or a mighty lord. Here religion demands but little of him, a small voluntary salary to the minister, and gratitude to God, can he refuse these? The American is a new man, who acts upon new principles, he must therefore entertain new ideas, and form new opinions. From involuntary idleness, servile dependence, penury, and useless labor, he has passed to toils of a very different nature, rewarded by ample subsistence — This is an American.

British America is divided into many provinces, forming a large association, scattered along a coast 1500 miles extent and about 200 wide. This society I would fain examine, at least such as it appears in the middle provinces, if it does not afford that variety of tinges and gradations which may be observed in Europe, we have colors peculiar to ourselves. For instance, it is natural to conceive that those who live near the sea, must be very different from those who live in the woods, the intermediate space will afford a separate and distinct class.

Men are like plants, the goodness and flavor of the fruit proceeds from the peculiar soil and exposition in which they grow. We are nothing but what we derive from the air we breathe, the climate we inhabit, the government we obey, the system of religion we profess, and the nature of our employment. Here you will find but few crimes, these have acquired as yet no root among us. I wish I were able to trace all my ideas, if my ignorance prevents me from describing them properly, I hope I shall be able to delineate a few of the outlines, which are all I propose.

Those who live near the sea, feed more on fish than on flesh, and often encounter that boisterous element. This renders them more bold and enterprising; this leads them to neglect the confined occupations of the land. They see and converse with a variety of people, their intercourse with mankind becomes extensive. The sea inspires them with a love of traffic, a desire of transporting produce from one place to another, and leads them to a variety of resources which supply the place of labor. Those who inhabit the middle settlements, by far the most numerous, must be very different, the simple cultivation of the earth purifies them, but the indulgences of the government, the soft remonstrances of religion, the rank of independent freeholders, must necessarily inspire them with sentiments, very little known in Europe among people of the same class. What do I say? Europe has no such class of men, the early knowledge they acquire, the early bargains they make, give them a great degree of sagacity. As freemen they will be lugious, pride and obstinacy are often the cause of law suits, the nature of our laws and governments may be another. As citizens it is easy to imagine, that they will carefully read the newspapers, enter into every political disquisition, freely blame or censure governors and others. As farmers they will be careful and anxious to get as much as they can, because what they get is their own. As northern men they will love the cheerful cup. As Christians, religion curbs them not in their opinions, the general indulgence leaves every one to think for themselves in spiritual matters, the laws inspect our actions, our thoughts are left to God. Industry, good living, selfishness, litigiousness, country politics, the pride of freemen, religious indifference, are their characteristics. If you recede still farther from the sea, you will come into more modern settlements, they exhibit the same strong lineaments, in a ruder appearance. Religion seems to have still less influence, and their manners are less improved.

Now we arrive near the great woods, near the last inhabited districts, there men seem to be placed still farther beyond the reach of government, which in some measure leaves them to themselves. How can it pervade every corner, as they were driven there by misfortunes, necessity of beginnings, desire of acquiring large tracts of land, idleness, frequent want of economy, ancient debts, the re-union of such people does not afford a very pleasing spectacle. When discord, want of unity and friendship, when either drunkenness or idleness prevail in such remote districts, contention, inactivity, and wretchedness must ensue. There are not the same remedies to these evils as in a long established community. The few magistrates they have, are in general little better than the rest, they are often in a perfect state of war, that of man against man, sometimes decided by blows, sometimes by means of the law, that of man against every wild inhabitant of these venerable woods, of which they are come to dispossess them. There men appear to be no better than carnivorous animals of a superior rank, living on the flesh of wild animals when they can catch them, and when they are not able, they subsist on grain. He who would wish to see America in its proper light, and have a true idea of its feeble beginnings and barbarous rudiments, must visit our extended line of frontiers where the last settlers dwell, and where he may see the first labors of settlement, the mode of clearing the earth, in all their different appearances, where men are wholly left dependent on their native tempers, and on the spur of uncertain industry, which often fails when not sanctified by the efficacy of a few moral rules. There, remote from the power of example and check of shame, many families exhibit the most hideous parts of our society. They are a kind of forlorn hope, preceding by ten or twelve years the most respectable army of veterans which come after them. In that space, prosperity will polish some, vice and the law will drive off the rest, who uniting again with others like themselves will recede still farther, making room for more industrious people, who will finish their improvements, convert the log-house into a convenient habitation, and rejoicing that the first heavy labors are finished, will change in a few years that hitherto barbarous country into a fine fertile, well regulated district. Such is our progress, such is the march of the Europeans toward the interior parts of this continent. In all societies there are off-casts, this impure part serves as our precursors or pioneers, my father himself was one of that class, but he came upon honest principles, and was therefore one of the few who held fast, by good conduct and temperance, he transmitted to me his fair inheritance, when not above one in fourteen of his contemporaries had the same good fortune.

Forty years ago this smiling country was thus inhabited, it is now purged, a general decency of manners prevails throughout, and such has been the fate of our best countries

Exclusive of those general characteristics, each province has its own, founded on the government, climate, mode of husbandry, customs, and peculiarity of circumstances. Europeans submit insensibly to these great powers, and become, in the course of a few generations, not only Americans in general, but either Pennsylvanians, Virginians, or provincials under some other name. Whoever traverses the continent must easily observe those strong differences, which will grow more evident in time. The inhabitants of Canada, Massachusetts, the middle provinces, the southern ones will be as different as their climates, their only points of unity will be those of religion and language.

As I have endeavored to show you how Europeans become Americans, it may not be disagreeable to show you likewise how the various Christian sects introduced, wear out, and how religious indifference becomes prevalent. When any considerable number of a particular sect happen to dwell contiguous to each other, they immediately erect a temple, and there worship the Divinity agreeably to their own peculiar ideas. Nobody disturbs them. If any new sect springs up in Europe it may happen that many of its professors will come and settle in America. As they bring their zeal with them, they are at liberty to make proselytes if they can, and to build a meeting and to follow the dictates of their consciences, for neither the government nor any other power interferes. If they are peaceable subjects, and are industrious, what is it to their neighbors how and in what manner they think fit to address their prayers to the Supreme Being? But if the sectaries are not settled close together, if they are mixed with other denominations, their zeal will cool for want of fuel, and will be extinguished in a little time. Then the Americans become as to religion, what they are as to country, allied to all In them the name of Englishman, Frenchman, and European is lost, and in like manner, the strict modes of Christianity as practised in Europe are lost also This effect will extend itself still farther hereafter, and though this may appear to you as a strange idea, yet it is a very true one I shall be able perhaps hereafter to explain myself better, in the meanwhile, let the following example serve as my first justification

Let us suppose you and I to be travelling, we observe that in this house, to the right, lives a Catholic, who prays to God as he has been taught, and believes in transubstantiation, he works and raises wheat, he has a large family of children, all hale and robust, his belief, his prayers offend nobody About one mile farther on the same road, his next neighbor may be a good honest plodding German Lutheran, who addresses himself to the same God, the God of all, agreeably to the modes he has been educated in, and believes in consubstantiation, by so doing he scandalizes nobody, he also works in his fields, embellishes the earth, clears swamps, etc What has the world to do with his Lutheran principles? He persecutes nobody, and nobody persecutes him, he visits his neighbors, and his neighbors visit him Next to him lives a seceder, the most enthusiastic of all sectaries, his zeal is hot and fiery, but separated as he is from others of the same complexion, he has no congregation of his own to resort to, where he might cabal and mingle religious pride with worldly obstinacy He likewise raises good crops, his house is handsomely painted, his orchard is one of the fairest in the neighborhood How does it concern the welfare of the country, or of the province at large, what this man's religious sentiments are, or really whether he has any at all? He is a good farmer, he is a sober, peaceable, good citizen William Penn himself would not wish for more This is the visible character, the invisible one is only guessed at, and is nobody's business. Next again lives a Low Dutchman, who implicitly believes the rules laid down by the synod of Dort He conceives no other idea of a clergyman than that of an hired man, if he does his work well he will pay him the stipulated sum, if not he will dismiss him, and do without his sermons, and let his church be shut up for years. But notwithstanding this coarse idea, you will find his house and farm to be the neatest in all the country, and you will judge by his wagon and fat horses, that he thinks more of the affairs of this world than of those of the next He is sober and laborious, therefore he is all he ought to be as to the affairs of this life, as for those of the next, he must trust to the great Creator. Each of these people instruct their children as well as they can, but these instructions are feeble compared to those which are given to the youth of the poorest class in Europe Their children will therefore grow up less zealous and more indifferent in matters of religion than their parents The foolish vanity, or rather the fury of making proselytes, is unknown here, they have no time, the seasons call for all their attention, and thus in a few years, this mixed neighborhood will exhibit a strange religious medley, that will be neither pure Catholicism nor pure Calvinism A very perceptible indifference even in the first generation, will become apparent, and it may happen that the daughter of the Catholic will marry the son of the seceder, and settle by themselves at a distance from their parents What religious education will they give their children? A very imperfect one If there happens to be in the neighborhood any place of worship, we will suppose a Quaker's meeting, rather than not show their fine clothes, they will go to it, and some of them may perhaps attach themselves to that society Others will remain in a perfect state of indifference, the children of these zealous parents will not be able to tell what their religious principles are, and their grandchildren still less The neighborhood of a place of worship generally leads them to it, and the action of going thither, is the strongest evidence they can give of their attachment to any sect The Quakers are the only people who retain a fondness for their own mode of worship, for be they ever so far separated from each other, they hold a sort of communion with the society, and seldom depart from its rules, at least in this country Thus all sects are mixed as well as all nations, thus religious indifference is imperceptibly disseminated from one end of the continent to the other, which is at present one of the strongest characteristics of the Americans

Where this will reach no one can tell, perhaps it may leave a vacuum fit to receive other systems. Persecution, religious pride, the love of contradiction, are the food of what the world commonly calls religion. These motives have ceased here, zeal in Europe is confined, here it evaporates in the great distance it has to travel, there it is a grain of powder inclosed, here it burns away in the open air, and consumes without effect

But to return to our back settlers. I must tell you, that there is something in the proximity of the woods, which is very singular. It is with men as it is with the plants and animals that grow and live in the forests, they are entirely different from those that live in the plains. I will candidly tell you all my thoughts but you are not to expect that I shall advance any reasons. By living in or near the woods, their actions are regulated by the wildness of the neighborhood. The deer often come to eat their grain, the wolves to destroy their sheep, the bears to kill their hogs, the foxes to catch their poultry. This surrounding hostility immediately puts the gun into their hands, they watch these animals, they kill some, and thus by defending their property, they soon become professed hunters, this is the progress, once hunters, farewell to the plough. The chase renders them ferocious, gloomy, and unsociable, a hunter wants no neighbor, he rather hates them, because he dreads the competition. In a little time their success in the woods makes them neglect their tillage. They trust to the natural fecundity of the earth, and therefore do little, carelessness in fencing often exposes what little they sow to destruction, they are not at home to watch, in order therefore to make up the deficiency, they go oftener to the woods. That new mode of life brings along with it a new set of manners, which I cannot easily describe. These new manners being grafted on the old stock, produce a strange sort of lawless profligacy, the impressions of which are indelible. The manners of the Indian natives are respectable, compared with this European medley. Their wives and children live in sloth and inactivity, and having no proper pursuits, you may judge what education the latter receive. Their tender minds have nothing else to contemplate but the example of their parents; like them they grow up a mongrel breed, half civilized, half savage, except nature stamps on them some constitutional propensities. That rich, that voluptuous sentiment is gone that struck them so forcibly, the possession of their freeholds no longer conveys to their minds the same pleasure and pride. To all these reasons you must add, their lonely situation, and you cannot imagine what an effect on manners the great distances they live from each other has! Consider one of the last settlements in its first view of what is it composed? Europeans who have not that sufficient share of knowledge they ought to have, in order to prosper, people who have suddenly passed from oppression, dread of government, and fear of laws, into the unlimited freedom of the woods. This sudden change must have a very great effect on most men, and on that class particularly. Eating of wild meat, whatever you may think, tends to alter their temper though all the proof I can adduce, is, that I have seen it and having no place of worship to resort to, what little society this might afford is denied them. The Sunday meetings, exclusive of religious benefits, were the only social bonds that might have inspired them with some degree of emulation in neatness. Is it then surprising to see men thus situated, immersed in great and heavy labors, degenerate a little? It is rather a wonder the effect is not more diffusive. The Moravians and the Quakers are the only instances in exception to what I have advanced. The first never settle singly, it is a colony of the society which emigrates, they carry with them their forms, worship, rules, and decency the others never begin so hard, they are always able to buy improvements, in which there is a great advantage, for by that time the country is recovered from its first barbarity. Thus our bad people are those who are half cultivators and half hunters, and the worst of them are those who have degenerated altogether into the hunting state. As old ploughmen and new men of the woods, as Europeans and new made Indians, they contract the vices of both, they adopt the moroseness and ferocity of a native, without his mildness, or even his industry at home. If manners are not refined, at least they are rendered simple and inoffensive by tilling the earth, all our wants are supplied by it, our time is divided between labor and rest, and leaves none for the commission of great misdeeds. As hunters it is divided between the toil of the chase, the idleness of repose, or the indulgence of inebriation. Hunting is but a licentious idle life, and if it does not always pervert good dispositions, yet, when it is united with bad luck, it leads to want want stimulates that propensity to rapacity and injustice, too natural to needy men, which is the fatal gradation. After this explanation of the effects which follow by living in the woods, shall we yet vainly flatter ourselves with the hope of converting the Indians? We should rather begin with converting our back-settlers, and now if I dare mention the name of religion, its sweet accents would be lost in the immensity of these woods. Men thus placed, are not fit either to receive or remember its mild instructions, they want temples and ministers, but as soon as men cease to remain at home, and begin to lead an erratic life, let them be either tawny or white, they cease to be its disciples.

Thus have I faintly and imperfectly endeavored to trace our society from the sea to our woods! yet you must not imagine that every person who moves back, acts upon the same principles, or falls into the same degeneracy. Many families carry with them all their decency of conduct, purity of morals, and respect of religion, but these are scarce, the power of example is sometimes irresistible. Even among these back-settlers, their depravity is greater or less, according to what nation or province they belong. Were I to adduce proofs of this, I might be accused of partiality. If there happens to be some rich intervals, some fertile bottoms, in those remote districts, the people will there prefer tilling the land to hunting, and will attach themselves to it, but even on these fertile spots you may plainly perceive the inhabitants to acquire a great degree of rusticity and selfishness.

It is in consequence of this straggling situation, and the astonishing power it has on manners, that the back-settlers of both the Carolinas, Virginia, and many other parts, have been long a set of lawless people, it has been even dangerous to travel among them. Government can do nothing in so extensive a country, better it should wink at these irregularities, than that it should use means inconsistent with its usual mildness. Time will efface those stains in proportion as the great body of population approaches them they will reform, and become polished and subordinate. Whatever has been said of the four New England provinces, no such degeneracy of manners has ever tarnished their annals, their back-settlers have been kept within the bounds of decency, and government, by means of wise laws, and by the influence of religion. What a detestable idea such people must have given to the natives of the Europeans! They trade with them, the worst of people are permitted to do that which none but persons of the best characters should be employed in. They get drunk with them, and often defraud the Indians. Their avarice, removed from the eyes of their superiors, knows no bounds, and aided by a little superiority of knowledge, these traders deceive them, and even sometimes shed blood. Hence those shocking violations, those sudden devastations which have so often stained our frontiers, when hundreds of innocent people have been sacrificed for the crimes of a few. It was in consequence of such behavior, that the Indians took the hatchet against the Virginians in 1774. Thus are our first steps trod, thus are our first trees felled, in general, by the most vicious of our people, and thus the path is opened for the arrival of a second and better class, the true American freeholders, the most respectable set of people in this part of the world. Respectable for their industry, their happy independence, the great share of freedom they possess, the good regulation of their families, and for extending the trade and the dominion of our mother country.

Europe contains hardly any other distinctions but lords and tenants, this fair country alone is settled by freeholders, the possessors of the soil they cultivate, members of the government they obey, and the framers of their own laws, by means of their representatives. This is a thought which you have taught me to cherish, our difference from Europe, far from diminishing, rather adds to our usefulness and consequence as men and subjects. Had our forefathers remained there, they would only have crowded it, and perhaps prolonged those convulsions which had shook it so long Every industrious European who transports himself here, may be compared to a sprout growing at the foot of a great tree, it enjoys and draws but a little portion of sap, wrench it from the parent roots, transplant it, and it will become a tree bearing fruit also Colonists are therefore entitled to the consideration due to the most useful subjects, a hundred families barely existing in some parts of Scotland, will here in six years, cause an annual exportation of 10,000 bushels of wheat 100 bushels being but a common quantity for an industrious family to sell, if they cultivate good land It is here then that the idle may be employed, the useless become useful, and the poor become rich, but by riches I do not mean gold and silver, we have but little of those metals, I mean a better sort of wealth, cleared lands, cattle, good houses, good clothes, and an increase of people to enjoy them

There is no wonder that this country has so many charms, and presents to Europeans so many temptations to remain in it A traveller in Europe becomes a stranger as soon as he quits his own kingdom, but it is otherwise here We know, properly speaking, no strangers, this is every person's country, the variety of our soils, situations, climates, governments, and produce, hath something which must please everybody No sooner does an European arrive, no matter of what condition, than his eyes are opened upon the fair prospect, he hears his language spoke, he retraces many of his own country manners, he perpetually hears the names of families and towns with which he is acquainted, he sees happiness and prosperity in all places disseminated, he meets with hospitality, kindness, and plenty every where, he beholds hardly any poor, he seldom hears of punishments and executions, and he wonders at the elegance of our towns, those miracles of industry and freedom He cannot admire enough our rural districts, our convenient roads, good taverns, and our many accommodations, he involuntarily loves a country where everything is so lovely When in England, he was a mere Englishman, here he stands on a larger portion of the globe, not less than its fourth part, and may see the productions of the north, in iron and naval stores, the provisions of Ireland, the grain of Egypt, the indigo, the rice of China He does not find, as in Europe, a crowded society, where every place is over-stocked, he does not feel that perpetual collision of parties, that difficulty of beginning, that contention which oversets so many There is room for everybody in America, has he any particular talent, or industry? he exerts it in order to procure a livelihood, and it succeeds Is he a merchant? the avenues of trade are infinite, is he eminent in any respect? he will be employed and respected Does he love a country life? pleasant farms present themselves, he may purchase what he wants, and thereby become an American farmer Is he a laborer, sober and industrious? he need not go many miles, nor receive many informations before he will be hired, well fed at the table of his employer, and paid four or five times more than he can get in Europe Does he want uncultivated lands? thousands of acres present themselves, which he may purchase cheap Whatever be his talents or inclinations, if they are moderate, he may satisfy them I do not mean that every one who comes will grow rich in a little time, no, but he may procure an easy, decent maintenance, by his industry Instead of starving he will be fed, instead of being idle he will have employment, and these are riches enough for such men as come over here The rich stay in Europe, it is only the middling and the poor that emigrate Would you wish to travel in independent idleness, from north to south, you will find easy access, and the most cheerful reception at every house, society without ostentation, good cheer without pride, and every decent diversion which the country affords, with little expense. It is no wonder that the European who has lived here a few years, is desirous to remain, Europe with all its pomp, is not to be compared to this continent, for men of muddle stations, or laborers

An European, when he first arrives, seems limited in his intentions, as well as in his views, but he very suddenly alters his scale, two hundred miles formerly appeared a very great distance, it is now but a trifle, he no sooner breathes our air than he forms schemes, and embarks in designs he never would have thought of in his own country There the plenitude of society confines many useful ideas, and often extingushes the most laudable schemes which here ripen into maturity Thus Europeans become Americans

But how is this accomplished in that crowd of low, indigent people, who flock here every year from all parts of Europe? I will tell you, they no sooner arrive than they immediately feel the good effects of that plenty of provisions we possess they fare on our best food, and they are kindly entertained, their talents, character, and peculiar industry are immediately inquired into, they find countrymen everywhere disseminated, let them come from whatever part of Europe Let me select one as an epitome of the rest, he is hired, he goes to work, and works moderately, instead of being employed by a haughty person, he finds himself with his equal, placed at the substantial table of the farmer, or else at an inferior one as good, his wages are high, his bed is not like that bed of sorrow on which he used to lie if he behaves with propriety, and is faithful, he is caressed, and becomes as it were a member of the family He begins to feel the effects of a sort of resurrection, hitherto he had not lived, but simply vegetated, he now feels himself a man, because he is treated as such, the laws of his own country had overlooked him in his insignificance, the laws of this cover him with their mantle Judge what an alteration there must arise in the mind and thoughts of this man, he begins to forget his former servitude and dependence, his heart involuntarily swells and glows, this first swell inspires him with those new thoughts which constitute an American What love can he entertain for a country where his existence was a burden to him, if he is a generous good man, the love of this new adoptive parent will sink deep into his heart He looks around, and sees many a prosperous person, who but a few years before was as poor as himself This encourages him much, he begins to form some little scheme, the first, alas, he ever formed in his life If he is wise he thus spends two or three years, in which time he acquires knowledge, the use of tools, the modes of working the lands, felling trees, etc This prepares the foundation of a good name, the most useful acquisition he can make He is encouraged, he has gained friends, he is advised and directed, he feels bold, he purchases some land; he gives all the money he has brought over, as well as what he has earned, and trusts to the God of harvests for the discharge of the rest His good name procures him credit He is now possessed of the deed, conveying to him and his posterity the fee simple and absolute property of two hundred acres of land, situated on such a river What an epoch in this man's life! He is become a freeholder, from perhaps a German boor—he is now an American, a Pennsylvanian, an English subject He is naturalized, his name is enrolled with those of the other citizens of the province Instead of being a vagrant, he has a place of residence, he is called the inhabitant of such a county, or of such a district, and for the first time in his life counts for something, for hitherto he has been a cypher I only repeat what I have heard many say, and no wonder their hearts should glow, and be agitated with a multitude of feelings, not easy to describe From nothing to start into being, from a servant to the rank of a master, from being the slave of some despotic prince, to become a free man, invested with lands, to which every municipal blessing is annexed! What a change indeed! It is in consequence of that change that he becomes an American This great metamorphosis has a double effect, it extinguishes all his European prejudices, he forgets that mechanism of subordination, that servility of disposition which poverty had taught him, and sometimes he is apt to forget too much, often passing from one extreme to the other If he is a good man, he forms schemes of future prosperity, he proposes to educate his children better than he has been educated himself, he thinks of future modes of conduct, feels an ardor to labor he never felt before Pride steps in and leads him to everything that the laws do not forbid he respects them, with a heartfelt gratitude he looks toward the east, toward that insular government from whose wisdom all his new felicity is derived, and under whose wings and protection he now lives These reflections constitute him the good man and the good subject. Ye poor Europeans, ye, who sweat, and work for the great—ye, who are obliged to give so many sheaves to the church, so many to your lords, so many to your government, and have hardly any left for yourselves—ye, who are held in less estimation than favorite hunters or useless lap-dogs—ye, who only breathe the air of nature, because it cannot be withheld from you, it is here that ye can conceive the possibility of those feelings I have been describing, it is here the laws of naturalization invite every one to partake of our great labors and felicity, to till unrented, untaxed lands! Many, corrupted beyond the power of amendment, have brought with them all their vices, and disregarding the advantages held to them, have gone on in their former career of iniquity, until they have been overtaken and punished by our laws. It is not every emigrant who succeeds, no, it is only the sober, the honest, and industrious happy those to whom this transition has served as a powerful spur to labor, to prosperity, and to the good establishment of children, born in the days of their poverty, and who had no other portion to expect but the rags of their parents, had it not been for their happy emigration. Others again, have been led astray by this enchanting scene, their new pride, instead of leading them to the fields, has kept them in idleness, the idea of possessing lands is all that satisfies them—though surrounded with fertility, they have mouldered away their time in inactivity, misinformed husbandry, and ineffectual endeavors. How much wiser, in general, the honest Germans than almost all other Europeans, they hire themselves to some of their wealthy landmen, and in that apprenticeship learn everything that is necessary. They attentively consider the prosperous industry of others, which imprints in their minds a strong desire of possessing the same advantages. This forcible idea never quits them, they launch forth, and by dint of sobriety, rigid parsimony, and the most persevering industry, they commonly succeed. Their astonishment at their first arrival from Germany is very great—it is to them a dream, the contrast must be powerful indeed, they observe their countrymen flourishing in every place, they travel through whole counties where not a word of English is spoken, and in the names and the language of the people, they retrace Germany. They have been an useful acquisition to this continent, and to Pennsylvania in particular, to them it owes some share of its prosperity. to their mechanical knowledge and patience it owes the finest mulls in all America, the best teams of horses, and many other advantages. The recollection of their former poverty and slavery never quits them as long as they live.

The Scotch and the Irish might have lived in their own country perhaps as poor, but enjoying more civil advantages, the effects of their new situation do not strike them so forcibly, nor has it so lasting an effect. From whence the difference arises I know not, but out of twelve families of emigrants of each country, generally seven Scotch will succeed, nine German, and four Irish. The Scotch are frugal and laborious, but their wives cannot work so hard as German women, who on the contrary vie with their husbands, and often share with them the most severe toils of the field, which they understand better. They have therefore nothing to struggle against, but the common casualties of nature. The Irish do not prosper so well, they love to drink and to quarrel, they are litigious, and soon take to the gun, which is the ruin of everything, they seem beside to labor under a greater degree of ignorance in husbandry than the others, perhaps it is that their industry had less scope, and was less exercised at home. I have heard many relate, how the land was parcelled out in that kingdom, their ancient conquest has been a great detriment to them, by over-setting their landed property. The lands possessed by a few, are leased down ad infinitum, and the occupiers often pay five guineas an acre. The poor are worse lodged there than anywhere else in Europe, their potatoes, which are easily raised, are perhaps an inducement to laziness: their wages are too low, and their whisky too cheap.

There is no tracing observations of this kind, without making at the same time very great allowances, as there are everywhere to be found, a great many exceptions. The Irish themselves, from different parts of that kingdom, are very different. It is difficult to account for this surprising locality, one would think on so small an island an Irishman must be an Irishman. yet it is not so, they are different in their aptitude to, and in their love of labor.

The Scotch on the contrary are all industrious and saving, they want nothing more than a field to exert themselves in, and they are commonly sure of succeeding. The only difficulty they labor under is, that technical American knowledge which requires some time to obtain, it is not easy for those who seldom saw a tree, to conceive how it is to be felled, cut up, and split into rails and posts.

As I am fond of seeing and talking of prosperous families, I intend to finish this letter by relating to you the history of an honest Scotch Hebridean, who came here in 1774, which will show you in epitome what the Scotch can do, wherever they have room for the exertion of their industry. Whenever I hear of any new settlement, I pay it a visit once or twice a year, on purpose to observe the different steps each settler takes, the gradual improvements, the different tempers of each family, on which their prosperity in a great nature depends, their different modifications of industry, their ingenuity, and contrivance, for being all poor, their life requires sagacity and prudence. In the evening I love to hear them tell their stories, they furnish me with new ideas, I sit still and listen to their ancient misfortunes, observing in many of them a strong degree of gratitude to God, and the government. Many a well meant sermon have I preached to some of them. When I found laziness and inattention to prevail, who could refrain from wishing well to these new countrymen, after having undergone so many fatigues. Who could withhold good advice? What a happy change it must be, to descend from the high, sterile, bleak lands of Scotland, where everything is barren and cold, to rest on some fertile farms in these middle provinces! Such a transition must have afforded the most pleasing satisfaction.

The following dialogue passed at an out-settlement, where I lately paid a visit.

Well, friend, how do you do now, I am come fifty odd miles on purpose to see you, how do you go on with your new cutting and slashing? Very well, good Sir, we learn the use of the axe bravely, we shall make it out, we have a belly full of victuals every day, our cows run about, and come home full of milk, our hogs get fat of themselves in the woods. Oh, this is a good country! God bless the king, and William Penn, we shall do very well by and by, if we keep our healths. Your log-house looks neat and light, where did you get these shingles? One of our neighbors is a New-England man, and he showed us how to split them out of chestnut-trees. Now for a barn, but all in good time, here are fine trees to build with. Who is to frame it, sure you don't understand that work yet? A countryman of ours who has been in America these ten years, offers to wait for his money until the second crop is lodged in it. What did you give for your land? Thirty-five shillings per acre, payable in seven years. How many acres have you got? An hundred and fifty. That is enough to begin with, is not your land pretty hard to clear? Yes, Sir, hard enough, but it would be harder still if it was ready cleared, for then we should have no timber, and I love the woods much, the land is nothing without them. Have not you found out any bees yet? No, Sir, and if we had we should not know what to do with them. I will tell you by and by. You are very kind. Farewell, honest man, God prosper you, whenever you travel toward —, inquire for J S. He will entertain you kindly, provided you bring him good tidings from your family and farm. In this manner I often visit them, and carefully examine their houses, their modes of ingenuity, their different ways, and make them all relate all they know, and describe all they feel. These are scenes which I believe you would willingly share with me. I well remember your philanthropic turn of mind. Is it not better to contemplate under these humble roofs, the rudiments of future wealth and population, than to behold the accumulated bundles of litigious papers in the office of a lawyer? To examine how the world is gradually settled, how the howling swamp is converted into a pleasing meadow, the rough ridge into a fine field, and to hear the cheerful whistling, the rural song, where there was no sound heard before, save the yell of the savage, the screech of the owl, or the hissing of the snake? Here an European, fatigued with luxury, riches, and pleasures, may find a sweet relaxation in a series of interesting scenes, as affecting as they are new. England, which now contains so many domes, so many castles, was once like this, a place woody and marshy, its inhabitants, now the favorite nation for arts and commerce, were once painted like our neighbors. The country will flourish in its turn, and the same observations will be made which I have just delineated. Posterity will look back with avidity and pleasure, to trace, if possible, the era of this or that particular settlement.

Pray, what is the reason that the Scots are in general more religious, more faithful, more honest, and industrious than the Irish? I do not mean to insinuate national reflections, God forbid! It ill becomes any man, and much less an American, but as I know men are nothing of themselves, and that they owe all their different modifications either to government or other local circumstances, there must be some powerful causes which constitute this great national difference.

Agreeable to the account which several Scotchmen have given me of the north of Britain, of the Orkneys, and the Hebride Islands, they seem, on many accounts, to be unfit for the habitation of men, they appear to be calculated only for great sheep pastures. Who then can blame the inhabitants of these countries for transporting themselves hither? This great continent must in time absorb the poorest part of Europe, and this will happen in proportion as it becomes better known, and as war, taxation, oppression, and misery increase there. The Hebrides appear to be fit only for the residence of malefactors, and it would be much better to send felons there than either to Virginia or Maryland. What a strange compliment has our mother country paid to two of the finest provinces in America! England has entertained in that respect very mistaken ideas, what was intended as a punishment, is become the good fortune of several, many of those who have been transported as felons, are now rich, and strangers to the stings of those wants that urged them to violations of the law: they are become industrious, exemplary, and useful citizens. The English government should purchase the most northern and barren of those islands, it should send over to us the honest, primitive Hebrideans, settle them here on good lands, as a reward for their virtue and ancient poverty, and replace them with a colony of her wicked sons. The severity of the climate, the inclemency of the seasons, the sterility of the soil, the tempestuousness of the sea, would afflict and punish enough. Could there be found a spot better adapted to retaliate the injury it had received by their crimes? Some of those islands might be considered as the hell of Great Britain, where all evil spirits should be sent. Two essential ends would be answered by this simple operation. The good people, by emigration, would be rendered happier, the bad ones would be placed where they ought to be. In a few years the dread of being sent to that wintry region would have a much stronger effect than that of transportation—This is no place of punishment, were I a poor hopeless, breadless Englishman, and not restrained by the power of shame, I should be very thankful for the passage. It is of very little importance how, and in what manner an indigent man arrives, for if he is but sober, honest, and industrious, he has nothing more to ask of heaven. Let him go to work, he will have opportunities enough to earn a comfortable support, and even the means of procuring some land, which ought to be the utmost wish of every person who has health and hands to work. I knew a man who came to this country, in the literal sense of the expression, stark naked, I think he was a Frenchman, and a sailor on board an English man-of-war. Being discontented, he had stripped himself and swam ashore, where, finding clothes and friends, he settled afterwards at Maranek, in the county of Chester, in the province of New York: he married and left a good farm to each of his sons. I knew another person who was but twelve years old when he was taken on the frontiers of Canada, by the Indians, at his arrival at Albany he was purchased by a gentleman, who generously bound him apprentice to a tailor. He lived to the age of ninety, and left behind him a fine estate and a numerous family, all well settled, many of them I am acquainted with—Where is then the industrious European who ought to despair?

After a foreigner from any part of Europe is arrived, and become a citizen, let him devoutly listen to the voice of our great parent, which says to him, 'Welcome to my shores, distressed European, bless the hour in which thou didst see my verdant fields, my fair navigable rivers, and my green mountains!—If thou wilt work, I have bread for thee, if thou wilt be honest, sober, and industrious, I have greater rewards to confer on thee—ease and independence I will give thee fields to feed and clothe thee, a comfortable fireside to sit by, and tell thy children by what means thou hast prospered, and a decent bed to repose on I shall endow thee beside with the immunities of a freeman If thou wilt carefully educate thy children, teach them gratitude to God, and reverence to that government, that philanthropic government, which has collected here so many men and made them happy I will also provide for thy progeny; and to every good man this ought to be the most holy, the most powerful, the most earnest wish he can possibly form, as well as the most consolatory prospect when he dies Go thou and work and till, thou shalt prosper, provided thou be just, grateful, and industrious'

FROM THE HISTORY OF THE COLONY AND PROVINCE OF MASSACHUSETTS-BAYA STAMP-ACT RIOT<sup>1</sup>

THERE appeared to be a general determination among the people to prevent the execution of the stamp act, if possible, but there did not appear to be any plan concerted Most people of judgment thought that it would force its way, but it did not

The first act of any of the assemblies against the authority of the act of parliament was in Virginia These resolves were expressed in such terms that many people, upon the first surprise, pronounced them treasonable<sup>2</sup> But the astonishment was of no long duration The newspapers soon vindicated the resolves From having been censured, the spirit discovered in them was applauded as worthy of imitation; and the declaration in them, that all who maintained the right of parliament should be deemed enemies to the colony, had a tendency to bring on those acts of violence which soon after were committed in Boston

The distributor of stamps for the colony

of Connecticut<sup>3</sup> arrived in Boston from London, and, having been agent for that colony, and in other respects of a very reputable character, received from many gentlemen of the town such civilities as were due to him When he set out for Connecticut, Mr Oliver, the distributor for Massachusetts Bay, accompanied him out of town This occasioned murmuring among the people, and an inflammatory piece in the next Boston Gazette A few days after, early in the morning, a stuffed image was hung upon a tree, called the great tree of the south part of Boston Labels affixed denoted it to be designed for the distributor of stamps People, who were passing by, stopped to view it, and the report caused others to gather from all quarters of the town, and many from the towns adjacent The governor caused the council to be convened Before they came to any determination, the sheriff, with his deputies, had been to the place, but, by advice of some of the graver persons present, forbore any attempt to remove the image The majority of the council, but not the whole, advised not to meddle with it, and urged as a reason that the people were orderly, and, if left alone, would take down the image and bury it without any disturbance, but an attempt to remove it would bring on a riot, the mischief designed to be prevented

The governor, however, thought fit to meet the council again in the afternoon. Before night, the image was taken down and carried through the townhouse, in the chamber whereof the governor and council were sitting. Forty or fifty tradesmen, decently dressed, preceded, and some thousands of the mob followed down King Street to Oliver's dock, near which Mr. Oliver had lately erected a building which, it was conjectured, he designed for a stamp office. This was laid flat to the ground in a few minutes. From thence the mob proceeded for Fort Hill, but Mr. Oliver's house being in the way, they endeavored to force themselves into it, and being opposed, broke the windows, beat down the doors, entered, and destroyed part of his furniture, and continued in riot until midnight, before they separated.

The next day, the governor, by advice of council, issued a proclamation, offering a reward for discovering offenders, &c. Many of the offenders were known, and the proclamation was considered as a mere matter of form. Some of the council advised to a military watch in the town the next night, but a majority were against it and thought it enough to recommend to the select men and justices to increase the number of the ordinary town watch, but even this was not done. Several of the council gave it as their opinion, Mr. Oliver being present, that the people, not only of the town of Boston, but of the country in general, would never submit to the execution of the stamp act, let the consequence of an opposition to it be what it would. It was also reported that the people of Connecticut had threatened to hang their distributor on the first tree after he entered the colony, and that, to avoid it, he had turned aside to Rhode Island.

Despairing of protection, and finding his family in terror and great distress, Mr. Oliver came to a sudden resolution to resign his office before another night, and immediately signified, by a writing under his hand, to one of his friends that he would send letters, by a ship then ready to sail for London, which should contain such resignation, and he desired that the town might be made acquainted with it and with the strong assurances he had given that he would never act in that capacity.

This victory was matter of triumph. The mob assembled in the evening, not to insult the distributor, but to give him thanks and to make a bonfire upon the hill near his house.

It was hoped that the people, having obtained all that they desired, would return to order, but, having repeatedly assembled with impunity, a very small pretence served to induce them to re-assemble.

The next evening, the mob surrounded the house of the lieutenant-governor and chief-justice [Thomas Hutchinson]. He was at Mr. Oliver's house when it was assaulted, and had excited the sheriff and the colonel of the regiment to attempt to suppress the mob. A report was soon spread that he was a favorer of the stamp act and had encouraged it by letters to the ministry. Upon notice of the approach of the people, he caused the doors and windows to be barred, and remained in the house. After attempting to enter, they called upon him to come into the balcony and to declare that he had not written in favor of the act, and they would retire quite satisfied. This was an indignity to which he would not submit, and, therefore, he made no answer. An ancient reputable tradesman obtained their attention, and endeavored to persuade them, not only of the unwarrantableness of their proceedings, but of the groundlessness of their suspicions of the lieutenant-governor, who might well enough wish the act of parliament had not passed, though he disapproved of the violent opposition to its execution. Some were for withdrawing, and others for continuing, when one of the neighbors called to them from his window and affirmed, that he saw the lieutenant-governor in his carriage, just before night, and that he was gone to lodge at his house in the country. Upon this, they dispersed, with only breaking some of the glass.

These attacks upon two of the principal officers of the crown struck terror into people of inferior rank, and though they saw the danger from this assumed power in the populace, yet they would give no aid in discountenancing it, lest they should become obnoxious themselves, for there were whisperings of danger from further acts of violence. On Sunday the 25th of August, a sermon was preached, in what was called the West meeting-house, from these words, 'I would they were even cut off which trouble you'<sup>1</sup> The text alone, without a comment,<sup>2</sup> delivered from the pulpit at that time, might be construed by some of the auditory into an approbation of the prevailing irregularities One, who had a chief hand in the outrages which soon followed, declared, when he was in prison, that he was excited to them by this sermon,<sup>3</sup> and that he thought he was doing God service

Certain depositions had been taken, many months before these transactions, by order of the governor, concerning the illicit trade carrying on, and one of them, made by the judge of the admiralty, at the special desire of the governor, had been sworn to before the lieutenant-governor, as chief-justice They had been shown, at one of the offices in England, to a person who arrived in Boston just at this time, and he had acquainted several merchants, whose names were in some of the depositions as smugglers, with the contents This brought, though without reason, the resentment of the merchants against the persons who, by their office, were obliged to administer the oaths, as well as against the officers of the customs and admiralty, who had made the depositions, and the leaders of the mob contrived a riot, which, after some small efforts against such officers, was to spend its principal force upon the lieutenant-governor And, in the evening of the 26th of August [1765], such a mob was collected in King Street, drawn there by a bonfire, and well supplied with strong drink After some annoyance to the house of the registrar of the admiralty, and somewhat greater to that of the comptroller of the customs, whose cellars they plundered of the wine and spirits in them, they came, with intoxicated rage, upon the house of the lieutenant-governor The doors were immediately split to pieces with broad axes, and a way made there, and at the windows, for the entry of the mob, which poured in, and filled, in an instant, every room in the house

The lieutenant-governor had very short notice of the approach of the mob He directed his children, and the rest of his family, to leave the house immediately, determining to keep possession himself His eldest daughter, after going a little way from the house, returned, and refused to quit it, unless her father would do the like

This caused him to depart from his resolution, a few minutes before the mob entered They continued their possession until daylight, destroyed, carried away, or cast into the street, everything that was in the house, demolished every part of it, except the walls, as far as lay in their power, and had begun to break away the brickwork

The damage was estimated at about twenty-five hundred pounds sterling, without any regard to a great collection of publick as well as private papers, in the possession and custody of the lieutenant-governor<sup>4</sup>

The town was, the whole night, under the awe of this mob, many of the magistrates, with the field officers of the militia, standing by as spectators, and nobody daring to oppose, or contradict<sup>5</sup>

4 'The loss which I sustained, as far as it was repairable, by his Majesty's most gracious recommendation to the province and their generous grant in consequence of it, both which, in this public manner, I most gratefully acknowledge, has been repaired or compensated, but the loss of many papers and books, in print as well as manuscript, besides my family memorials, never can be repaired

'For several days, I had no hopes of recovering any considerable part of my history, but by the great care and pains of my good friend and neighbor the Reverend Mr Eliot, who received into his house all my books and papers which were saved, the whole manuscript except eight or ten sheets, were collected together and, although it had lain in the street scattered abroad several hours in the rain, yet so much of it was legible as that I was able to supply the rest and transcribe it The most valuable materials were lost, some of which I designed to have published in the appendix I pray God to forgive the actors in and advisors to this most savage and inhuman injury, and I hope their posterity will read with pleasure and profit what has so narrowly escaped the outrage of their ancestors' From author's preface, ibid, II, 2

5 'The lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, observing two men disguised, with long staves in their hands, who seemed to be directors, expressed his concern at the damage other people, besides the lieutenant-

1 'Galatians 5th and 12th' Author's note, ibid, III, 89

2 'The verse which follows, "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty, only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh," if properly enforced, would have been sufficient to have kept the people within bounds' Author's note, idem

3 'Dr Mayhew, the preacher, in a letter to the lieutenant-governor, a few days after, expressed the greatest concern, nothing being further from his thoughts than such an effect, and declared, that, if the loss of his whole estate could recall the sermon, he would willingly part with it' Author's note, idem

The governor was at the Castle, and knew nothing of what had happened until the next morning. He then went to town, and caused a council to be summoned. Before they could meet, the inhabitants of Boston assembled in Faneuil Hall, and, in as full a meeting as had been known, by an unanimous vote, declared an utter detestation of the extraordinary and violent proceeding of a number of persons unknown, against some of the inhabitants of the town, the preceding night, and desired the select men, and magistrates of the town, to use their utmost endeavors to suppress the like disorders for the future, the freeholders, and other inhabitants, being ready to do everything in their power to assist them. It could not be doubted, that many of those who were immediate actors in, as well as of those who had been abettors of those violent proceedings, were present at this unanimous vote.

The council advised a proclamation, with promise of £300 reward for discovering the leader or leaders, and £100 for every other person. Information had been before given to the justices of peace in the town, and warrants had been issued and delivered to the sheriff for apprehending several persons. One of them, a tradesman of the town, whose name was Mackintosh, was soon taken in King Street, but the sheriff was immediately surrounded by a number of merchants, and other persons of property and character, who assured him, that, if he apprehended Mackintosh, not a man would appear in arms, as had been proposed, for the security of the town the next night. The sheriff released him, and made return of his doings to the governor, then in council. Some of the council gave their opinion, that the sheriff was inexcusable, but it passed over without any act of council to show a disapprobation. To this feeble state were the powers of government reduced.<sup>1</sup>

Six or eight other persons were apprehended, and, upon examination, committed to prison in order to trial, and were generally considered as capital offenders. Before the time of trial, a considerable number of people entered the house of the prison-keeper late in the evening, compelled him, by threats, to deliver to them the keys of the prison, which they opened, and then set the prisoners at liberty, and all this without any tumult. The prisoners thought fit to disappear for some months, but there was no authority, which considered it advisable to make any inquiry after them.

FROM COMMON SENSE

THOUGHTS ON THE PRESENT STATE OF AMERICAN AFFAIRS<sup>2</sup>

In the following pages I offer nothing more than simple facts, plain arguments, and common sense, and have no other preliminaries to settle with the reader, than that he will divest himself of prejudice and prepossession, and suffer his reason and his feelings to determine for themselves, that governor, might sustain by the destruction of so many papers. Answer was made that it had been resolved to destroy everything in the house, and such resolve should be carried to effect. Author's note, ibid, III, 90.

1 'The justices of peace being ordered to attend the governor and council, one, who had been most active in town meetings, &c., complained that his own life had been threatened and wept. The governor ob-he will put on, or rather that he will not put off, the true character of a man, and generously enlarge his views beyond the present day.

Volumes have been written on the subject of the struggle between England and America. Men of all ranks have embarked in the controversy, from different motives, and with various designs, but all have been ineffectual, and the period of debate is closed. Arms as the last resource decide the contest, the appeal was the choice of the King, and the continent has accepted the challenge.

served to him that he had raised the devil and could not lay him again. Author's note, ibid, III, 91.

2 The selection, the text of which has been modernized by the editors, is Section III from Common Sense Addressed to the Inhabitants of America (Philadelphia, 1776).

It hath been reported of the late Mr Pelham (who tho' an able minister was not without his faults) that on his being attacked in the House of Commons on the score that his measures were only of a temporary kind, replied, 'They will last my time' Should a thought so fatal and unmanly possess the Colonies in the present contest, the name of ancestors will be remembered by future generations with detestation

The sun never shined on a cause of greater worth 'Tis not the affair of a city, a county, a province or a kingdom, but of a continent—of at least one-eighth part of the habitable globe 'Tis not the concern of a day, a year, or an age, posterity are virtually involved in the contest, and will be more or less affected even to the end of time by the proceedings now Now is the seed-time of continental union, faith, and honor The least fracture now, will be like a name engraved with the point of a pin on the tender rind of a young oak, the wound will enlarge with the tree, and posterity read it in full grown characters

By referring the matter from argument to arms, a new era for politics is struck—a new method of thinking hath arisen All plans, proposals, &c prior to the 19th of April, 1 e to the commencement of hostilities, are like the almanacs of the last year; which, though proper then, are superseded and useless now Whatever was advanced by the advocates on either side of the question then, terminated in one and the same point, viz a union with Great Britain, the only difference between the parties was the method of effecting it, the one proposing force, the other friendship, but it hath so far happened that the first hath failed, and the second hath withdrawn her influence

As much hath been said of the advantages of reconciliation, which, like an agreeable dream hath passed away and left us as we were, it is but right that we should examine the contrary side of the argument, and inquire into some of the many material injuries which these Colonies sustain, and always will sustain, by being connected with, and dependent on Great Britain To examine that connection and dependence on the principles of nature and common sense, to see what we have to trust to if separated, and what we are to expect if dependent.

I have heard it asserted by some, that as America hath flourished under her former connection with Great Britain, that the same connection is necessary towards her future happiness and will always have the same effect—Nothing can be more fallacious than this kind of argument—We may as well assert that because a child hath thrived upon milk, that it is never to have meat, or that the first twenty years of our lives is to become a precedent for the next twenty. But even this is admitting more than is true, for I answer roundly that America would have flourished as much, and probably much more had no European power taken any notice of her The commerce by which she hath enriched herself are the necessities of life, and will always have a market while eating is the custom of Europe

But she has protected us, say some That she hath engrossed us is true, and defended the continent at our expense as well as her own is admitted, and she would have defended Turkey from the same motive, viz the sake of trade and dominion

Alas! we have been long led away by ancient prejudices and made large sacrifices to superstition We have boasted the protection of Great Britain, without considering, that her motive was interest not attachment, that she did not protect us from our enemies on our account but from her enemies on her own account, from those who had no quarrel with us on any other account, and who will always be our enemies on the same account Let Britain waive her pretensions to the continent, or the continent throw off the dependence, and we should be at peace with France and Spain were they at war with Britain The miseries of Hanover's last war ought to warn us against connections.

It hath lately been asserted in Parliament, that the colonies have no relation to each other but through the parent country, 1 e that Pennsylvania and the Jerseys, and so on for the rest, are sister colonies by the way of England, this is certainly a very roundabout way of proving relationship, but it is the nearest and only true way of proving enemyship, if I may so call it. France and Spain never were, nor perhaps ever will be our enemies as Americans, but as our being the subjects of Great Britain.

But Britain is the parent country, say some. Then the more shame upon her conduct. Even brutes do not devour their young, nor savages make war upon their families, wherefore the assertion, if true, turns to her reproach, but it happens not to be true, or only partly so, and the phrase, 'parent' or 'mother country' hath been jesuitically adopted by the King and his parasites, with a low papistical design of gaining an unfair bias on the credulous weakness of our minds. Europe and not England is the parent country of America. This new world hath been the asylum for the persecuted lovers of civil and religious liberty from every part of Europe. Hither have they fled, not from the tender embraces of the mother, but from the cruelty of the monster, and it is so far true of England, that the same tyranny which drove the first emigrants from home pursues their descendants still.

In this extensive quarter of the globe, we forget the narrow limits of three hundred and sixty miles (the extent of England) and carry our friendship on a larger scale, we claim brotherhood with every European Christian, and triumph in the generosity of the sentiment.

It is pleasant to observe by what regular gradations we surmount the force of local prejudices as we enlarge our acquaintance with the world. A man born in any town in England divided into parishes, will naturally associate most with his fellow parishioners (because their interests in many cases will be common), and distinguish him by the name of 'neighbor', if he meet him but a few miles from home, he drops the narrow idea of a street and salutes him by the name of 'townsman', if he travel out of the county and meet him in any other, he forgets the minor divisions of street and town and calls him 'country-man' i.e. 'countryman', but if in their foreign excursions they should associate in France, or any other part of Europe, their local remembrance would be enlarged into that of 'Englishmen'. And by a just parity of reasoning, all Europeans meeting in America, or any other quarter of the globe, are 'countrymen', for England, Holland, Germany, or Sweden, when compared with the whole, stand in the same places on the larger scale, which the divisions of street, town, and county do on the smaller ones, distinctions too limited for continental minds. Not one-third of the inhabitants, even of this province, are of English descent. Wherefore, I reprobate the phrase of parent or mother country applied to England only, as being false, selfish, narrow and ungenerous.

10 But admitting that we were all of English descent, what does it amount to? Nothing. Britain, being now an open enemy, extinguishes every other name and title, and to say that reconciliation is our duty, is truly farcical. The first king of England, of the present line (William the Conqueror) was a Frenchman, and half the peers of England are descendants from the same country, wherefore, by the same method of reasoning, England ought to be governed 20 by France.

Much hath been said of the united strength of Britain and the colonies, that in conjunction, they might bid defiance to the world. But this is mere presumption, the fate of war is uncertain, neither do the expressions mean anything, for this continent would never suffer itself to be drained of inhabitants, to support the British arms 30 in either Asia, Africa, or Europe.

Besides, what have we to do with setting the world at defiance? Our plan is commerce, and that, well attended to, will secure us the peace and friendship of all Europe? because it is the interest of all Europe to have America a free port. Her trade will always be a protection, and her barrenness of gold and silver secure her from invaders.

40 I challenge the warmest advocate for reconciliation to show a single advantage that this continent can reap, by being connected with Great Britain. I repeat the challenge, not a single advantage is derived. Our corn will fetch its price in any market in Europe, and our imported goods must be paid for, buy them where we will.

But the injuries and disadvantages we sustain by that connection, are without number, and our duty to mankind at large, as well as to ourselves, instructs us to renounce the alliance because any submission to, or dependence on Great Britain, tends directly to involve this continent in European wars and quarrels. As Europe is our market for trade, we ought to form no political connection with any part of it. 'Tis the true interest of America to steer clear of European contentions, which she never can do, while by her dependence on Britain, she is made the make-weight in the scale of British politics

Europe is too thickly planted with kingdoms to be long at peace, and whenever a war breaks out between England and any foreign power, the trade of America goes to ruin, because of her connection with Britain. The next war may not turn out like the last, and should it not, the advocates for reconciliation now will be wishing for separation then, because neutrality in that case would be a safer convoy than a man of war. Everything that is right or reasonable pleads for separation. The blood of the slain, the weeping voice of nature cries, 'Tis time to part!' Even the distance at which the Almighty hath placed England and America is a strong and natural proof that the authority of the one over the other was never the design of heaven. The time likewise at which the continent was discovered adds weight to the argument, and the manner in which it was peopled increases the force of it.—The Reformation was preceded by the discovery of America as if the Almighty graciously meant to open a sanctuary to the persecuted in future years, when home should afford neither friendship nor safety

The authority of Great Britain over this continent is a form of government which sooner or later must have an end, and a serious mind can draw no true pleasure by looking forward, under the painful and positive conviction that what he calls 'the present constitution' is merely temporary. As parents, we can have no joy knowing that this government is not sufficiently lasting to insure any thing which we may bequeath to posterity, and by a plain method of argument, as we are running the next generation into debt, we ought to do the work of it. Otherwise we use them meanly and pitifully. In order to discover the line of our duty rightly, we should take our children in our hand, and fix our station a few years farther into life, that eminence will present a prospect which a few present fears and prejudices conceal from our sight

Though I would carefully avoid giving unnecessary offence, yet I am inclined to believe that all those who espouse the doctrine of reconciliation may be included within the following descriptions interested men who are not to be trusted, weak men who cannot see, prejudiced men who will not see, and a certain set of moderate men who think better of the European world than it deserves. And this last class, by an ill-judged deliberation, will be the cause of more calamities to this continent than all the other three

It is the good fortune of many to live distant from the scene of present sorrow, the evil is not sufficiently brought to their doors to make them feel the precariousness with which all American property is possessed. But let our imaginations transport us for a few moments to Boston, that seat of wretchedness will teach us wisdom, and instruct us forever to renounce a power in whom we can have no trust. The inhabitants of that unfortunate city, who but a few months ago were in ease and affluence, have now no other alternative than to stay and starve, or turn out to beg. Endangered by the fire of their friends if they continue within the city, and plundered by the soldiery if they leave it. In their present condition they are prisoners without the hope of redemption, and in a general attack for their relief, they would be exposed to the fury of both armies

Men of passive tempers look somewhat lightly over the offences of Britain, and still hoping for the best are apt to call out, 'Come, come, we shall be friends again for all this.' But examine the passions and feelings of mankind, bring the doctrine of reconciliation to the touchstone of nature, and then tell me whether you can hereafter love, honor, and faithfully serve the power that hath carried fire and sword into your land? If you cannot do all these, then are you only deceiving yourselves, and by your delay bringing ruin upon posterity. Your future connection with Britain, whom you can neither love nor honor, will be forced and unnatural, and being formed only on the plan of present convenience, will in a little time fall into a relapse more wretched than the first. But if you say, you can still pass the violations over, then I ask, 'Hath your house been burnt? Hath your property been destroyed before your face? Are your wife and children destitute of a bed to lie on, or bread to live on? Have you lost a parent or a child by their hands, and yourself the ruined and wretched survivor? If you have not, then are you not a judge of those who have. But if you have, and still can shake hands with the murderers, then are you unworthy the name of husband, father, friend, or lover, and whatever may be your rank or title in life, you have the heart of a coward, and the spirit of a sycophant.

This is not inflaming or exaggerating matters, but trying them by those feelings and affections which nature justifies, and without which we should be incapable of discharging the social duties of life, or enjoying the felicities of it. I mean not to exhibit horror for the purpose of provoking revenge, but to awaken us from fatal and unmanly slumbers, that we may pursue determinately some fixed object. 'Tis not in the power of England or of Europe to conquer America, if she doth not conquer herself by delay and timidity. The present winter is worth an age if rightly employed, but if lost or neglected, the whole continent will partake of the misfortune, and there is no punishment which that man doth not deserve, be he who, or what, or where he will, that may be the means of sacrificing a season so precious and useful.

'Tis repugnant to reason, to the universal order of things, to all examples from former ages, to suppose, that this continent can long remain subject to any external power. The most sanguine in Britain doth not think so. The utmost stretch of human wisdom cannot, at this time, compass a plan, short of separation, which can promise the continent even a year's security. Reconciliation is now a fallacious dream. Nature hath deserted the connection, and art cannot supply her place. For as Milton wisely expresses, 'Never can true reconciliation grow where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep.'

Every quiet method for peace hath been ineffectual. Our prayers have been rejected with disdain, and hath tended to convince us that nothing flatters vanity or confirms obstinacy in kings more than repeated petitioning—and nothing hath contributed more than that very measure to make the kings of Europe absolute. Witness Denmark and Sweden. Wherefore, since nothing but blows will do, for God's sake let us come to a final separation, and not leave the next generation to be cutting throats under the violated unmeaning names of parent and child.

To say they will never attempt it again is idle and visionary. We thought so at the repeal of the Stamp Act, yet a year or two undeceived us, as well may we suppose that nations which have been once defeated will never renew the quarrel.

As to government matters, 'tis not in the power of Britain to do this continent justice. The business of it will soon be too weighty and intricate to be managed with any tolerable degree of convenience, by a power so distant from us, and so very ignorant of us, for if they cannot conquer us, they cannot govern us. To be always running three or four thousand miles with a tale or a petition, waiting four or five months for an answer, which, when obtained, requires five or six more to explain it in, will in a few years be looked upon as folly and childishness.—There was a time when it was proper, and there is a proper time for it to cease.

Small islands not capable of protecting themselves are the proper objects for government to take under their care, but there is something very absurd in supposing a continent to be perpetually governed by an island. In no instance hath nature made the satellite larger than its primary planet, and as England and America, with respect to each other, reverse the common order of nature, it is evident they belong to different systems. England to Europe, America to itself.

I am not induced by motives of pride, party, or resentment to espouse the doctrine of separation and independence, I am clearly, positively, and conscientiously persuaded that 'tis the true interest of this continent to be so, that everything short of that is mere patchwork, that it can afford no lasting felicity,—that it is leaving the sword to our children, and shrinking back at a time when a little more, a little farther, would have rendered this continent the glory of the earth.

As Britain hath not manifested the least inclination towards a compromise, we may be assured that no terms can be obtained worthy the acceptance of the continent, or any ways equal to the expense of blood and treasure we have been already put to

The object contended for ought always to bear some just proportion to the expense. The removal of North, or the whole detestable junto, is a matter unworthy the millions we have expended. A temporary stoppage of trade was an inconvenience which would have sufficiently balanced the repeal of all the acts complained of, had such repeals been obtained, but if the whole continent must take up arms, if every man must be a soldier, 'tis scarcely worth our while to fight against a contemptible ministry only. Dearly, dearly, do we pay for the repeal of the acts, if that is all we fight for, for in a just estimation, 'tis as great a folly to pay a Bunker-Hill price for law as for land. As I have always considered the independency of this continent as an event which sooner or later must arrive, so from the late rapid progress of the continent to maturity, the event could not be far off. Wherefore, on the breaking out of hostilities, it was not worth the while to have disputed a matter which time would have finally redressed, unless we meant to be in earnest, otherwise it is like wasting an estate on a suit at law, to regulate the trespasses of a tenant whose lease is just expiring. No man was a warmer wisher for reconciliation than myself, before the fatal 19th of April 1775, but the moment the event of that day was made known, I rejected the hardened, sullen-tempered Pharaoh of England for ever, and disdain the wretch, that with the pretended title of 'Father of his People' can unfeelingly hear of their slaughter, and composedly sleep with their blood upon his soul.

But admitting that matters were now made up, what would be the event? I answer, the ruin of the continent. And that for several reasons.

First The powers of governing still remaining in the hands of the King, he will have a negative over the whole legislation of this continent. And as he hath shown himself such an inveterate enemy to liberty, and discovered such a thirst for arbitrary power, is he, or is he not, a proper man to say to these colonies, 'You shall make no laws but what I please.' And is there any inhabitant in America so ignorant as not to know, that according to what is called the 'present constitution,' this continent can make no laws but what the King gives leave to, and is there any man so unwise as not to see, that (considering what has happened) he will suffer no laws to be made here but such as suit his purpose. We may be as effectually enslaved by the want of laws in America, as by submitting to laws made for us in England. After matters are made up (as it is called), can there be any doubt, but the whole power of the crown will be exerted to keep this continent as low and humble as possible? Instead of going forward we shall go backward, or be perpetually quarrelling, or ridiculously petitioning.—We are already greater than the King wishes us to be, and will he not hereafter endeavor to make us less? To bring the matter to one point is the power who is jealous of our prosperity, a proper power to govern us? Whoever says 'no' to this question is an Independent for independency means no more than whether we shall make our own laws, or, whether the King, the greatest enemy this continent hath, or can have, shall tell us, 'There shall be no laws but such as I like.'

But the King, you'll say, hath a negative in England, the people there can make no laws without his consent. In point of right and good order there is something very ridiculous that a youth of twenty-one (which hath often happened) shall say to six millions of people older and wiser than himself, 'I forbid this or that act of yours to be law.' But in this place I decline this sort of reply, though I will never cease to expose the absurdity of it, and only answer that England being the King's residence, and America not so, makes quite another case. The King's negative here is ten times more dangerous and fatal than it can be in England, for there he will scarcely refuse his consent to a bill for putting England into as strong a state of defense as possible, and here he would never suffer such a bill to be passed.

America is only a secondary object in the system of British politics, England consults the good of this country no farther than it answers her own purpose. Wherefore her own interest leads her to suppress the growth of ours in every case which doth not promote her advantage, or in the least interferes with it. A pretty state we should soon be in under such a second-hand government, considering what has happened! Men do not change from enemies to friends by the alteration of a name and in order to show that reconciliation now is a dangerous doctrine, I affirm that it would be policy in the King at this time to repeal the acts for the sake of reinstating himself in the government of the provinces, in order that he may accomplish by craft and subtlety, in the long run, what he cannot do by force and violence in the short one. Reconciliation and ruin are nearly related.

Secondly. That as even the best terms which we can expect to obtain can amount to no more than a temporary expedient, or a kind of government by guardianship, which can last no longer than till the colonies come of age, so the general face and state of things in the interim will be unsettled and unpromising. Emigrants of property will not choose to come to a country whose form of government hangs but by a thread, and who is every day tottering on the brink of commotion and disturbance, and numbers of the present inhabitants would lay hold of the interval to dispose of their effects, and quit the continent.

But the most powerful of all arguments is, that nothing but independence, i.e. a continental form of government, can keep the peace of the continent and preserve it inviolate from civil wars. I dread the event of a reconciliation with Britain now, as it is more than probable that it will be followed by a revolt some where or other, the consequences of which may be far more fatal than all the malice of Britain.

Thousands are already ruined by British barbarity, (thousands more will probably suffer the same fate.) Those men have other feelings than us who have nothing suffered. All they now possess is liberty, what they before enjoyed is sacrificed to its service, and having nothing more to lose, they disdain submission. Besides, the general temper of the colonies towards a British government will be like that of a youth who is nearly out of his time, they will care very little about her, and a government which cannot preserve the peace is no government at all, and in that case we pay our money for nothing and pray what is it that Britain can do, whose power will be wholly on paper, should a civil tumult break out the very day after reconciliation? I have heard some men say, many of whom I believe spoke without thinking, that they dreaded an independence, fearing that it would produce civil wars. It is but seldom that our first thoughts are truly correct, and that is the case here, for there are ten times more to dread from a patched up connection than from independence. I make the sufferer's case my own, and I protest, that were I driven from house and home, my property destroyed, and my circumstances ruined, that as a man, sensible of injuries, I could never relish the doctrine of reconciliation, or consider myself bound thereby.

The colonies hath manifested such a spirit of good order and obedience to continental government as is sufficient to make every reasonable person easy and happy on that head. No man can assign the least pretence for his fears on any other grounds than such as are truly childish and ridiculous, viz, that one colony will be striving for superiority over another.

Where there are no distinctions, there can be no superiority, perfect equality affords no temptation. The republics of Europe are all (and we may say always) in peace. Holland and Switzerland are without wars, foreign or domestic. Monarchical governments, it is true, are never long at rest: the crown itself is a temptation to enterprising ruffians at home, and that degree of pride and insolence ever attendant on regal authority, swells into a rupture with foreign powers in instances where a republican government, by being formed on more natural principles, would negotiate the mistake.

If there is any true cause for fear respecting independence, it is because no plan is yet laid down. Men do not see their way out—Wherefore, as an opening into that business, I offer the following hints, at the same time modestly affirming, that I have no other opinion of them myself, than that they may be the means of giving rise to something better. Could the straggling thoughts of individuals be collected, they would frequently form materials for wise and able men to improve into useful matter.

Let the assemblies be annual, with a president only. The representation more equal. Their business wholly domestic, and subject to the authority of a continental congress

Let each colony be divided into six, eight, or ten, convenient districts, each district to send a proper number of delegates to congress, so that each colony send at least thirty. The whole number in congress will be at least 390. Each congress to sit and to choose a president by the following method when the delegates are met, let a colony be taken from the whole thirteen colonies by lot, after which let the whole congress choose (by ballot) a president from out of the delegates of that province. In the next congress let a colony be taken by lot from twelve only, omitting that colony from which the president was taken in the former congress, and so proceeding on till the whole thirteen shall have had their proper rotation. And in order that nothing may pass into a law but what is satisfactorily just, not less than three-fifths of the congress to be called a majority —He that will promote discord under a government so equally formed as this would have joined Lucifer in his revolt.

But as there is a peculiar delicacy from whom, or in what manner, this business must first arise, and as it seems most agreeable and consistent that it should come from some intermediate body between the governed and the governors, that is, between the congress and the people, let a continental conference be held in the following manner, and for the following purpose

A committee of twenty-six members of congress, viz Two for each colony Two members from each house of assembly, or provincial convention, and five representatives of the people at large, to be chosen in the capital city or town of each province, for, and in behalf of the whole province, by as many qualified voters as shall think proper to attend from all parts of the province for that purpose, or, if more convenient, the representatives may be chosen in two or three of the most populous parts thereof. In this conference, thus assembled, will be united the two grand principles of business, knowledge and power. The members of congress, assemblies, or conventions, by having had experience in national concerns, will be able and useful counselors, and the whole, by being empowered by the people, will have a truly legal authority.

The conferring members being met, let their business be to frame a continental charter, or Charter of the United Colonies, (answering to what is called the Magna Charta of England) fixing the number and manner of choosing members of congress, members of assembly, with their date of sitting, and drawing the line of business and jurisdiction between them' (always remembering, that our strength and happiness, is continental, not provincial) Securing freedom and property to all men, and above all things the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience, with such other matters as is necessary for a charter to contain. Immediately after which, the said conference to dissolve, and the bodies which shall be chosen conformable to the said charter, to be the legislators and governors of this continent for the time being whose peace and happiness, may God preserve Amen

Should any body of men be hereafter delegated for this or some similar purpose, I offer them the following extracts from that wise observer on governments Dragonetti 'The science,' says he, 'of the politician consists in fixing the true point of happiness and freedom. Those men would deserve the gratitude of ages, who should discover a mode of government that contained the greatest sum of individual happiness, with the least national expense'

But where, say some, is the king of America? I'll tell you, friend, he reigns above, and doth not make havoc of mankind like the Royal Brute of Great Britain. Yet that we may not appear to be defective even in earthly honors, let a day be solemnly set apart for proclaiming the charter, let it be brought forth placed on the Divine Law, the Word of God, let a crown be placed thereon, by which the world may know, that so far as we approve of monarchy, that in America 'the law is king' For as in absolute governments the king is law, so in free countries the law ought to be king, and there ought to be no other. But lest any ill use should afterwards arise, let the crown at the conclusion of the ceremony be demolished, and scattered among the people whose right it is become convinced that it is infinitely wiser and safer to form a constitution of our own, in a cool deliberate manner, while we have it in our power, than to trust such an interesting event to time and chance. If we omit it now, some Massanello may hereafter arise, who, laying hold of popular disquietudes, may collect together the desperate and the discontented, and by assuming to themselves the powers of government, may sweep away the liberties of the continent like a deluge. Should the government of America return again into the hands of Britain the tottering situation of things will be a temptation for some desperate adventurer to try his fortune, and in such a case what relief can Britain give? Ere she could hear the news, the fatal business might be done, and ourselves suffering like the wretched Britons under the oppression of the conqueror. Ye that oppose independence now, ye know not what ye do: ye are opening a door to eternal tyranny by keeping vacant the seat of government. There are thousands and tens of thousands who would think it glorious to expel from the continent that barbarous and hellish power which have stirred up the Indians and the Negroes to destroy us, the cruelty hath a double guilt, it is dealing brutally by us, and treacherously by them.

To talk of friendship with those in whom our reason forbids us to have faith, and our affections wounded thro' a thousand pores instruct us to detest, is madness and folly. Every day wears out the little remains of kindred between us and them, and can there be any reason to hope that as the relationship expires the affection will increase, or that we shall agree better when we have ten times more and greater concerns to quarrel over than ever?

Ye that tell us of harmony and reconciliation, can ye restore to us the time that is past? Can ye give to prostitution its former innocence? Neither can ye reconcile Britain and America. The last cord now is broken, the people of England are presenting addresses against us. There are injuries which nature cannot forgive, she would cease to be nature if she did. As well can the lover forgive the ravisher of his mistress, as the continent forgive the murders of Britain. The Almighty hath implanted in us these unextinguishable feelings for good and wise purposes. They are the guardians of His image in our hearts. They distinguish us from the herd of common animals. The social compact would dissolve, and justice be extirpated the earth, or have only a casual existence were we callous to the touches of affection. The robber and the murderer would often escape unpunished, did not the injuries which our tempers sustain, provoke us into justice.

O ye that love mankind! Ye that dare oppose not only the tyranny but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is over-run with oppression. Freedom hath been hunted round the globe. Asia and Africa have long expelled her—Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart. O receive the fugitive, and prepare in time an asylum for mankind.

THE UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF THE THIRTEEN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA<sup>1</sup>

WHEN in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.—We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.—That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers

from the consent of the governed,—That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes, and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security —Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world —He has refused his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good —He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained, and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them —He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only —He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures —He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people —He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise, the state remaining in the meantime exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within —He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states, for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands —He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers —He has made judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries —He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.— He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies without the consent of our legislatures —He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power —He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation —For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us —For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states —For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world —For imposing taxes on us without our consent —For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury —For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences —For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies —For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments —For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever. —He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us —He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people —He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty & perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation —He has constrained our fellow citizens taken captive on the high seas to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands —He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare, is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms Our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends —

We, THEREFORE, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved, and that as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do —And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor

FROM THE FEDERALIST

X THE UTILITY OF THE UNION AS A SAFEGUARD AGAINST DOMESTIC FACTION AND INSURRECTION<sup>1</sup>

AMONG the numerous advantages promised by a well-constructed union, none deserves to be more accurately developed than its tendency to break and control the violence of faction The friend of popular governments never finds himself so much alarmed for their character and fate, as when he contemplates their propensity to this dangerous vice He will not fail, therefore, to set a due value on any plan which, without violating the principles to which he is attached, provides a proper cure for it The instability, injustice, and confusion, introduced into the public councils have, in truth, been the mortal diseases under which popular governments have everywhere perished, as they continue to be the favorite and fruitful topics from which the adversaries to liberty derive their most specious declamations The valuable improvements made by the American constitutions on the popular models, both ancient and modern, cannot certainly be too much admired, but it would be an unwarrantable partiality, to contend that they have as effectually obviated the danger on this side, as was wished and expected. Complaints are everywhere heard from our most considerate and virtuous citizens, equally the friends of public and private faith, and of public and personal liberty, that our governments are too unstable, that the public good is disregarded in the conflicts of rival parties, and that measures are too often decided, not according to the rules of justice, and the rights of the minor party, but by the superior force of an interested and overbearing majority. However anxiously we may wish that these complaints had no foundation, the evidence of known facts will not permit us to deny that they are in some degree true. It will be found, indeed, on a candid review of our situation, that some of the distresses under which we labor have been erroneously charged on the operation of our governments, but it will be found, at the same time, that other causes will not alone account for many of our heaviest misfortunes, and, particularly, for that prevailing and increasing distrust of public engagements, and alarm for private rights, which are echoed from one end of the continent to the other. These must be chiefly, if not wholly, effects of the unsteadiness and injustice with which a factious spirit has tainted our public administrations.

By a faction, I understand a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community.

There are two methods of curing the mischiefs of faction: the one, by removing its causes, the other, by controlling its effects.

There are again two methods of removing the causes of faction: the one, by destroying the liberty which is essential to its existence, the other, by giving to every citizen the same opinions, the same passions, and the same interests.

It could never be more truly said than of the first remedy, that it was worse than the disease. Liberty is to faction what air is to fire, an aliment without which it instantly expires. But it could not be a less folly to abolish liberty, which is essential to political life, because it nourishes faction, than it would be to wish the annihilation of air, which is essential to animal life, because it imparts to fire its destructive agency.

The second expedient is as impracticable as the first would be unwise. As long as the reason of man continues fallible, and he is at liberty to exercise it, different opinions will be formed. As long as the connection subsists between his reason and his self-love, his opinions and his passions will have a reciprocal influence on each other, and the former will be objects to which the latter will attach themselves. The diversity in the faculties of men, from which the rights of property originate, is not less an insuperable obstacle to a uniformity of interests. The protection of these faculties is the first object of government. From the protection of different and unequal faculties of acquiring property, the possession of different degrees and kinds of property immediately results, and from the influence of these on the sentiments and views of the respective proprietors ensues a division of the society into different interests and parties.

The latent causes of faction are thus sown in the nature of man; and we see them everywhere brought into different degrees of activity, according to the different circumstances of civil society. A zeal for different opinions concerning religion, concerning government and many other points, as well of speculation as of practice, an attachment to different leaders ambitiously contending for pre-eminence and power, or to persons of other descriptions whose fortunes have been interesting to the human passions, have, in turn, divided mankind into parties, inflamed them with mutual animosity, and rendered them much more disposed to vex and oppress each other, than to co-operate for their common good. So strong is this propensity of mankind to fall into mutual animosities, that where no substantial occasion presents itself, the most frivolous and fanciful distinctions have been sufficient to kindle their unfriendly passions and excite their most violent conflicts. But the most common and durable source of factions has been the various and unequal distribution of property. Those who hold, and those who are without property, have ever formed distinct interests in society. Those who are creditors, and those who are debtors, fall under a like discrimination. A landed interest, a manufacturing interest, a mercantile interest, a moneyed interest, with many lesser interests, grow up of necessity in civilized nations, and divide them into different classes, actuated by different sentiments and views. The regulation of these various and interfering interests forms the principal task of modern legislation, and involves the spirit of party and faction in the necessary and ordinary operations of government.

No man is allowed to be a judge in his own cause, because his interest will certainly bias his judgment, and, not improbably, corrupt his integrity. With equal, nay, with greater reason, a body of men are unfit to be both judges and parties at the same time, yet what are many of the most important acts of legislation, but so many judicial determinations, not indeed concerning the rights of single persons, but concerning the rights of large bodies of citizens? and what are the different classes of legislators, but advocates and parties to the causes which they determine? Is a law proposed concerning private debts? It is a question to which the creditors are parties on one side, and the debtors on the other. Justice ought to hold the balance between them. Yet the parties are, and must be, themselves the judges, and the most numerous party, or, in other words, the most powerful faction, must be expected to prevail. Shall domestic manufactures be encouraged, and in what degree by restrictions on foreign manufactures? are questions which would be differently decided by the landed and the manufacturing classes, and probably by neither with a sole regard to justice and the public good. The apportionment of taxes on the various descriptions of property is an act which seems to require the most exact impartiality, yet there is, perhaps, no legislative act in which greater opportunity and temptation are given to a predominant party, to trample on the rules of justice. Every shilling with which they overburden the inferior number is a shilling saved to their own pockets.

It is in vain to say that enlightened statesmen will be able to adjust these clashing interests, and render them all subservient to the public good. Enlightened statesmen will not always be at the helm, nor, in many cases, can such an adjustment be made at all, without taking into view indirect and remote considerations which will rarely prevail over the immediate interest which one party may find in disregarding the rights of another, or the good of the whole.

The inference to which we are brought is that the causes of faction cannot be removed, and that relief is only to be sought in the means of controlling its effects.

If a faction consists of less than a majority, relief is supplied by the republican principle, which enables the majority to defeat its sinister views by regular vote. It may clog the administration, it may convulse the society, but it will be unable to execute and mask its violence under the forms of the constitution. When a majority is included in a faction, the form of popular government, on the other hand, enables it to sacrifice to its ruling passion or interest both the public good and the rights of other citizens. To secure the public good, and private rights, against the danger of such a faction, and at the same time to preserve the spirit and the form of popular government, is then the great object to which our inquiries are directed. Let me add that it is the great desideratum by which alone this form of government can be rescued from the opprobrium under which it has so long labored, and be recommended to the esteem and adoption of mankind.

By what means is this object attainable? Evidently by one of two only. Either the existence of the same passion or interest in a majority, at the same time, must be prevented, or the majority, having such co-existent passion or interest, must be rendered, by their number and local situation, unable to concert and carry into effect schemes of oppression. If the impulse and the opportunity be suffered to coincide, we well know that neither moral nor religious motives can be relied on as an adequate control. They are not found to be such on the injustice and violence of individuals, and lose their efficacy in proportion to the number combined together, that is, in proportion as their efficacy becomes needful.

From this view of the subject, it may be concluded that a pure democracy, by which I mean a society consisting of a small num ber of citizens, who assemble and administer the government in person, can admit of no cure for the mischiefs of faction. A common passion or interest will, in almost every case, be felt by a majority of the whole, a communication and concert results from the form of government itself, and there is nothing to check the inducements to sacrifice the weaker party or an obnoxious individual. Hence it is that such democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention, have ever been found incompatible with personal security, or the rights of property, and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths. Theoretic politicians, who have patronized this species of government, have erroneously supposed that by reducing mankind to a perfect equality in their political rights, they would at the same time be perfectly equalized and assimilated in their possessions, their opinions, and their passions.

A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect, and promises the cure for which we are seeking. Let us examine the points in which it varies from pure democracy, and we shall comprehend both the nature of the cure and the efficacy which it must derive from the union.

The two great points of difference between a democracy and a republic are first, the delegation of the government, in the latter, to a small number of citizens elected by the rest, secondly, the greater number of citizens, and greater sphere of country, over which the latter may be extended.

The effect of the first difference is, on the one hand, to refine and enlarge the public views, by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country, and whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations. Under such a regulation, it may well happen that the public voice, pronounced by the representatives of the people, will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves, convened for the purpose. On the other hand, the effect may be inverted. Men of factious tempers, of local prejudices, or of sinister designs, may by intrigue, by corruption, or by other means, first obtain the suffrages, and then betray the interests of the people. The question resulting is, whether small or extensive republics are most favorable to the election of proper guardians of the public weal, and it is clearly decided in favor of the latter by two obvious considerations.

In the first place, it is to be remarked that, however small the republic may be, the representatives must be raised to a certain number, in order to guard against the cabals of a few, and that, however large it may be, they must be limited to a certain number, in order to guard against the confusion of a multitude. Hence, the number of representatives in the two cases not being in proportion to that of the constituents, and being proportionally greatest in the small republic, it follows that if the proportion of fit characters be not less in the large than in the small republic, the former will present a greater option, and consequently a greater probability of a fit choice.

In the next place, as each representative will be chosen by a greater number of citizens in the large than in the small republic, it will be more difficult for unworthy candidates to practise with success the vicious arts, by which elections are too often carried, and the suffrages of the people, being more free, will be more likely to center in men who possess the most attractive merit and the most diffusive and established characters.

It must be confessed that in this, as in most other cases, there is a mean, on both sides of which inconveniences will be found to lie. By enlarging too much the number of electors, you render the representative too little acquainted with all their local circumstances and lesser interests, as by reducing it too much, you render him unduly attached to these, and too little fit to comprehend and pursue great and national objects. The federal constitution forms a happy combination in this respect, the great and aggregate interests being referred to the national, the local and particular to the state legislatures.

The other point of difference is, the greater number of citizens and extent of territory which may be brought within the compass of republican than of democratic government, and it is this circumstance principally which renders factious combinations less to be dreaded in the former than in the latter. The smaller the society, the fewer probably will be the distinct parties and interests composing it, the fewer the distinct parties and interests, the more frequently will a majority be found of the same party, and the smaller the number of individuals composing a majority, and the smaller the compass within which they are placed, the more easily will they concert and execute their plans of oppression. Extend the sphere, and you take in a greater variety of parties and interests, you make it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens, or if such a common motive exists, it will be more difficult for all who feel it to discover their own strength, and to act in unison with each other. Besides other impediments, it may be remarked that where there is a consciousness of unjust or dishonorable purposes, communication is always checked by distrust, in proportion to the number whose concurrence is necessary.

Hence, it clearly appears that the same advantage which a republic has over a democracy, in controlling the effects of faction, is enjoyed by a large over a small republic—is enjoyed by the union over the states composing it. Does this advantage consist in the substitution of representatives, whose enlightened views and virtuous sentiments render them superior to local prejudices, and to schemes of injustice? It will not be denied that the representation of the union will be most likely to possess these requisite endowments. Does it consist in the greater security afforded by a greater variety of parties, against the event of any one party being able to outnumber and oppress the rest? In an equal degree does the increased variety of parties, comprised within the union, increase this security. Does it, in fine, consist in the greater obstacles opposed to the concert and accomplishment of the secret wishes of an unjust and interested majority? Here, again, the extent of the union gives it the most palpable advantage.

The influence of factious leaders may kindle a flame within their particular states, but will be unable to spread a general conflagration through the other states. A religious sect may degenerate into a political faction in a part of the confederacy, but the variety of sects dispersed over the entire face of it, must secure the national councils against any danger from that source. A rage for paper money, for an abolition of debts, for an equal division of property, or for any other improper or wicked project, will be less apt to pervade the whole body of the union, than a particular member of it, in the same proportion as such a malady is more likely to taint a particular county or district, than an entire state.

In the extent and proper structure of the union, therefore, we behold a republican remedy for the diseases most incident to republican government. And according to the degree of pleasure and pride we feel in being republicans, ought to be our zeal in cherishing the spirit and supporting the character of federalists.

THE INVITATION

DAMON

HASTE! Sylvia! haste, my charming Maid!

Let's leave these fashionable toys,
Let's seek the shelter of some shade,

And revel in ne'er fading joys See spring in liv'ry gay appears,

And winter's chilly blasts are fled,
Each grove its leafy honours rears,
And meads their lovely verdure spread!

SYLVIA

Yes Damon, glad I'll quit the town, Its gaities now languid seem,
Then sweets to luxury unknown

10

We'll taste, and sip th'untainted stream
In Summer's sultry noon-tide heat I'll lead thee to the shady grove,
There hush thy cares, or pleas'd repeat Those vows that won my soul to love.

When o'er the mountain peeps the dawn,
And round her ruddy beauties play, I'll wake my Love to view the lawn,
Or hear the warblers hail the day. 20
But, without thee, the rising morn In vain awakes the cooling breeze,
In vain does nature's face adorn, Without my Sylvia nought can please

SYLVIA

At night, when universal gloom Hides the bright prospect from our view,
When the gay groves give up their bloom,
And verdant meads their lovely hue, Tho' fleeting spectres round me move,
When in thy circling arms I'm prest, 30
I'll hush my rising fears with love,
And sink in slumber on thy breast

The new-blown rose, whilst on its leaves Yet the bright scented dew-drops found, Pleas'd on thy bosom, whilst it heaves, Shall shake its heav'nly fragrance round Then mingled sweets the sense shall raise,
Then mingled beauties catch the eye,
What pleasure on such charms to gaze!
What rapture 'mid such sweets to lie! 40

SYLVIA

How sweet thy words!—but, Damon cease,
Nor strive to fix me ever here,
Too well you know these accents please,
That oft have fill'd my ravished ear Come, lead me to these promis'd joys That dwelt so lately on thy tongue, Direct me by thy well known voice,
And calm my transports with thy song!

A DITHYRAMBIC ON WINE

I

COME! let Mirth our hours employ,
The jolly God inspires,
The rosy juice our bosom fires,
And tunes our souls to joy

See, great Bacchus now descending, Gay, with blushing honours crown'd;
Sprightly Mirth and Love attending, Around him wait,
In smiling state—
Let Echo resound, 10
Let Echo resound
The joyful news all around.

2

Fond Mortals come, if love perplex,
In Wine relief you'll find, Who'd whine for woman's giddy sex
More fickle than the wind?
If beauty's bloom thy fancy warms, Here, see her shine, Cloth'd in superior charms,
More lovely than the blushing morn, 20
When first the op'ning day Bedecks the thorn,
And makes the meadows gay Here see her in her crystal shrine, See and adore, confess her all divine,
The Queen of Love and Joy Heed not thy Chloe's scorn—This sparkling glass,
With winning grace,
Shall ever meet thy fond embrace, 30
And never, never, never cloy, No never, never cloy

3

Here, Poet! see, Castalia's spring—Come, give me a bumper, I'll mount to the skies,
Another, another—'Tis done! I arise,
On fancy's wing,
I mount, I sing,
And now, sublime,
Parnassus' lofty top I climb—
But hark! what sounds are these I hear, 40 Soft as the dream of her in love, Or Zephyr's whisp'ring thro' the Grove?
And now, more solemn far than fun'ral woe,
The heavy numbers flow!
And now again,
The varied strain, Grown louder and bolder, strikes quick on the ear,
And thrills thro' ev'ry vein.

4

'Tis Pindar's song!
His softer notes the fanning gales 50

Waft across the spicy vales,

While, thro' the air,

Loud whirlwinds bear

The harsher notes along

Inspir'd by Wine,

He leaves the lazy crowd below,

Who never dar'd to peep abroad,

And, mounting to his native sky,

For ever there shall shine

No more I'll plod

The beaten road,

Like him inspir'd, like him I'll mount on high,

Like his my strain shall flow.

5

Haste, ye Mortals! leave your sorrow,

Let pleasure crown to-day—to-morrow

Yield to fate

Join the universal chorus,

Bacchus reigns

Ever great,

Bacchus reigns

Ever glorious—

Hark! the joyful groves rebound,

Sporting breezes catch the sound,

And tell to hill and dale around—

'Bacchus reigns'—

While far away,

The busy Echoes die away

THE BATTLE OF THE KEGS<sup>1</sup>

GALLANTS attend and hear a friend,

Trill forth harmonious ditty,

Strange things I'll tell which late befel

In Philadelphia city

'Twas early day, as poets say,

Just when the sun was rising,

A soldier stood on a log of wood,

And saw a thing surprising.

As in amaze he stood to gaze,

The truth can't be denied, sir,

He spied a score of kegs or more

Come floating down the tide, sir.

10

A sailor too in jerkin blue,

This strange appearance viewing,

First damn'd his eyes, in great surprise,

Then said some mischief's brewing

These kegs, I'm told, the rebels bold,

Pack'd up like pickling herring,

And they're come down t' attack the town,

In this new way of ferrying

20

The soldier flew, the sailor too,

And scar'd almost to death, sir,

Wore out their shoes, to spread the news,

And ran till out of breath, sir

Now up and down throughout the town,

Most frantic scenes were acted,

And some ran here, and others there,

Like men almost distracted

Some fire cry'd, which some denied,

But said the earth had quaked,

And girls and boys, with hideous noise,

Ran thro' the streets half naked

30

Sir William he, snug as a flea,

Lay all this time a snoring,

Nor dream'd of harm as he lay warm,

In bed with Mrs Loring.

Now in a fright, he starts upright,

Awak'd by such a clatter,

He rubs both eyes, and boldly cries,

For God's sake, what's the matter?

40

At his bed-side he then espy'd,

Sir Erskine at command, sir,

Upon one foot, he had one boot,

And th'other in his hand, sir

<sup>1</sup> 'This ballad was occasioned by a real incident. Certain machines, in the form of kegs, charg'd with gun powder, were sent down the river to annoy the British shipping then at Philadelphia. The danger of these machines being discovered, the British manned the wharfs and shipping, and discharged their small arms and cannons at every thing they saw floating in the river during the ebb tide.' Author's note, Miscellaneous Essays (Philadelphia, 1792), III, 173

'Arise, arise,' Sir Erskine cries,
 'The rebels—more's the pity,
 'Without a boat are all afloat,
 'And rang'd before the city

'The motley crew, in vessels new,
 'With Satan for their guide, sir 50
 'Pack'd up in bags, or wooden kegs,
 'Come driving down the tide, sir

'Therefore prepare for bloody war,
 'These kegs must all be routed,
 'Or surely we despised shall be,
 'And British courage doubted '

The royal band, now ready stand
 All rang'd in dread array, sir,
 With stomach stout to see it out,
 And make a bloody, day, sir 60

The cannons roar from shore to shore,
 The small arms make a rattle, Since wars began I'm sure no man E'er saw so strange a battle

The rebel dales, the rebel vales, With rebel trees surrounded,
 The distant wood, the hills and floods,
 With rebel echoes sounded

The fish below swam to and fro, Attack'd from ev'ry quarter, 70 Why sure, thought they, the devil's to pay,
 'Mongst folks above the water

The kegs, 'tis said, tho' strongly made,
 Of rebel staves and hoops, sir,
 Could not oppose their powerful foes,
 The conqu'ring British troops, sir

From morn to night these men of might Display'd amazing courage,
 And when the sun was fairly down, Retir'd to sup their porrage 80

An hundred men with each a pen,
 Or more upon my word, sir
 It is most true would be too few,
 Their valour to record, sir

Such feats did they perform that day, Against these wick'd kegs, sir,
 That years to come, if they get home, They'll make their boasts and brags, sir. 1792

SONG

I

My gen'rous heart disdains
 The slave of love to be,
 I scorn his servile chains,
 And boast my liberty
 This whining And pining
 And wasting with care,
 Are not to my taste, be she ever so fair.

2

Shall a girl's capricious frown Sink my noble spirits down? 10 Shall a face of white and red Make me droop my silly head?
 Shall I set me down and sigh
 For an eye-brow or an eye?
 For a braided lock of hair, Curse my fortune and despair?
 My gen'rous heart disdains, &c.

3

Still uncertain is to-morrow,
 Not quite certain is to-day—Shall I waste my time in sorrow? 20 Shall I languish life away?
 All because a cruel maid, Hath not Love with Love repaid
 My gen'rous heart disdains, &c.

FROM M'FINGAL

THE LIBERTY POLE<sup>1</sup>

Now warm with ministerial ire, Fierce sallied forth our loyal 'Squire,
And on his striding steps attends His desperate clan of Tory friends
When sudden met his wrathful eye
A pole ascending through the sky,
Which numerous throngs of whiggish race
Were raising in the market-place Not higher school-boys' kites aspire, 10 Or royal mast, or country spire, Like spears at Brobdignagian tilting, Or Satan's walking-staff in Milton
And on its top, the flag unfurl'd Waved triumph o'er the gazing world, Inscribed with inconsistent types Of Liberty and thirteen stripes.
Beneath, the crowd without delay
The dedication-rites essay,
And gladly pay, in ancient fashion,
The ceremonies of libation, 20
While briskly to each patriot lip Walks eager round the inspiring flip Delicious draught! whose powers inherit The quintessence of public spirit, Which whoso tastes, perceives his mind
To nobler politics refined,
Or roused to martial controversy,

1 The selection is Canto 3 of M'Fingal, the text being that of the author's revision published in 1820. The first two cantos tell of the Tory M'Fingal's heated arguments at his local town meeting. These were first published in 1776, but the third and fourth cantos did not appear until 1782.

"Trumbull himself refuted the charge that his poem is merely an imitation of Hudibras. In his unpublished "Critical Reflections" he wrote "The Critical Reader will discern, that I have rather proposed to myself Swift and Churchill as models in my Hudibras writings, than the Author of Hudibras. I have sometimes had Butler's manner in my eye, for a few lines, but was soon forced to quit it. Indeed his kind of wit and the oddity of his Companions was in my Opinion never well imitated by any man, nor ever will be." In 1785 he reverted to the subject in his reply to a letter from the Marquis de Chastellux. On this occasion he called attention to the major distinction between the two poems "In the style, I have preferred the high burlesque to the low (which is the style of Hudibras), not only as more agreeable to my own taste, but as it readily admits a transition to the grave, elevated or sublime." Cowie, John Trumbull (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1936), 151.

As from transforming cups of Circe;
Or warm'd with Homer's nectar'd liquor,
That fill'd the veins of gods with ichor 30
At hand for new supplies in store,
The tavern opes its friendly door, Whence to and fro the waiters run,
Like bucket-men at fires in town Then with three shouts that tore the sky,
'Tis consecrate to Liberty To guard it from th' attacks of Tories, A grand committee cull'd of four is,
Who foremost on the patriot spot,
Had bought the flip, and paid the shot 40
By this, M'Fingal with his train Advanced upon th' adjacent plain,
And full with loyalty possess'd, Pour'd forth the zeal, that fired his breast
'What mad-brain'd rebel gave commusion,
To raise this May-pole of sedition?
Like Babel, rear'd by bawling throngs, With like confusion too of tongues,
To point at heaven and summon down
The thunders of the British crown? 50 Say, will this paltry pole secure Your forfeit heads from Gage's power?
Attack'd by heroes brave and crafty,
Is this to stand your ark of safety,
Or driven by Scottish laird and laddie, Think ye to rest beneath its shadow?
When bombs, like fiery serpents, fly,
And balls rush hissing through the sky,
Will this vile pole, devote to freedom, Save like the Jewish pole in Edom, 60
Or like the brazen snake of Moses, Cure your crackt skulls and batter'd noses?
'Ye dupes to every factious rogue And tavern-prating demagogue, Whose tongue but rings, with sound more full,
On th' empty drumhead of his skull, Behold you not what noisy fools Use you, worse simpletons, for tools?
For Liberty, in your own by-sense,
Is but for crimes a patent license, 70
To break of law th' Egyptian yoke,
And throw the world in common stock, Reduce all grievances and ills
To Magna Charta of your wills, Establish cheats and frauds and nonsense, Framed to the model of your conscience,

Cry justice down, as out of fashion,
 And fix its scale of depreciation, Defy all creditors to trouble ye,
 And keep new years of Jewish jubilee,      80 Drive judges out, like Aaron's calves, By jurisdiction of white staves,
 And make the bar and bench and steeple Submit t' our Sovereign Lord, The People; By plunder rise to power and glory,
 And brand all property, as Tory, Expose all wares to lawful seizures
 By mobbers or monopolizers, Break heads and windows and the peace,
 For your own interest and increase,      90 Dispute and pray and fight and groan For public good, and mean your own, Prevent the law by fierce attacks From quitting scores upon your backs, Lay your old dread, the gallows, low,
 And seize the stocks, your ancient foe,
 And turn them to convenient engines To wreak your patriotic vengeance While all, your rights who understand, Confess them in their owner's hand,      100
 And when by clamours and confusions, Your freedom's grown a public nuisance, Cry "Liberty," with powerful yearning, As he does, "Fire!" whose house is burning,
 Though he already has much more Than he can find occasion for While every clown, that tills the plains, Though bankrupt in estate and brains,
 By this new light transform'd to traitor, Forsakes his plough to turn dictator,      110 Starts an haranguing chief of Whigs,
 And drags you by the ears, like pigs
 All bluster, arm'd with factious license, New-born at once to politicians Each leather-apron'd dunce, grown wise, Presents his forward face t' advise,
 And tatter'd legislators meet,
 From every workshop through the street His goose the tailor finds new use in,
 To patch and turn the Constitution,      120
 The blacksmith comes with sledge and grate
 To iron-bind the wheels of state;
 The quack forbears his patients' souse,
 To purge the Council and the House,
 The tinker quits his moulds and doxies,
 To cast assembly-men and proxies From dunghills deep of blackest hue, Your dirt-bred patriots spring to view,
 To wealth and power and honors rise,
 Like new-wing'd maggots chang'd to flies,

And fluttering round in high parade,      131 Strut in the robe, or gay cockade See Arnold quits, for ways more certain,
 His bankrupt-perj'ries for his fortune, Brews rum no longer in his store, Jockey and skipper now no more,
 Forsakes his warehouses and docks,
 And writs of slander for the pox;
 And cleansed by patriotism from shame, Grows General of the foremost name      140 For in this ferment of the stream
 The dregs have work'd up to the brim,
 And, by the rule of topsy-turvie,
 The scum stands foaming on the surface You've caus'd your pyramid t' ascend,
 And set it on the little end Like Hudibras, your empire's made, Whose crupper had o'ertopped his head You've push'd and turn'd the whole world up-Side down, and got yourselves at top,      150
 While all the great ones of your state Are crush'd beneath the popular weight, Nor can you boast, this present hour,
 The shadow of the form of power For what's your Congress, or its end?
 A power t' advise and recommend,
 To call forth troops, adjust your quotas—
 And yet no soul is bound to notice,
 To pawn your faith to th' utmost limit,
 But cannot bind you to redeem it,      160
 And, when in want no more in them lies Than begging from your State-Assemblies, Can utter oracles of dread,
 Like friar Bacon's brazen head,
 But when a faction dares dispute 'em,
 Has ne'er an arm to execute 'em
 As tho' you chose supreme dictators, And put them under conservators You've but pursued the self-same way With Shakespeare's Trinc'lo in the play,
 "You shall be Viceroy's here, 'tis true,      171 But we'll be Viceroy's over you "
 What wild confusion hence must ensue?
 Tho' common danger yet cements you.
 So some wreck'd vessel, all in shatters,
 Is held up by surrounding waters,
 But stranded, when the pressure ceases, Falls by its rottenness to pieces
 And fall it must! if wars were ended, You'll ne'er have sense enough to mend it.
 But creeping on by low intrigues,      181 Like vermin of a hundred legs,
 'Twill find as short a life assign'd,
 As all things else of reptile kind

Your Commonwealth's a common harlot,
 The property of every varlet;
 Which now in taste, and full employ,
 All sorts admire, as all enjoy But soon a batter'd strumpet grown, You'll curse and drum her out of town. 190 Such is the government you chose,
 For this you bade the world be foes;
 For this, so mark'd for dissolution,
 You scorn the British Constitution, That constitution form'd by sages,
 The wonder of all modern ages,
 Which owns no failure in reality, Except corruption and venality, And merely proves the adage just,
 That best things spoil'd corrupt to worst So man supreme in earthly station, 201
 And mighty lord of this creation,
 When once his corse is dead as herring, Becomes the most offensive carrion,
 And sooner breeds the plague, 'tis found,
 Than all beasts rotting on the ground
 Yet with republics to dismay us, You've call'd up Anarchy from chaos,
 With all the followers of her school, Uproar and Rage and wild Misrule 210
 For whom this rout of Whigs distracted,
 And ravings dire of every crack'd head,
 These new-cast legislative engines Of County-meetings and Conventions, Committees vile of correspondence, And mobs, whose tricks have almost undone 's
 While reason fails to check your course,
 And Loyalty's kick'd out of doors,
 And Folly, like inviting landlord, Hoists on your poles her royal standard, 220
 While the king's friends, in doleful dumps, Have worn their courage to the stumps,
 And leaving George in sad disaster,
 Most sinfully deny their master
 What furies raged when you, in sea,
 In shape of Indians, drown'd the tea;
 When your gay sparks, fatigued to watch it, Assumed the moggison and hatchet,
 With wampum'd blankets hid their laces, And like their sweethearts, primed their faces 230
 While not a red-coat dared oppose,
 And scarce a Tory show'd his nose, While Hutchinson, for sure retreat, Manœuvred to his country seat,
 And thence affrighted, in the suds, Stole off bareheaded through the woods
     'Have you not roused your mobs to join,

And make Mandamus-men resign, Call'd forth each duffil-drest curmudgeon,
 With dirty trousers and white bludgeon, 240 Forced all our Councils through the land,
 To yield their necks at your command,
 While paleness marks their late disgraces, Through all their rueful length of faces?
     'Have you not caused as woeful work In our good city of New-York,
 When all the rabble, well cockaded,
 In triumph through the streets paraded, And mobb'd the Tories, scared their spouses,
 And ransack'd all the custom-houses, 250
 Made such a tumult, bluster, jarring, That mid the clash of tempests warring,
 Smith's weather-cock, in veers forlorn, Could hardly tell which way to turn?
 Burn'd effigies of higher powers, Contrived in planetary hours,
 As witches with clay-images Destroy or torture whom they please Till fired with rage, th'ungrateful club Spared not your best friend, Beelzebub, 260 O'erlook'd his favors, and forgot
 The reverence due his cloven foot,
 And in the selfsame furnace frying, Stew'd him, and North and Bute and Tryon?
 Did you not, in as vile and shallow way, Fright our poor Philadelphian, Galloway,
 Your Congress, when the loyal rbal Belied, berated and bescribbled?
 What ropes and halters did you send,
 Terrific emblems of his end, 270 Till, least he'd hang in more than effigy, Flew in a fog the trembling refugee?
 Now rising in progression fatal,
 Have you not ventured to give battle?
 When Treason chased our heroes troubled,
 With rusty gun, and leathern doublet, Turn'd all stone-walls and groves and bushes,
 To batteries arm'd with blunderbusses,
 And with deep wounds that fate portend, Gaul'd many a Briton's latter end, 280 Drove them to Boston, as in jail, Confined without mainprize or bail
 Were not these deeds enough betimes, To heap the measure of your crimes
 But in this loyal town and dwelling, You raise these ensigns of rebellion?
 'Tis done! fair Mercy shuts her door,
 And Vengeance now shall sleep no more.
 Rise then, my friends, in terror rise,

And sweep this scandal from the skies 290 You'll see their Dagon, though well jointed,

Will shrink before the Lord's anointed,
And like old Jericho's proud wall, Before our ram's horns prostrate fall '

This said, our 'Squire, yet undismay'd, Call'd forth the Constable to aid,
And bade him read, in nearer station,
The Riot-act and Proclamation.
He swift, advancing to the ring, 299 Began, 'Our Sovereign Lord, the King'— When thousand clam'rous tongues he hears And clubs and stones assail his ears
To fly was vain, to fight was idle, By foes encompass'd in the middle,
His hope, in stratagems, he found,
And fell right craftily to ground Then crept to seek an hiding place,
'Twas all he could, beneath a brace, Where soon the conqu'ring crew espied him,
And where he lurk'd, they caught and tied him 310

At once with resolution fatal, Both Whigs and Tories rush'd to battle Instead of weapons, either band Seized on such arms, as came to hand
And as famed Ovid paints th' adventures Of wrangling Lapithæ and Centaurs, Who at their feast, by Bacchus led,
Threw bottles at each other's head,
And these arms failing in their scuffles, Attack'd with andirons, tongs, and shovels
So clubs and billets, staves and stones 321 Met fierce, encount'ring every sconce,
And cover'd o'er with knobs and pains Each void receptacle for brains Their clamours rend the skies around,
The hills rebel to the sound,
And many a groan increas'd the din From batter'd nose and broken shin M'Fingal, rising at the word, Drew forth his old militia-sword, 330 Thrice cry'd 'King George,' as erst in distress,
Knights of romance invoked a mistress,
And brandishing the blade in air, Struck terror through th' opposing war
The Whigs, unsafe within the wind
Of such commotion, shrunk behind With whirling steel around address'd, Fierce through their thickest throng he press'd, (Who roll'd on either side in arch,

Like Red Sea waves in Israel's march) 340
And like a meteor rushing through, Struck on their pole a vengeful blow Around, the Whigs, of clubs and stones Discharged whole volleys, in platoons, That o'er in whistling fury fly,
But not a foe dares venture nigh
And now perhaps with glory crown'd
Our 'Squire had fell'd the pole to ground,
Had not some Pow'r, a Whig at heart, Descended down and took their part, 350 (Whether 'twere Pallas, Mars, or Iris, 'Tis scarce worth while to make inquiries) Who at the nick of time alarming, Assumed the solemn form of Chairman, Address'd a Whig, in ev'ry scene
The stoutest wrestler on the green,
And pointed where the spade was found,
Late used to set their pole in ground,
And urged, with equal arms and might,
To dare our 'Squire to single fight <sup>1</sup> 360
The Whig thus arm'd, untaught to yield, Advanced tremendous to the field
Nor did M'Fingal shun the foe,
But stood to brave the desp'rate blow, While all the party gazed, suspended
To see the deadly combat ended,
And Jove in equal balance weigh'd
The sword against the brandish'd spade,
He weigh'd, but lighter than a dream,
The sword flew up, and kick'd the beam
Our 'Squire on tiptoe rising fair 371 Lifts high a noble stroke in air, Which hung not, but like dreadful engines, Descended on his foe in vengeance.
But ah! in danger, with dishonor
The sword, perfidious, fails its owner,
That sword, which oft had stood its ground,
By huge trainbands encircled round,
And on the bench, with blade right loyal,
Had won the day at many a trial, 380
Of stones and clubs had braved th' alarms, Shrunk from these new Vulcanian arms
The spade, so temper'd from the sledge, Nor keen nor solid harm'd its edge, Now met it, from his arm of might,
Descending with steep force to smite, The blade snapp'd short—and from his hand,
With rust embrown'd the glittering sand.

1 'The learned reader will readily observe the allusions in this scene to the single combats of Paris and Menelaus in Homer, Aeneas and Turnus in Virgil, and Michael and Satan in Milton.' Author's note, M'Fingal (Hartford, Conn., 1782), 59

Swift turn'd M'Fingal at the view,
 And call'd to aid th' attendant crew, 390
 In vain the Tories all had run, When scarce the fight was well begun,
 Their setting wigs he saw decreas'd Far in th' horizon tow'rd the west Amazed he view'd the shameful sight,
 And saw no refuge, but in flight
 But age unwieldy check'd his pace, Though fear had wing'd his flying race,
 For not a trifling prize at stake,
 No less than great M'Fingal's back 400
 With legs and arms he work'd his course, Like rider that outgoes his horse,
 And labor'd hard to get away, as<sup>1</sup> Old Satan struggling on through chaos,
 'Till looking back, he spied in rear The spade-arm'd chief advanced too near Then stopp'd and seized a stone that lay An ancient landmark near the way, Nor shall we, as old bards have done, Affirm it weigh'd an hundred ton, 410
 But such a stone, as at a shift
 A modern might suffice to lift, Since men, to credit their enigmas,
 Are dwindled down to dwarfs and pigmies,
 And giants exiled with their cronies To Brobdignags and Patagonias
 But while our Hero turn'd him round,
 And tugg'd to raise it from the ground,
 The fatal spade discharged a blow Tremendous on his rear below 420
 His bent knee fail'd, and void of strength Stretch'd on the ground his manly length Like ancient oak o'erturn'd, he lay,
 Or tower to tempests fall'n a prey,
 Or mountain sunk with all his pines,
 Or flow'r, the plow to dust consigns,
 And more things else—but all men know
 'em,
 If slightly versed in epic poem
 At once the crew, at this dread crisis, Fall on, and bind him, ere he rises, 430
 And with loud shouts and joyful soul, Conduct him prisoner to the pole
 When now the mob in lucky hour Had got their en'mies in their power, They first proceed, by grave command,
 To take the Constable in hand Then from the pole's sublimest top
 The active crew let down the rope,
 At once its other end in haste bind,
 And make it fast upon his waistband, 440 Till like the earth, as stretch'd on tenter,

He hung self-balanc'd on his centre.
 Then upwards, all hands hoisting sail,
 They swung him, like a keg of ale, Till to the pinnacle in height
 He vaulted, like balloon or kite
 As Socrates of old at first did,
 To aid philosophy get hoisted, And found his thoughts flow strangely clear, Swung in a basket in mid air <sup>2</sup> 450
 Our culprit thus, in purer sky,
 With like advantage raised his eye,
 And looking forth in prospect wide,
 His Tory errors clearly spied,
 And from his elevated station, With bawling voice began addressing
 'Good Gentlemen and friends and kin, For heaven's sake hear, if not for mine!
 I here renounce the Pope, the Turks,
 The King, the Devil, and all their works,
 And will, set me but once at ease, 461 Turn Whig or Christian, what you please,
 And always mind your laws so justly,
 Should I live long as old Methus'lah, I'll never join in British rage, Nor help Lord North, nor Gen'ral Gage, Nor lift my gun in future fights, Nor take away your Charter-rights, Nor overcome your new-raised levies, Destroy your towns, nor burn your navies, Nor cut your poles down while I've breath, Though rais'd more thick than hatchel-teeth, 472
 But leave King George and all his elves
 To do their conqu'ring work themselves ' This said, they lower'd him down in state,
 Spread at all points, like falling cat,
 But took a vote first on the question,
 That they'd accept this full confession,
 And to their fellowship and favor, Restore him on his good behaviour 480
 Not so, our 'Squire submits to rule, But stood heroic as a mule
 'You'll find it all in vain,' quoth he,
 'To play your rebel tricks on me All punishments the world can render, Serve only to provoke th' offender, The will gains strength from treatment horrid,
 As hides grow harder when they're curried
 No man e'er felt the halter draw,

<sup>2</sup> 'Socrates is represented in Aristophanes's Comedy of the Clouds, as hoisted in a basket to aid contemplation. Author's note, ibid, 62

With good opinion of the law; 490 Or held in method orthodox His love of justice in the stocks, Or fail'd to lose by sheriff's shears
 At once his loyalty and ears Have you made Murray look less big,
 Or smoked old Williams to a Whig?
 Did our mobb'd Ol' ver quit his station,
 Or heed his vows of resignation?
 Has Rivington, in dread of stripes, Ceased lying since you stole his types? 500
 And can you think my faith will alter,
 By tarring, whipping, or the halter?
 I'll stand the worst, for recompense
 I trust King George and Providence.
 And when with conquest gain'd I come, Array'd in law and terror home,
 You'll rue this inauspicious morn,
 And curse the day, when ye were born,
 In Job's high style of imprecations,
 With all his plagues, without his patience'

Meanwhile beside the pole, the guard sit A Bench of Justice had prepared, Where sitting round in awful sort,
 The grand Committee hold their Court, While all the crew, in silent awe, Wait from their lips the lore of law.
 Few moments with deliberation
 They hold the solemn consultation;
 When soon in judgment all agree,
 And Clerk proclaims the dread decree; 520
 'That 'Squire M'Fingal having grown The vilest Tory in the town,
 And now in full examination Convicted by his own confession, Finding no tokens of repentance,
 This Court proceeds to render sentence.
 That first the Mob a slip-knot single Tie round the neck of said M'Fingal,
 And in due form do tar him next,
 And feather, as the law directs, 530
 Then through the town attendant ride him In cart with Constable beside him,
 And having held him up to shame, Bring to the pole, from whence he came'

Forthwith the crowd proceed to deck With halter'd noose M'Fingal's neck, While he in peril of his soul Stood tied half-hanging to the pole, Then lifting high the ponderous jar, Pour'd o'er his head the smoking tar 540
 With less profusion once was spread Oil on the Jewish monarch's head, That down his beard and vestments ran,
 And cover'd all his outward man.

As when (so Claudian sings) the Gods And earth-born Giants fell at odds,
 The stout Enceladus in malice, Tore mountains up to throw at Pallas,
 And while he held them o'er his head,
 The river, from their fountains fed, 550 Pour'd down his back its copious tide,
 And wore its channels in his hide
 So from the high-raised urn the torrents Spread down his side their various currents,

His flowing wig, as next the brim,
 First met and drank the sable stream, Adown his visage stern and grave, Roll'd and adhered the viscid wave;
 With arms depending as he stood,
 Each cuff capacious holds the flood 560
 From nose and chin's remotest end,
 The tarry icicles descend Till all o'erspread with colors gay
 He glitter'd to the western ray, Like sleet-bound trees in wintry skies,
 Or Lapland idol carved in ice
 And now the feather-bag display'd, Is waved in triumph o'er his head,
 And clouds him o'er with feathers missive,
 And down, upon the tar, adhesive 570
 Not Maia's son, with wings for ears, Such plumage around his visage wears;
 Nor Milton's six-wing'd angel gathers Such superfluity of feathers Now all complete appears our 'Squire, Like Gorgon or Chimeræ dire, No more could boast on Plato's plan
 To rank among the race of man, Or prove his claim to human nature,<sup>1</sup>
 As a two-legg'd, unfeather'd creature 580

Then on the fatal cart, in state,
 They rais'd our grand Duumvirate
 And as at Rome a like committee, Who found an owl within their city,
 With solemn rites and grave processions
 At every shrine perform'd lustrations, And lest infection might take place From such grim fowl with feather'd face,
 All Rome attends him through the street In triumph to his country seat 590
 With like devotion, all the choir Paraded round our awful 'Squire;
 In front the martial music comes Of horns and fiddles, fifes and drums,
 With jingling sound of carriage bells,
 And treble creak of rusted wheels

Behind, the crowd in lengthen'd row,
 With proud procession, closed the show
 And at fit periods every throat Combined in universal shout, 600
 And hail'd great Liberty in chorus, Or bawl'd 'confusion to the Tories.'
 Not louder storm the welkin braves,
 From clamors of conflicting waves, Less dire in Lybian wilds the noise
 When rav'ning lions lift their voice,
 Or triumphs at town-meetings made,
 On passing votes to regulate trade.

Thus having borne them round the town,
 Last at the pole they set them down, 610
 And to the tavern take their way, To end in mirth the festal day

And now the Mob, dispersed and gone, Left 'Squire and Constable alone
 The constable with rueful face Lean'd sad and solemn o'er a brace,
 And fast beside him, cheek by jowl, Stuck 'Squire M'Fingal 'gainst the pole, Glued by the tar t' his rear applied,
 Like barnacle on vessel's side 620
 But though his body lack'd physician, His spirit was in worse condition
 He found his fears of whips and ropes
 By many a drachm outweigh'd his hopes As men in jail without mainprize, View everything with other eyes,
 And all goes wrong in church and state, Seen through perspective of the grate
 So now M'Fingal's Second-sight Beheld all things in gloomier light, 630

His visual nerve, well purged with tar, Saw all the coming scenes of war
 As his prophetic soul grew stronger,
 He found he could hold in no longer
 First from the pole, as fierce he shook,
 His wig from pitchy durance broke,
 His mouth unglued, his feathers flutter'd, His tarr'd skirts crack'd, and thus he utter'd

'Ah, Mr Constable, in vain
 We strive 'gainst wind and tide and rain!
 Behold my doom! this feathery omen 641 Portends what dismal times are coming Now future scenes, before my eyes,
 And second-sighted forms arise
 I hear a voice, that calls away,
 And cries, "The Whigs will win the day"
 My beck'ning Genius gives command,
 And bids me fly the fatal land,
 Where changing name and constitution, Rebellion turns to Revolution, 650
 While Loyalty oppress'd, in tears, Stands trembling for its neck and ears

'Go, summon all our brethren, greeting, To muster at our usual meeting
 There my prophetic voice shall warn 'em
 Of all things future that concern 'em,
 And scenes disclose on which, my friend,
 Their conduct and their lives depend There I—but first 'tis more of use,
 From this vile pole to set me loose, 660 Then go with cautious steps and steady, While I steer home and make all ready'

THE HASTY PUDDING<sup>1</sup>

CANTO I

YE Alps audacious, through the heavens that rise,
 To cramp the day and hide me from the skies,
 Ye Gallic flags, that o'er their heights unfurled, Bear death to kings and freedom to the world,
 I sing not you A softer theme I choose,
 A virgin theme, unconscious of the Muse,
 But fruitful, rich, well suited to inspire

The purest frenzy of poetic fire Despise it not, ye bards to terror steel'd, Who hurl your thunders round the epic
 field, 10
 Nor ye who strain your midnight throats to sing Joys that the vineyard and the stillhouse bring,
 Or on some distant fair your notes employ,
 And speak of raptures that you ne'er enjoy.
 I sing the sweets I know, the charms I feel,
 My morning incense, and my evening meal,— The sweets of Hasty Pudding Come, dear bowl,

Glide o'er my palate, and inspire my soul.
 The milk beside thee, smoking from the kine,
 Its substance mingled, married in with thine, 20
 Shall cool and temper thy superior heat,
 And save the pains of blowing while I eat Oh! could the smooth, the emblematic
     song
 Flow like thy genial juices o'er my tongue, Could those mild morsels in my numbers chime,
 And, as they roll in substance, roll in rime,
 No more thy awkward, unpoetic name Should shun the muse or prejudice thy fame,
 But, rising grateful to the accustom'd ear, All bards should catch it, and all realms revere! 30
     Assist me first with pious toil to trace Through wrecks of time, thy lineage and thy race,
 Declare what lovely squaw, in days of yore, (Ere great Columbus sought thy native shore)
 First gave thee to the world, her works of fame
 Have lived indeed, but lived without a name
 Some tawny Ceres, goddess of her days, First learn'd with stones to crack the well-dried maize, Through the rough sieve to shake the golden shower,
 In boiling water stir the yellow flour. 40
 The yellow flour, bestrew'd and surr'd with haste,
 Swells in the flood and thickens to a paste,
 Then puffs and wallops, rises to the brim, Drinks the dry knobs that on the surface swim,
 The knobs at last the busy ladle breaks,
 And the whole mass its true consistence takes Could but her sacred name, unknown so long,
 Rise, like her labors, to the son of song,
 To her, to them I'd consecrate my lays,
 And blow her pudding with the breath of praise 50
 If 'twas Oella whom I sang before,
 I'd here ascribe her one great virtue more Nor through the rich Peruvian realms alone The fame of Sol's sweet daughter should be known,

But o'er the world's wide climes should live secure,
 Far as his rays extend, as long as they endure

    Dear Hasty Pudding, what unpromised joy
 Expands my heart, to meet thee in Savoy!
 Doom'd o'er the world through devious paths to roam, Each clime my country, and each house my home, 60
 My soul is soothed, my cares have found an
     end,
 I greet my long-lost, unforgotten friend For thee through Paris, that corrupted town,
 How long in vain I wandered up and down, Where shameless Bacchus, with his drenching hoard, Cold from his cave usurps the morning board
 London is lost in smoke and steep'd in tea,
 No Yankee there can lisp the name of thee,
 The uncouth word, a libel on the town,
 Would call a proclamation from the crown.
 From climes oblique, that fear the sun's full rays, 71
 Chilled in their fogs, exclude the generous maize
 A grain whose rich, luxuriant growth requires Short, gentle showers, and bright, ethereal fires
     But here, though distant from our native
     shore,
 With mutual glee, we meet and laugh once more
 The same! I know thee by that yellow face, That strong complexion of true Indian
     race,
 Which time can never change, nor soil impair,
 Nor Alpine snows, nor Turkey's morbid
     air, 80
 For endless years, through every mild domain,
 Where grows the maize, there thou art sure to reign
     But man, more fickle, the bold licence claims,
 In different realms to give thee different names
 Thee the soft nations round the warm Levant

Polanta call, the French, of course, Polante.
 E'en in thy native regions, how I blush To hear the Pennsylvanians call thee Mush!
 On Hudson's banks, while men of Belgic spawn

Insult and eat thee by the name Suppawn
 All spurious appellations, void of truth, 91 I've better known thee from my earliest youth

Thy name is Hasty Pudding! thus my sire Was wont to greet thee fuming from the fire,

And while he argued in thy just defense With logic clear he thus explained the sense

'In haste the boiling caldron, o'er the blaze, Receives and cooks the ready powdered
 maize,

In haste 'tis served, and then in equal haste, With cooling milk, we make the sweet repast 100

No carving to be done, no knife to grate
 The tender ear and wound the stony plate,
 But the smooth spoon, just fitted to the lip,
 And taught with art the yielding mass to dip, By frequent journeys to the bowl well stored,

Performs the hasty honors of the board.'

Such is thy name, significant and clear,
 A name, a sound to every Yankee dear, But most to me, whose heart and palate chaste

Preserve my pure, hereditary taste 110 There are who strive to stamp with disrepute

The luscious food, because it feeds the brute,

In troops of high-strain'd wit, while gaudy prigs

Compare thy nursling, man, to pamper'd pigs,

With sovereign scorn I treat the vulgar jest, Nor fear to share thy bounties with the beast

What though the generous cow gives me to quaff

The milk nutritious am I then a calf?

Or can the genius of the noisy swine, Though nursed on pudding, claim a kin to mine? 120

Sure the sweet song, I fashion to thy praise, Runs more melodious than the notes they raise

My song, resounding in its grateful glee,

No merit claims. I praise myself in thee.
 My father loved thee through his length of days!

For thee his fields were shaded o'er with maize,

From thee what health, what vigor he possess'd,

Ten sturdy freemen from his loins attest;
 Thy constellation ruled my natal morn,
 And all my bones were made of Indian corn 130

Delicious grain! whatever form it take,
 To roast or boil, to smother or to bake,
 In every dish 'tis welcome still to me,
 But most, my Hasty Pudding, most in thee Let the green succotash with thee contend,

Let beans and corn their sweetest juices blend,

Let butter drench them in its yellow tide,
 And a long slice of bacon grace their side,
 Not all the plate, how famed soe'er it be,
 Can please my palate like a bowl of thee 140 Some talk of hoe-cake, fair Virginia's pride!

Rich johnny-cake this mouth has often tried,

Both please me well, their virtues much the same,

Alike their fabric, as allied their fame, Except in dear New England, where the last

Receives a dash of pumpkin in the paste,
 To give it sweetness and improve the taste
 But place them all before me, smoking hot,
 The big, round dumpling, rolling from the pot,

The pudding of the bag, whose quivering
 breast, 150

With suet lined, leads on the Yankee feast, The charlotte brown, within whose crusty sides

A belly soft the pulpy apple hides, The yellow bread whose face like amber glows,

And all the Indian that the bakepan knows,—

Ye tempt me not, my favorite greets my eyes,

To that loved bowl my spoon by instinct flies

CANTO II

To mix the food by vicious rules of art,
 To kill the stomach and to sink the heart,

To make mankind to social virtue sour, Cram o'er each dish, and be what they devour,
 For this the kitchen muse first framed her book, Commanding sweets to stream from every cook,
 Children no more their antic gambols tried,
 And friends to physic wondered why they died

Not so the Yankee his abundant feast, With simples furnished and with plainness drest, 10

A numerous offspring gathers round the
     board,
 And cheers alike the servant and the lord, Whose well-bought hunger prompts the joyous taste

And health attends them from the short repat

While the full pail rewards the milkmaid's toil,
 The mother sees the morning caldron boil;
 To stir the pudding next demands their care,

To spread the table and the bowls prepare,
 To feed the children as their portions cool And comb their heads and send them off to school 20

Yet may the simplest dish some rules impart,

For nature scorns not all the aids of art E'en Hasty Pudding, purest of all food, May still be bad, indifferent, or good,
 As sage experience the short process guides,
 Or want of skill, or want of care presides Whoe'er would form it on the surest plan,
 To rear the child and long sustain the man, To shield the morals while it mends the size,

And all the powers of every food supplies, 30

Attend the lessons that the Muse shall bring,
 Suspend your spoons, and listen while I sing

But since, O man! thy life and health demand
 Not food alone, but labor from thy hand, First, in the field, beneath the sun's strong rays,
 Ask of thy Mother Earth the needful maize, She loves the race that courts her yielding
     soil,

And gives her bounties to the sons of toil
 When now the ox, obedient to thy call, Repays the loan that filled the winter stall, 40

Pursue his traces o'er the furrow'd plain,
 And plant in measur'd hills the golden grain

But when the tender germ begins to shoot,
 And the green spire declares the sprouting root,

Then guard your nursing from each greedy foe,

The insidious worm, the all-devouring crow

A little ashes sprinkled round the spire, Soon steep'd in rain, will bid the worm retire,

The feather'd robber with his hungry maw Swift flies the field before your man of straw, 50

A frightful image, such as schoolboys bring When met to burn the Pope or hang the King

Thrice in the season, through each verdant row, Wield the strong plowshare and the faithful hoe,

The faithful hoe, a double task that takes,
 To till the summer corn and roast the winter cakes

Slow springs the blade, while check'd by chilling rains,

E'er yet the sun the seat of Cancer gains,
 But when his fiercest fires emblaze the land, Then start the juices, then the roots expand, 60

Then, like a column of Corinthian mold, The stalk struts upward and the leaves unfold,

The bushy branches all the ridges fill, Entwine their arms, and kiss from hill to hill

Here cease to vex them, all your cares are done

Leave the last labors to the parent sun, Beneath his genial smiles, the well-dressed
     field,

When autumn calls, a plenteous crop shall yield.

Now the strong foliage bears the standards high, 69
 And shoots the tall top-gallants to the sky,
 The suckling ears their silky fringes bend,
 And pregnant grown, their swelling coats distend,

The loaded stalk, while still the burden grows, O'erhangs the space that runs between the rows,
 High as a hop-field waves the silent grove,
 A safe retreat for little thefts of love, When the fledged roasting-ears invite the maid
 To meet her swain beneath the new-formed shade,
 His generous hand unloads the cumbrous
     hill,
 And the green spoils her ready basket fill, 80 Small compensation for the twofold bliss, The promised wedding, and the present kiss Slight depredations these, but now the moon
 Calls from his hollow tree the sly raccoon,
 And while by night he bears his prize away, The bolder squirrel labors through the day
 Both thieves alike, but provident of time,
 A virtue rare, that almost hides their crime Then let them steal the little stores they can,
 And fill their granaries from the toils of man, 90
 We've one advantage where they take no part—
 With all their wiles, they ne'er have found the art
 To boil the Hasty Pudding, here we shine Superior far to tenants of the pine,
 This envied boon to man shall still belong, Unshared by them in substance or in song At last the closing season browns the plan,
 And ripe October gathers in the grain, Deep-loaded carts the spacious corn-house
     fill,
 The sack distended marches to the mill, 100
 The lab'ring mill beneath the burden groans,
 And showers the future pudding from the stones,
 Till the glad housewife greets the powder'd
     gold,
 And the new crop exterminates the old Ah! who can sing what every wight must feel,
 The joy that enters with the bag of meal,
 A general jubilee pervades the house, Wakes every child and gladdens every mouse

CANTO III

THE days grow short, but though the falling sun
 To the glad swain proclaims his day's work done,
 Night's pleasing shades his various tasks prolong,
 And yield new subjects to my various song For now, the corn-house filled, the harvest
     home,
 The invited neighbors to the Husking come,
 A frolic scene, where work, and mirth, and
     play,
 Unite their charms to chase the hours away Where the huge heap lies centered in the hall,
 The lamp suspended from the cheerful wall, 10 Brown, corn-fed nymphs, and strong, hard-handed beaux,
 Alternate ranged, extend in circling rows, Assume their seats, the solid mass attack,
 The dry husks rustle, and the corncobs crack,
 The song, the laugh, alternate notes resound,
 And the sweet cider trips in silence round
     The laws of husking every wight can tell,
 And sure no laws he ever keeps so well
 For each red ear a general kiss he gains, With each smut ear she smuts the luckless swains, 20
 But when to some sweet maid a prize is cast, Red as her lips and taper as her waist, She walks the round and culls one favored beau,
 Who leaps the luscious tribute to bestow Various the sport, as are the wits and brains Of well-pleased lasses and contending
     swains,
 Till the vast mound of corn is swept away,
 And he that gets the last ear wins the day Meanwhile, the housewife urges all her
     care,
 The well-earned feast to hasten and prepare 30
 The sifted meal already waits her hand,
 The milk is strained, the bowls in order
     stand,
 The fire flames high, and as a pool—that takes
 The headlong stream that o'er the milldam breaks—

Foams, roars, and rages with incessant toils,
 So the vexed caldron rages, roars, and boils First with clean salt she seasons well the food,
 Then strews the flour, and thickens all the flood Long o'er the summering fire she lets it stand,
 To stir it well demands a stronger hand, 40
 The husband takes his turn and round and round
 The ladle flies, at last the toil is crown'd,
 When to the board the thronging huskers pour,
 And take their seats as at the corn before.
 I leave them to their feast There still belong
 More useful matters to my faithful song For rules there are, though ne'er unfolded yet, Nice rules and wise, how pudding should be eat
 Some with molasses grace the luscious treat, And mix, like bards, the useful and the sweet 50
 A wholesome dish, and well deserving
 praise,
 A great resource in those bleak wintry days, When the chilled earth lies buried deep in snow,
 And raging Boreas dries the shivering cow Blest cow! thy praise shall still my notes employ,
 Great source of health, the only source of joy,
 Mother of Egypt's god,—but sure, for me,
 Were I to leave my God, I'd worship thee How oft thy teats these pious hands have pressed!
 How oft thy bounties proved my only feast!
 How oft I've fed thee with my favorite grain! 60
 And roared, like thee, to see thy children slain!
 Ye swains who know her various worth to prize, Ah! house her well from Winter's angry
 skies
 Potatoes, pumpkins, should her sadness cheer, Corn from your crib, and mashes from your beer,
 When spring returns, she'll well acquit the loan,

And nurse at once your infants and her own Mulk then with pudding, I should always choose,
 To this in future I confine my Muse, 70
 Till she in haste some further hints unfold, Good for the young, nor useless to the old First in your bowl the milk abundant take,
 Then drop with care along the silver lake Your flakes of pudding, these at first will hide
 Their little bulk beneath the swelling tide, But when their growing mass no more can sink,
 When the soft island looms above the brink, Then check your hand, you've got the portion due,
 So taught my sires, and what they taught is true 80
 There is a choice in spoons Though small appear
 The nice distinction, yet to me 'tis clear.
 The deep-bowled Gallic spoon, contrived to scoop
 In ample draughts the thin, diluted soup, Performs not well in those substantial things,
 Whose mass adhesive to the metal clings; Where the strong labial muscles must embrace
 The gentle curve, and sweep the hollow space With ease to enter and discharge the freight,
 A bowl less concave, but still more dilate, Becomes the pudding best The shape, the size, 90
 A secret rests, unknown to vulgar eyes.
 Experienced feeders can alone impart
 A rule so much above the lore of art These tuneful lips that thousand spoons have tried,
 With just precision could the point decide, Though not in song, the Muse but poorly shines
 In cones, and cubes, and geometric lines;
 Yet the true form, as near as she can tell, 99
 Is that small section of a goose-egg shell, Which in two equal portions shall divide
 The distance from the center to the side Fear not to slaver, 'tis no deadly sin;— Like the free Frenchman, from your joyous chin
 Suspend the ready napkin, or, like me,

Poise with one hand your bowl upon your knee,
Just in the zenith your wise head project,
Your full spoon, rising in a line direct,

Bold as a bucket, heed no drops that fall,
The wide-mouthed bowl will surely catch them all! 110

PHILIP FRENEAU

1752-1832

TO THE MEMORY OF THE BRAVE AMERICANS

Under General Greene, in South Carolina, who fell in the action of September 8, 1781

At Eutaw Springs the valiant died, Their limbs with dust are covered o'er—Weep on, ye springs, your tearful tide, How many heroes are no more!

If in this wreck of ruin, they Can yet be thought to claim a tear, O smite your gentle breast, and say
The friends of freedom slumber here!

Thou, who shalt trace this bloody plain,
If goodness rules thy generous breast, 10 Sigh for the wasted rural reign, Sigh for the shepherds, sunk to rest!

Stranger, their humble graves adorn,
You too may fall, and ask a tear,
'Tis not the beauty of the morn That proves the evening shall be clear —

They saw their injured country's woe,
The flaming town, the wasted field,
Then rushed to meet the insulting foe,
They took the spear—but left the shield

Led by thy conquering genius, Greene, 21
The Britons they compelled to fly, None distant viewed the fatal plain,
None grieved, in such a cause to die—

But, like the Parthian, famed of old,
Who, flying, still their arrows threw,
These routed Britons, full as bold, Retreated, and retreating slew

Now rest in peace, our patriot band, Though far from nature's limits thrown,
We trust they find a happier land, 31
A brighter sunshine of their own

THE NORTHERN SOLDIER

OURS not to sleep in shady bowers, When frosts are chilling all the plain,
And nights are cold and long the hours
To check the ardor of the swain, Who parting from his cheerful fire
All comforts doth forego,
And here and there
And everywhere
Pursues the prowling foe

But we must sleep in frost and snows, 10
No season shuts up our campaign, Hard as the oaks, we dare oppose The autumn's or the winter's reign Alike to us the winds that blow In summer's season gay, Or those that rave On Hudson's wave
And drift his ice away

For Liberty, celestial maid, With joy all hardships we endure. 20
In her blest smiles we are repaid,
In her protection are secure Then rise superior to the foe, Ye freeborn souls of fire, Respect these arms,
'Tis freedom wars,
To noble deeds aspire

Winter and death may change the scene, The cold may freeze, the ball may kill,
And dire misfortunes intervene, 30
But freedom shall be potent still To drive these Britons from our shore, Who, cruel and unkind,
With slavish chain Attempt in vain
Our freeborn limbs to bind

FROM THE HOUSE OF NIGHT

Advertisement—This Poem is founded upon the authority of Scripture, inasmuch as these sacred books assert, that 'the last enemy that shall be conquered is Death' For the purposes of poetry he is here personified, and represented as on his dying bed The scene is laid at a solitary palace, (the time midnight) which, tho' before beautiful and joyous, is now become sad and gloomy, as being the abode and receptacle of Death Its owner, an amiable, majestic youth, who had lately lost a beloved consort, nevertheless with a noble philosophical fortitude and humanity, entertains him in a friendly manner, and by employing Physicians, endeavours to restore him to health, altho' an enemy, convinced of the excellence and propriety of that divine precept, 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink' He nevertheless, as if by a spirit of prophecy, informs this (fictitiously) wicked being of the certainty of his doom, and represents to him in a pathetic manner the vanity of his expectations, either of a reception into the abodes of the just, or continuing longer to make havock of mankind upon earth The patient finding his end approaching, composes his epitaph, and orders it to be engraved on his tombstone, hinting to us thereby, that even Death and Distress have vanity, and would be remembered with honour after he is no more, altho' his whole life has been spent in deeds of devastation and murder He dies at last in the utmost agonies of despair, after agreeing with an avaricious Undertaker to intomb his bones This reflects upon the inhumanity of those men, who, not to mention an enemy, would scarcely cover a departed friend with a little dust, without certainty of reward for so doing The circumstances of his funeral are then recited, and the visionary and fabulous part of the poem disappears. It concludes with a few reflexions on the impropriety of a too great attachment to the present life, and incentives to such moral virtue as may assist in conducting us to a better

1

Trembling I write my dream, and recollect
A fearful vision at the midnight hour, So late, Death o'er me spread his sable wings,
Painted with fancies of malignant power!

2

Such was the dream the sage Chaldean saw Disclos'd to him that felt heav'n's vengeful rod,
Such was the ghost, who through deep silence cry'd,
Shall mortal man—be juster than his God?

Let others draw from smiling skies their theme,
And tell of climes that boast unfading
light,
I draw a darker scene, replete with gloom,
I sing the horrors of the House of Night.

6

By some sad means, when Reason holds no sway, Lonely I rov'd at midnight o'er a plain Where murmuring streams and mingling rivers flow
Far to their springs, or seek the sea again.

7

Sweet vernal May! tho' then thy woods in bloom Flourish'd, yet nought of this could Fancy
see,
No wild pinks bless'd the meads, no green the fields,
And naked seem'd to stand each lifeless tree

8

Dark was the sky, and not one friendly star Shone from the zenith or horizon, clear, Mist sate upon the woods, and darkness rode
In her black chariot, with a wild career.

9

And from the woods the late resounding note Issued of the loquacious Whip-poor-will,

<sup>1</sup> The title to the selection has been given by the editors

Hoarse, howling dogs, and nightly roving wolves Clamour'd from far off cliffs invisible.

10

Rude, from the wide extended Chesapeake
I heard the winds the dashing waves assail, And saw from far, by picturing fancy form'd,
The black ship travelling through the noisy gale.

11

At last, by chance and guardian fancy led,
I reach'd a noble dome, rais'd fair and high,
And saw the light from upper windows
flame,
Presage of mirth and hospitality.

12

And by that light around the dome appear'd
A mournful garden of autumnal hue, Its lately pleasing flowers all drooping stood Amidst high weeds that in rank plenty grew

13

The Primrose there, the violet darkly blue, Daisies and fair Narcissus ceas'd to rise, Gay spotted pinks their charming bloom withdrew,
And Polyanthus quench'd its thousand dyes

14

No pleasant fruit or blossom gaily smil'd, Nought but unhappy plants or trees were seen,
The yew, the myrtle, and the church-yard elm,
The cypress, with its melancholy green.

15

There cedars dark, the osier, and the pine, Shorn tamarisks, and weeping willows
grew,
The poplar tall, the lotos, and the lime,
And pyracantha did her leaves renew.

16

The poppy there, companion to repose, Display'd her blossoms that began to fall,
And here the purple amaranthus rose With mint strong-scented, for the funeral.

17

And here and there with laurel shrubs between A tombstone lay, inscrib'd with strains of
woe,
And stanzas sad, throughout the dismal
green,
Lamented for the dead that slept below.

23

Then up three winding stairs my feet were brought To a high chamber, hung with mourning sad,
The unsnuff'd candles glar'd with visage dim,
'Midst grief, in ecstasy of woe run mad

24

A wide leaf'd table stood on either side, Well fraught with phials, half their liquids spent,
And from a couch, behind the curtain's veil,
I heard a hollow voice of loud lament

25

Turning to view the object whence it came,
My frightened eyes a horrid form survey'd, Fancy, I own thy power—Death on the couch,
With fleshless limbs, at rueful length, was laid.

26

And o'er his head flew jealousies and cares, Ghosts, imps, and half the black Tartarian crew, Arch-angels damn'd, nor was their Prince remote,
Borne on the vaporous wings of Stygian dew.

27

Around his bed, by the dull flambeaux' glare,
I saw pale phantoms—Rage to madness vest,
Wan, wasting grief, and ever musing care, Distressful pain, and poverty perplex.

28

Sad was his countenance, if we can call That countenance, where only bones were

And eyes sunk in their sockets, dark and low,
And teeth, that only show'd themselves to grin

29

Reft was his skull of hair, and no fresh bloom
Of cheerful mirth sate on his visage hoar Sometimes he rais'd his head, while deep-drawn groans Were mixt with words that did his fate deplore.

30

Oft did he wish to see the daylight spring, And often toward the window lean'd to hear,
Fore-runner of the scarlet-mantled morn,
The early note of wakeful Chanticleer.

98

*'Death in this tomb his weary bones hath laid,
'Sick of dominion o'er the human kind—
'Behold what devastations he hath made,
'Survey the millions by his arm confin'd*

99

*'Six thousand years has sovereign sway been mine,
'None, but myself, can real glory claim,
'Great Regent of the world I reign'd alone,
'And princes trembled when my mandate came*

100

*'Vast and unmatched'd throughout the world, my fame
'Takes place of gods, and asks no mortal date—
'No, by myself, and by the heavens, I swear,
'Not Alexander's name is half so great.*

101

*'Nor swords nor darts my prowess could withstand,
'All quit their arms, and bow'd to my decree,
'Even mighty Julius died beneath my hand,
'For slaves and Cæsars were the same to me'* 102

*'Traveller, wouldst thou his noblest trophies seek,
'Search in no narrow spot obscure for those,*

*'The sea profound, the surface of all land
'Is moulded with the myriads of his foes'*

103

Scarce had he spoke, when on the lofty dome Rush'd from the clouds a hoarse resounding blast—
Round the four eves so loud and sad it play'd
As though all music were to breathe its last 104

Warm was the gale, and such as travellers say Sport with the winds on Zaara's barren waste,
Black was the sky, a mourning carpet spread,
Its azure blotted, and its stars o'ercast'

105

Lights in the air like burning stars were hurl'd, Dogs howl'd, heaven mutter'd, and the tempest blew,
The red half-moon peeped from behind a cloud
As if in dread the amazing scene to view.

106

The mournful trees that in the garden
stood
Bent to the tempest as it rush'd along,
The elm, the myrtle, and the cypress sad
More melancholy tun'd its bellowing song.

107

No more that elm its noble branches
spread,
The yew, the cypress, or the myrtle tree, Rent from the roots the tempest tore them
down,
And all the grove in wild confusion lay.

108

Yet, mindful of his dread command, I part Glad from the magic dome—nor found relief, Damps from the dead hung heavier round my heart, While sad remembrance rous'd her stores of grief.

FROM MARS AND HYMEN

THE turtle on yon' withered bough, That lately mourn'd her murder'd mate,

Has found another comrade now—Such changes all await!
Again her drooping plume is drest,
Again she's willing to be blest
And takes her lover to her nest.

If nature has decreed it so
With all above, and all below, Let us like them forget our woe, 10
And not be kill'd with sorrow
If I should quit your arms to-night And chance to die before 'twas light, I would advise you—and you might Love again to-morrow

THE WILD HONEYSUCKLE

FAIR flower, that dost so comely grow, Hid in this silent, dull retreat, Untouched thy honied blossoms blow, Unseen thy little branches greet No roving foot shall crush thee
here,
No busy hand provoke a tear.

By Nature's self in white arrayed, She bade thee shun the vulgar eye,
And planted here the guardian shade,
And sent soft waters murmuring by, 10
Thus quietly thy summer goes, Thy days declining to repose

Smit with those charms, that must decay,
I grieve to see your future doom, They died—nor were those flowers more gay,
The flowers that did in Eden bloom, Unpitying frosts, and Autumn's power
Shall leave no vestige of this flower.

From morning suns and evening dews
At first thy little being came 20
If nothing once, you nothing lose,
For when you die you are the same,
The space between, is but an hour,
The frail duration of a flower

THE INDIAN BURYING GROUND <sup>1</sup>

IN spite of all the learned have said, I still my old opinion keep,
The posture, that we give the dead Points out the soul's eternal sleep

Not so the ancients of these lands—
The Indian, when from life released, Again is seated with his friends,
And shares again the joyous feast

His imaged birds, and painted bowl,
And venison, for a journey dressed, 10 Bespeak the nature of the soul, Activity, that knows no rest

His bow, for action ready bent,
And arrows, with a head of stone,
Can only mean that life is spent,
And not the old ideas gone

Thou, stranger, that shalt come this way,
No fraud upon the dead commit—Observe the swelling turf, and say They do not lie, but here they sit 20

Here still a lofty rock remains,
On which the curious eye may trace (Now wasted, half, by wearing rains)
The fancies of a ruder race

Here still an aged elm aspires, Beneath whose far-projecting shade (And which the shepherd still admires)
The children of the forest played!

There oft a restless Indian queen (Pale Shebah with her braided hair) 30
And many a barbarous form is seen To chide the man that lingers there

By midnight moons, o'er moistening dews,
In habit for the chase arrayed,
The hunter still the deer pursues,
The hunter and the deer—a shade!

And long shall timorous Fancy see The painted chief, and pointed spear,
And Reason's self shall bow the knee
To shadows and delusions here 40

THE CULPRIT FAY <sup>1</sup>

*'My visual orbs are purged from film, and lo'
Instead of Anster's turnip-bearing vales
I see old fairy land's miraculous show'
Her trees of unsel kissed by freakish gales, Her Ouphs that, cloaked in leaf-gold, skim the breeze,
And fairies, swarming thick as mites in rotten cheese'*

TENNANT's Anster Fair

1

'Tis the middle watch of a summer's night—
The earth is dark, but the heavens are bright,
Nought is seen in the vault on high But the moon, and the stars, and the cloudless sky,
And the flood which rolls its milky hue,
A river of white on the welkin blue
The moon looks down on old Cronest, She mellowes the shades on his shaggy
breast,
And seems his huge gray form to throw In a silver cone on the waves below, 10
His sides are broken by spots of shade, By the walnut bough and the cedar made,
And through their clustering branches dark Glimmers and dies the fire-fly's spark—Like starry twinkles that momentarily break Through the rifts of the gathering tempest rack

2

The stars are on the moving stream,
And fling, as its ripples gently flow,
A burnished length of wavy beam In an eel-like, spiral line below, 20
The winds are whist and the owl is still,
The bat in the shelvy rock is hid,
And nought is heard on the lonely hill But the cricket's chirp, and the answer shrill
Of the gauze-winged katydid,
And the plaint of the wailing whuppoorwill,

Who mourns unseen, and ceaseless sings, Ever a note of wail and woe,
Till morning spreads her rosy wings,
And earth and sky in her glances glow. 30 3

'Tis the hour of fairy ban and spell,
The wood-tick has kept the minutes well, He has counted them all with click and
stroke,
Deep in the heart of the mountain oak,
And he has awakened the sentry elfe
Who sleeps with him in the haunted tree,
To bid him ring the hour of twelve,
And call the fays to their revelry, Twelve small strokes on his tinkling bell—('Twas made of the white snail's pearly shell) 40
'Midnight comes and all is well!
Hither Goblins wing your way!
'Tis the dawn of the fairy day'

4

They come from beds of lichen green,
They creep from the mullen's velvet screen,
Some on the backs of beetles fly From the silver tops of moon-touched trees,
Where they swung in their cobweb hammocks high,
And rocked about in the evening breeze, Some from the hum-bird's downy nest— 50
They had driven him out by elfin power,
And pillowed on plumes of his rainbow
breast,
Had slumbered there till the charmed hour,
Some had lain in a scoop of the rock,
With glittering ising-stars inlaid,
And some had opened the four-o'clock,
And stole within its purple shade And now they throng to the moonlight glade,
Above—below—on every side,
Their little nimble forms arrayed 60
In the tricky pomp of fairy pride.

5

They come not now to print the lea,
In freak and dance around the tree,
Or at the mushroom board to sup,

And drink the dew from the buttercup,
 A scene of sorrow waits them now,
 For an Ouphe has broken his vestal vow;
 He has loved an earthly maid,
 And left for her his woodland shade,
 He has lain upon her lips of dew, 70
 He has sunned him in her eye of blue, He has fanned her cheek with his wing of air,

And played in the ringlets of her hair,
 And, nestling on her snowy breast, Forgot the lily-king's behest
 For this the shadowy tribes of air,
 To the elfin court must haste away,
 And now they stand expectant there,
 To hear the doom of the culprit fay.

6

The throne was reared upon the grass, 80
 Of the spice wood and the sassafras, On pillars of mottled tortoise-shell Hung the burnished canopy—
 And o'er it gorgeous curtains fell Of the tulip's crimson drapery
 The monarch sat on his judgment-seat,
 On his brow the crown imperial shone,
 The prisoner fay was at his feet, And his peers were ranged around the throne
 He waved his sceptre in the air, 90
 He looked around and calmly spoke,
 His brow was grave and his eye severe,
 But his voice in a softened accent broke

7

'Fairy! Fairy! list and mark—Thou hast broke thy elfin chain, Thy flame-wood lamp is quenched and dark,
 And thy wings are dyed with a deadly stain,
 Thou hast sullied thine elfin purity
 In the glance of a mortal maiden's eye, Thou hast scorned our dread decree, 100
 And thou shouldst pay the forfeit high;
 But well I know her sinless mind Is pure as the angel forms above, Gentle and meek, and chaste and kind,
 Such as a spirit well might love, Spirit! had she spot or taint, Bitter had been thy punishment Tied to the hornet's shardy wings, Tossed on the pricks of nettle stings,
 Or seven long ages doomed to dwell 110
 With the lazy worm in the walnut-shell,

Or every night to writhe and bleed Beneath the tread of the centipede, Or bound in a cobweb dungeon dim,
 Your jailor a spider huge and grim, Amid the carrion bodies to lie, Of the worm, and the bug, and the murdered fly—

These it had been your lot to bear, Had a stain been found on the earthly fair

Now list, and mark our mild decree— 120 Fairy! thus your doom must be

8

'Thou shalt seek the beach of sand Where the water bounds the elfin land, Thou shalt watch the oozy brine Till the sturgeon leaps in the bright moonshine,
 Then dart the glistening arch below,
 And catch a drop from his silver bow
 The water-sprites will wield their arms And dash around, with roar and rave,
 And vain are the woodland spirits' charms,
 They are the imps that rule the wave 131 Yet trust thee in thy single might,
 If thy heart be pure and thy spirit right, Thou shalt win the warlock fight

9

'If the spray-bead gem be won,
 The stain of thy wing is washed away,
 But another errand must be done Ere thy crime is lost for aye, Thy flame-wood lamp is quenched and
 dark,
 Thou must re-illumine its spark 140 Mount thy steed and spur him high
 To the heaven's blue canopy,
 And when thou seest a shooting star, Follow it fast and follow it far—
 The last faint spark of its burning train Shall light thy fairy fire again Thou hast heard our sentence—say, Elf! to the water-side, away!'

10

The goblin marked his monarch well, He spoke no word, but he bowed him
 low, 150
 Then plucked a crimson colen-bell,
 And turned him round in act to go
 The way is long, he cannot fly,
 His soiled wing has lost its power,
 And he wends down the mountain high,

For many a sore and weary hour
 Through dreary beds of tangled fern, Through groves of nightshade dark and dern,
 Over the grass and through the brake,
 Where toils the ant and sleeps the snake,
     Now on the violet's azure flush 161
 He skips along in lightsome mood,
     And now he thrids the bramble bush, Till its points are dyed in fairy blood He has leapt the bog, he has pierced the brier,
 He has swum the brook, and waded the mire,
 Till his spirit sank, and his limbs grew weak,
 And the red waxed fainter in his cheek
 He had fallen to the ground outright, For rugged and dim was his onward track, 170

But there came a spotted toad in sight,
     And he laughed as he jumped upon her back He bridled her mouth with a silk-weed twist,
     He lashed her side with an osier thong,
 And now through evening's dewy mist,
     With leap and spring they bound along,
 Till the mountain's magic verge is past,
 And the beach of sand is reached at last.

II

Soft and pale is the moony beam, Moveless still the glassy stream, 180
 The wave is clear, the beach is bright With snowy shells and sparkling stones,
 The shore-surge comes in ripples light,
     In murmurings faint and distant moans,
 And ever anon in the silence deep Is heard the splash of the sturgeon's leap,
 And the bend of his graceful bow is seen—
 A glistening arch of silver sheen, Spanning the wave of burnished blue,
 And dripping with gems of the river dew.

12

The elfin cast a glance around, 191
     As he lighted down from his courser toad,
 Then round his breast his wings he wound,
     And close to the river's brink he strode,
 He sprang on a rock, he prayed a prayer, Above his head his hands he threw,
 Then tossed a tiny curve in air,
     And headlong plunged in the waters blue

13

Upsprung the spirits of the wave,
 From sea-silk beds in their coral cave, 200
 With snail-plate armor snatched in haste, They speed their way through the liquid
     waste,
 Some are rapidly borne along
 On the mailed shrimp or the prickly prong, Some on the blood-red leeches glide,
 Some on the stony star-fish ride,
 Some on the back of the lancing squab,
 And some on the sideling soldier-crab,
 And some on the jellied quarl, who flings
 At once a thousand streamy stings— 210
 They cut the wave with the living oar
 And hurry on to the moonlight shore,
 To guard their realm and chase away
 The footsteps of the invading fay

14

Fearlessly he skims along,
 His hope is high, and his limbs are strong,
 He spreads his arms like the swallow's wing,
 And he throws his feet with a frog-like flung,
 His locks of gold on the waters shune,
     At his breast the puny foam-beads rise,
 His back gleams bright above the brine, 221
     And the wake-line foam behind him lies.
 But the water-sprites are gathering near To check his course along the tide, Their warriors come in swift career
     And hem him round on every side,
 On his thigh the leech has fixed his hold,
 The quarl's long arms are round him rolled,
 The prickled prong has pierced his skin,
 The squab has thrown his javelin, 230
 The gritty star has rubbed him raw,
 And the crab has struck with his giant claw,
 He howls with rage, and he shrieks with pain,
 He strikes around, but his blows are vain, Hopeless is the unequal fight, Fairy! nought is left but flight.

15

He turned around and fled amain
 With hurry and dash to the beach again,
 He twisted over from side to side,
 He laid his cheek to the cleaving tide 240
 The strokes of his plunging arms are fleet,

And with all his strength he flings his feet,
But the water-sprites are around him still,
To cross his path and to work him ill.
They bade the rock before him rise,
They flung the sea-fire in his eyes,
They stunned his ears with the scallop
stroke,
With the porpoise heave and the drum-fish croak

Oh! but a weary wight was he When he reached the foot of the dog-wood tree, 250

Gashed and wounded, stiff and sore,
He laid him down on the sandy shore,
He blessed the force of the charmed line,
And he banned the water-goblin's spite,
For he saw around in the sweet moonshine,
Their little wee faces above the brine, Giggling and laughing with all their might At the piteous hap of the fairy wight

16

Soon he gathered the balsam dew From the sorrel leaf and the henbane bud, 260
Over each wound the balm he drew,
And with cobweb lint he staunched the blood
The mild west wind was soft and low,
It cooled the heat of his burning brow,
And he felt new life in his fibres shoot,
As he sucked the juice of the cal'mus root,
And now he treads the fatal shore,
As fresh and vigorous as before

17

Wrapped in musing stands the sprite,
'Tis the middle wane of night, 270
His task is hard, the ways are far,
But he must do his errand right Ere dawning mounts her beamy car,
And rolls her chariot wheels of light,
And vain are the spells of fairy-land,
He must work with a human hand

18

He cast a saddened eye around,
And what to do he could not tell,
But he leapt with joy when on the ground,
He saw a purple mussel-shell, 280 Thither he ran, and he bent him low, He heaved at the stern and he heaved at the bow,
And he pushed her over the yielding sand,

Till he came to the verge of the haunted land
She was as lovely a pleasure boat As ever fairy had paddled in,
For she glowed with purple paint without,
And shone with silvery pearl within,
A sculling notch in the stern he made,
An oar he shaped of the bootle blade, 290 Then sprung to his seat with a lightsome leap,
And launched afar on the calm blue deep

19

The imps of the river yell and rave,
They had no power above the wave, But they heaved the billow before the prow,
And they dashed the surge against her side,
And they struck her keel with jerk and blow, Till her gunwale bent to the rocking tide.
She wimpled about in the pale moonbeam, Like a feather that floats on a wave-tossed stream, 300
And momentarily athwart her track
The quarl upreared his island back, And the fluttering scallop behind would float,
And spatter the water about the boat,
But he bailed her out with his colen-bell,
And he kept her trimmed with a wary tread,
While on every side like lightning fell
The heavy strokes of the bootle blade

20

Onward still he held his way, Till he came where the column of moonshine lay, 310
And saw beneath the surface dim
The brown-backed sturgeon slowly swim, Around him were the goblin train—
But he sculled with all his might and main,
And followed wherever the sturgeon led,
Till he saw him upward point his head,
Then he dropped his paddle blade,
And held his colen goblet up To catch the drop in its crimson cup

21

With sweeping tail and quivering fin, 320
Through the wave the sturgeon flew,
And, like the heaven-shot javelin,

He sprung above the waters blue Instant as the star-fall light,
 He plunged him in the deep again,
 But left in shining silver bright,
 The rainbow of the moony main.
 It was a sweet and lovely sight
 To see the puny goblin there,
 He seemed an angel form of light, 330
 With azure wing and sunny hair, Throned on a cloud of purple fair, Circled with blue and edged with white,
 And sitting at the fall of even Beneath the bow of summer heaven

22

A moment—and its lustre fell,
 But ere it met the billow blue,
 He caught within his crimson bell,
 A droplet of its sparkling dew Joy thee, fay! thy task is done, 340 Thy wings are pure, for the gem is won, Cheerly ply thy dripping oar,
 And haste away to the elfin shore

23

He turns, and lo! on either side
 The ripples on his path divide, And the track o'er which his boat must pass
 Is smooth as a sheet of polished glass Around, their limbs the sea-nymphs lave,
 With snowy arms half swelling out, While on the glossed and gleamy wave 350
 Their sea-green ringlets loosely float,
 They swim around with smile and song,
 They press the bark with pearly hand,
 And gently urge her course along,
 Toward the beach of speckled sand,
 And, as he lightly leapt to land,
 They bade adieu with nod and bow,
 Then gaily kissed each little hand,
 And dropped in the crystal deep below

24

A moment stayed the fairy there, 360
 He kissed the beach and breathed a prayer, Then spread his wings of gilded blue,
 And on to the elfin court he flew.
 As ever ye saw a bubble rise,
 And shine with a thousand blended dyes, Till lessening, far through ether driven,
 It mingles with the hues of heaven
 As, at the glimpse of dawning pale,
 The lance-fly spreads his silken sail,
 And gleams with blendings soft and bright,

Till lost in the shades of fading night, 371
 So rose from earth the lovely fay,
 So vanished, far in heaven away!

. . . .

Up fairy! quit thy chickweed bower,
 The cricket has called the second hour, Twice again, and the lark will rise To kiss the streakings of the skies, Up! thy charmed armor don,
 Thou wilt need it ere the night be gone

25

He put his acorn helmet on, 380
 It was plumed with the silk of the thistle-
 down
 The corslet plate that guarded his breast
 Was once the wild bee's golden vest,
 His cloak, of a thousand mingled dyes,
 Was formed of the wings of butterflies, His shield was the shell of a lady-bug queen,
 Studs of gold on a ground of green,
 And the quivering lance which he brandished bright,
 Was the sting of a wasp he had slain in fight
 Swift he bestrode his fire-fly steed, 390
 He bared his blade of the bent grass blue,
 He drove his spurs of the cockle-seed, And away like a glance of thought he flew,
 To skim the heavens and follow far
 The fiery trail of the rocket-star.

26

The moth-fly, as he shot the air, Crept under the leaf, and hid her there,
 The katydid forgot to bray,
 The prowling gnat fled fast away,
 The fell mosquito checked his drone 400
 And folded his wings until the fay was gone,
 And the wily beetle dropped his head,
 And fell on the ground as if he were dead, They couched them close in the darksome
 shade,
 They quaked all o'er and they sweat with fear,
 For they had felt the blue bent blade,
 And writhed at the prick of the elfin spear,
 Many a time on a summer's night, When the sky was clear and the moon was bright,

They had been roused from the haunted ground, 410
With the yelp and the bay of the fairy hound,
They had heard the tny bugle horn, They had heard the twang of the maize-silk string,
When the vine-twig bows were tightly drawn,
And the nettle shaft through air was borne, Feathered with down from the humbird's wing.
And now they deemed the courier ouphe Some hunter sprite of the eildrich
ground,
And they watched till they saw him mount the roof
That canopies the world around, 420
Then glad they left their covert lair,
And freaked about in the midnight air.

27

Up to the vaulted firmament
His path the fire-fly courser bent,
And at every gallop on the wind,
He flung a glittering spark behind;
He flies like a feather in the blast Till the first light cloud in heaven is past, But the shapes of air have begun their work,
And a drizzly mist is round him cast, 430
He cannot see through the mantle murk,
He shivers with cold, but he urges fast, Through storm and darkness, sleet and
shade,
He lashes his steed and spurs amain, For shadowy hands have twitched the rein,
And flame-shot tongues around him played,
And near him many a fiendish eye Glared with a fell malignity,
And yells of rage, and shrieks of fear, Came screaming on his startled ear. 440

28

His wings are wet around his breast,
The plume hangs dripping from his crest, His eyes are blind with the lightning's
glare,
And his ears are stunned with the thunder's blare,
But he gave a shout, and his blade he drew,
He thrust before and he struck behind, Till he pierced their cloudy bodies through,

And gashed their shadowy limbs of wind, Howling, the musty spectres flew,
They rend the air with spiteful cries, 450
For he has gained the welkin blue,
And the land of clouds behind him lies

29

Up to the cope careering swift In breathless motion fast, Fleet as the swallow cuts the drift
Or the sea-roc rides the blast,
The sapphire sheet of eve is shot,
The sphered moon is past,
The earth it seems a tiny blot On a sheet of azure cast 460
And oh! it was sweet in the clear moonlight, To tread the starry plain of even,
To mark the thousand eyes of night,
And feel the cooling breath of heaven
But the elfin made no stop nor stay Till he came to the bank of the milky-way, Then he checked his courser's foot,
And watched for the glimpse of the planet-shoot

30

Sudden along the snowy tide
Which swelled to meet their footfall, 470
The sylphs of heaven are seen to glide, Attired in sunset's crimson pall,
Around the fay they weave the dance,
They skip before him on the plain,
And one hath taken his wasp-sting lance,
And one upholds his bridle rein, With warblings wild they led him on To where, through clouds of amber seen, Studded with stars, resplendent shone
The palace of the sylphid queen 480
Its spiral columns gleaming bright Were streamers of the northern light, Its curtain's light and lovely flush Was of the morning's rosy blush,
And the ceiling fair that rose aboon
The white and feathery fleece of noon

31

But oh! how fair the shape that lay Beneath a rainbow bending bright, She seemed to the entranced fay
The loveliest of the forms of light, 490 Her mantle was the purple rolled At twilight in the west afar,
'Twas tied with threads of dawning gold,
And buttoned with a sparkling star

Her face was like the lily rune That hides the vestal planet's hue,
 Her eyes two beamlets from the moon,
 Set floating in the welkin blue.
 Her hair is like the sunny beam,
 And the diamond gems which round it gleam 500
 Are the pure drops of dewy even Which ne'er have left their native heaven

32

She raised her eyes to the wondering sprite, And they leapt with smiles, for well I ween
 Never before in the bowers of light
 Had the form of an earthly fay been seen Long she looked in his tiny face, Long with his butterfly cloak she played,
 She smoothed his wing of azure lace,
 And handled the tassel of his blade, 510
 And as he told in accents low
 The story of his love and woe,
 She felt new pain in her bosom rise,
 And the tear-drop started in her eyes And 'Oh! sweet spirit of earth,' she cried, 'Return no more to your woodland height,
 But ever here with me abide
 In the land of everlasting light!
 Within the fleecy drift we'll lie, We'll hang upon the rainbow's rim, 520
 And all the jewels of the sky Around thy brow shall brightly beam,
 And thou shalt bathe thee in the stream That rolls its whitening foam aboon,
 And ride upon the lightning's gleam,
 And dance upon the orbèd moon!
 We'll sit within the Pleiad ring, We'll rest on Orion's starry belt,
 And I will bid my sylphs to sing
 The song that makes the dew-mist melt, Their harps are of the umber shade, 531
 That hides the blush of waking day,
 And every gleamy string is made Of silvery moonshine's lengthened ray,
 And thou shalt pillow on my breast, While heavenly breathings float around,
 And, with the sylphs of ether blest, Forget the joys of fairy ground.'

33

She was lovely and fair to see
 And the elfin's heart beat fitfully; 540
 But lovelier far and still more fair,
 The earthly form imprinted there,

Nought he saw in the heavens above
 Was half so dear as his mortal love,
 For he thought upon her look so meek,
 And he thought of the light flush on her cheek,
 Never again might he bask or lie
 On that sweet cheek and moonlight eye;
 But in his dreams her form to see,
 To clasp her in his reverie, 550
 To think upon his virgin bride, Was worth all heaven and earth beside.

34

'Lady,' he cried, 'I have sworn to-night, On the word of a fairy knight,
 To do my sentence task aright,
 My honor scarce is free from stain,
 I may not soil its snows again, Betide me weal, betide me woe,
 Its mandate must be answered now '
 Her bosom heaved with many a sigh, 560
 The tear was in her drooping eye,
 But she had led him to the palace gate,
 And called the sylphs who hovered there,
 And bade them fly and bring him straight Of clouds condensed a sable car With charm and spell she blessed it there,
 From all the fiends of upper air,
 Then round him cast the shadowy shroud,
 And tied his steed behind the cloud,
 And pressed his hand as she bade him fly Far to the verge of the northern sky, 571
 For by its wane and wavering light
 There was a star that would fall to-night

35

Borne afar on the wings of the blast, Northward away, he speeds him fast,
 And the courser follows the cloudy wain, Till the hoof-strokes fall like pattering rain
 The clouds roll backward as he flies, Each flickering star behind him lies,
 And he has reached the northern plain, 580
 And backed his fire-fly steed again, Ready to follow in its flight
 The streaming of the rocket light

36

The star is yet in the vault of heaven,
 But it rocks in the summer gale,
 And now 'tis fitful and uneven,
 And now 'tis deadly pale,
 And now 'tis wrapped in sulphur smoke,
 And quenched is its rayless beam,
 And now with a rattling thunder-stroke, 590

It bursts in flash and flame
 As swift as the glance of the arrowy lance Which the storm-spirit flings from high,
 The star-shoot flew o'er the welkin blue,
 As it fell from the sheeted sky
 As swift as the wind in its trail behind,
 The elfin gallops along,
 The fiends of the cloud are bellowing loud,
 But the sylphid charm is strong;
 He gallops unhurt in the shower of fire, 600 While the cloud-fiends shrink from the blaze,
 He watches each flake till its sparks expire,
 And rides in the light of its rays
 But he drove his steed to the lightning's speed,
 And he caught a glimmering spark, Then wheeled around to the haunted
 ground,
 And sped through the midnight dark.

Ouphe and goblin! imp and sprite!
 Elf of eve! and starry fay!
 Ye that love the moon's light, 610 Hither-hither wing your way, Join ye in a jocund ring,
 Hand to hand, and wing to wing,
 Round the wild witch-hazel tree.

Hail the wanderer again,
 With dance and song, and lute and lyre, Pure his wing and strong his cham,
 And doubly bright his fairy fire
 Then twine ye in an eerie round, Brush the dew and print the lea, 620
 Skip and gambol, hop and bound,
 Round the wild witch-hazel tree

The beetle guards our holy ground,
 He flies about the haunted place,
 And if mortal there be found,
 He hums in his ears and flaps his face,
 The leaf-harp sounds our roundelay,
 The owl's eyes our lanthornes be,
 Thus we revel, dance and play,
 Round the wild witch-hazel tree. 630

But hark! from tower on tree-top high,
 The sentry elf his call has made,
 A streak is in the eastern sky, Shapes of moonlight flit and fade!
 The hullock gleams in morning spring,
 The skylark shakes his dappled wing,
 The day-glumpse glistens on the lawn,
 The cocks have crowed, the fays are gone

ON THE DEATH OF JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE

*The good die first,
 And they, whose hearts are dry as summer dust,
 Burn to the socket* WORDSWORTH

GREEN be the turf above thee, Friend of my better days!
 None knew thee but to love thee,
 Nor named thee but to praise.

Tears fell, when thou wert dying,
 From eyes unused to weep,
 And long where thou art lying,
 Will tears the cold turf steep.

When hearts, whose truth was proven,
 Like thine, are laid in earth, 10
 There should a wreath be woven
 To tell the world their worth,

And I, who woke each morrow
 To clasp thy hand in mine,
 Who shared thy joy and sorrow,
 Whose weal and wo were thine,

It should be mine to braid it Around thy faded brow, But I've in vain essayed it,
 And feel I cannot now 20

While memory bids me weep thee, Nor thoughts nor words are free,
 The grief is fixed too deeply That mourns a man like thee

MARCO BOZZARIS <sup>1</sup>

AT midnight, in his guarded tent,
 The Turk was dreaming of the hour When Greece, her knee in suppliance bent, Should tremble at his power In dreams, through camp and court, he bore
 The trophies of a conqueror,
 In dreams his song of triumph heard, Then wore his monarch's signet ring Then pressed that monarch's throne—a king,
 As wild his thoughts, and gay of wing,   10
 As Eden's garden bird

At midnight, in the forest shades, Bozzaris ranged his Suliote band, True as the steel of their tried blades, Heroes in heart and hand
 There had the Persian's thousands stood,
 There had the glad earth drunk their blood On old Plataea's day,
 And now there breathed that haunted air
 The sons of sires who conquered there,   20
 With arm to strike, and soul to dare, As quick, as far as they

An hour passed on—the Turk awoke, That bright dream was his last,
 He woke—to hear his sentries shriek,
 'To arms! they come! the Greek! the Greek!'
 He woke—to die midst flame, and smoke,
 And shout, and groan, and sabre stroke,
 And death shots falling thick and fast
 As lightnings from the mountain cloud,   30
 And heard, with voice as trumpet loud, Bozzaris cheer his band
 'Strike—till the last armed foe expires, Strike—for your altars and your fires,
 Strike—for the green graves of your sires, God—and your native land!'

They fought—like brave men, long and well, They piled that ground with Moslem
     slain,
 They conquered—but Bozzaris fell, Bleeding at every vein   40

<sup>1</sup> 'Marco Bozzaris, the Epaminondas of modern Greece—He fell in a night attack upon the Turkish Camp at Laspi, the site of the ancient Plataea, August 20, 1823, and expired in the moment of victory. His last words were—"To die for liberty is a pleasure and not a pain"' Author's note, Altwick Castle (N. Y., 1827), 63

His few surviving comrades saw His smile when rang their proud hurrah,
 And the red field was won,
 Then saw in death his eyelids close Calmly, as to a night's repose, Like flowers at set of sun

Come to the bridal chamber, Death!
 Come to the mother's, when she feels,
 For the first time, her first-born's breath, Come when the blessed seals   50
 That close the pestilence are broke,
 And crowded cures wail its stroke;
 Come in consumption's ghastly form,
 The earthquake shock, the ocean storm,
 Come when the heart beats high and warm, With banquet song, and dance, and wine,
 And thou art terrible—the tear,
 The groan, the knell, the pall, the bier,
 And all we know, or dream, or fear Of agony, are thine   60

But to the hero, when his sword
 Has won the battle for the free, Thy voice sounds like a prophet's word,
 And in its hollow tones are heard The thanks of millions yet to be.
 Come, when his task of fame is wrought—Come, with her laurel-leaf, blood-bought—Come in her crowning hour—and then Thy sunken eye's unearthly light   70
 To him is welcome as the sight Of sky and stars to prisoned men.
 Thy grasp is welcome as the hand Of brother in a foreign land, Thy summons welcome as the cry That told the Indian isles were nigh
 To the world-seeking Genoese,
 When the land wind, from woods of palm,
 And orange groves, and fields of balm, Blew o'er the Haytian seas

Bozzaris! with the storied brave   80
 Greece nurtured in her glory's time, Rest thee—there is no prouder grave,
 Even in her own proud clime
 She wore no funeral weeds for thee, Nor bade the dark hearse wave its plume,
 Like torn branch from death's leafless tree
 In sorrow's pomp and pageantry, The heartless luxury of the tomb
 But she remembers thee as one Long loved, and for a season gone,   90
 For thee her poet's lyre is wreathed,

Her marble wrought, her music breathed,
 For thee she rings the birthday bells;
 Of thee her babes' first lisping tells,
 For thine her evening prayer is said
 At palace couch and cottage bed,
 Her soldier, closing with the foe,
 Gives for thy sake a deadlier blow,
 His plighted maiden, when she fears For him, the joy of her young years, 100 Thinks of thy fate, and checks her tears
     And she, the mother of thy boys, Though in her eye and faded cheek Is read the grief she will not speak,
     The memory of her buried joys,
 And even she who gave thee birth,
 Will, by their pilgrim-circled hearth,
     Talk of thy doom without a sigh
 For thou art Freedom's now, and Fame's, One of the few, the immortal names, 110
     That were not born to die

THE FIELD OF THE GROUNDED ARMS

SARATOGA

STRANGERS! your eyes are on that valley fixed Intently, as we gaze on vacancy,
 When the mind's wings o'erspread
     The spirit-world of dreams

 True, 'tis a scene of loveliness—the bright Green dwelling of the summer's first-born Hours,
     Whose wakened leaf and bud
     Are welcoming the morn

 And morn returns the welcome, sun and cloud
 Smile on the green earth from their home in heaven, 10
     Even as a mother smiles Above her cradled boy,

 And wreath their light and shade o'er plain and mountain, O'er sleepless seas of grass whose waves are flowers,
     'The river's golden shores,
     The forests of dark pines

 The song of the wild bird is on the wind,
 The hum of the wild bee, the music wild

Of waves upon the bank,
 Of leaves upon the bough 20

But all is song and beauty in the land, Beneath her skies of June, then journey on,
     A thousand scenes like this Will greet you ere the eve

Ye linger yet—ye see not, hear not now
 The sunny smile, the music of to-day,
     Your thoughts are wandering up,
     Far up the stream of time,

And boyhood's lore and fireside listened tales Are rushing on your memories, as ye breathe 30
     That valley's storied name, FIELD OF THE GROUNDED ARMS

Strangers no more, a kindred 'pride of place',
 Pride in the gift of country and of name, Speaks in your eye and step—Ye tread your native land

And your high thoughts are on her glory's day,
 The solemn sabbath of the week of battle, Whose tempests bowed to earth
     Her foeman's banner here 40

The forest leaves lay scattered cold and dead,
 Upon the withered grass that autumn
     morn,
     When, with as withered hearts
     And hopes as dead and cold,

A gallant army formed their last array Upon that field, in silence and deep gloom,
     And at their conqueror's feet Laid their war-weapons down

Sullen and stern, disarmed but not dishonored, Brave men, but brave in vain, they yielded there 50
     The soldier's trial task
     Is not alone 'to die'

Honor to chivalry! the conqueror's breath Stains not the ermine of his foeman's fame, Nor mocks his captive's doom—
     The bitterest cup of war

But be that bitterest cup the doom of all Whose swords are lightning flashes in the cloud
 Of the Invader's wrath, Threatening a gallant land 60

His armies' trumpet-tones wake not alone Her slumbering echoes, from a thousand hills
 Her answering voices shout,
 And her bells ring to arms!

Then danger hovers o'er the Invader's march,
 On raven wings, hushing the song of fame,
 And glory's hues of beauty Fade from the cheek of death

A foe is heard in every rustling leaf,
 A fortress seen in every rock and tree, 70
     The eagle eye of art Is dim and powerless then,

And war becomes a people's joy, the drum Man's merriest music, and the field of death
 His couch of happy dreams,
 After life's harvest home

He battles heart and arm, his own blue sky Above him, and his own green land around, Land of his father's grave,
     His blessing and his prayers, 80

Land where he learned to lisp a mother's name,
 The first beloved in life, the last forgot,
     Land of his frolic youth,
     Land of his bridal eve,

Land of his children—vain your columned strength,
 Invaders! vain your battles' steel and fire!
 Choose ye the morrow's doom,— A prison or a grave

And such were Saratoga's victors—such The Yeomen-Brave, whose deeds and death have given 90
     A glory to her skies,
     A music to her name

In honorable life her fields they trod,
 In honorable death they sleep below,
     Their sons' proud feelings here Their noblest monuments

WASHINGTON IRVING

1783-1859

FROM DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER'S
 A HISTORY OF NEW YORK<sup>1</sup>

TO THE PUBLIC

'To rescue from oblivion the memory of former incidents, and to render a just tribute of renown to the many great and wonderful transactions of our Dutch progenitors, Diedrich Knickerbocker, native 10 of the city of New York, produces this historical essay.'<sup>2</sup> Like the great Father of History whose words I have just quoted, I treat of times long past, over which the twilight of uncertainty had already thrown its shadows, and the night of forgetfulness was <sup>1</sup> The selections are from the first edition, as reprinted in Williams and McDowell, eds., Diedrich Knicker-bocker's A History of New York (N.Y., 1927), 7-14, 175-about to descend forever. With great solicitude had I long beheld the early history of this venerable and ancient city, gradually slipping from our grasp, trembling on the lips of narrative old age, and day by day dropping piece-meal into the tomb. In a little while, thought I, and those venerable Dutch burghers, who serve as the tottering monuments of good old times, will be gathered to their fathers, their children engrossed by the empty pleasures or insignificant transactions of the present age, will neglect to treasure up the recollections of the past, and posterity shall search in vain, for memorials of the days of the Patriarchs.

 The origin of our city will be buried in eternal oblivion, and even the names and achievements of Wouter Van Twiller, William Kieft, and Peter Stuyvesant, be enveloped in doubt and fiction, like those of Romulus and Remus, of Charlemagne,

King Arthur, Rinaldo, and Godfrey of Bologne.

Determined therefore, to avert if possible this threatening misfortune, I industriously sat myself to work to gather together all the fragments of our infant history which still existed, and like my revered prototype Herodotus, where no written records could be found, I have endeavored to continue the chain of history by well-authenticated traditions

In this arduous undertaking, which has been the whole business of a long and solitary life, it is incredible the number of learned authors I have consulted, and all to but little purpose. Strange as it may seem, though such multitudes of excellent works have been written about this country, there are none extant which give any full and satisfactory account of the early history of New York, or of its three first Dutch governors. I have, however, gained much valuable and curious matter from an elaborate manuscript written in exceeding pure and classic Low Dutch, excepting a few errors in orthography, which was found in the archives of the Stuyvesant family. Many legends, letters and other documents have I likewise gleaned, in my researches among the family chests and lumber garrets of our respectable Dutch citizens, and I have gathered a host of well-authenticated traditions from divers excellent old ladies of my acquaintance, who requested that their names might not be mentioned. Nor must I neglect to acknowledge, how greatly I have been assisted by that admirable and praiseworthy institution, the New York Historical Society, to which I here publicly return my sincere acknowledgments

In the conduct of this inestimable work I have adopted no individual model, but on the contrary have simply contented myself with combining and concentrating the excellences of the most approved ancient historians. Like Xenophon I have maintained the utmost impartiality, and the strictest adherence to truth throughout my history. I have enriched it after the manner of Sallust, with various characters of ancient worthies, drawn at full length, and faithfully colored. I have seasoned it with profound political speculations like Thucydides, sweetened it with the graces of sentiment like Tacitus, and infused into the whole the dignity, the grandeur and magnificence of Livy.

I am aware that I shall incur the censure of numerous very learned and judicious critics, for indulging too frequently in the bold excursive manner of my favorite Herodotus. And to be candid, I have found it impossible always to resist the allurements of those pleasing episodes, which like flowery banks and fragrant bowers, beset the dusty road of the historian, and entice him to turn aside, and refresh himself from his wayfaring. But I trust it will be found, that I have always resumed my staff, and addressed myself to my weary journey with renovated spirits, so that both my readers and myself, have been benefited by the relaxation.

Indeed, though it has been my constant wish and uniform endeavor, to rival Polybius himself, in observing the requisite unity of History, yet the loose and unconnected manner in which many of the facts herein recorded have come to hand, rendered such an attempt extremely difficult. This difficulty was likewise increased, by one of the grand objects contemplated in my work, which was to trace the rise of sundry customs and institutions in this best of cities, and to compare them when in the germ of infancy, with what they are in the present old age of knowledge and improvement.

But the chief merit upon which I value myself, and found my hopes for future regard, is that faithful veracity with which I have compiled this invaluable little work, carefully winnowing away all the chaff of hypothesis, and discarding the tares of fable, which are too apt to spring up and choke the seeds of truth and wholesome knowledge.—Had I been anxious to captivate the superficial throng, who skim like swallows over the surface of literature, or had I been anxious to commend my writings to the pampered palates of literary voluptuaries, I might have availed myself of the obscurity that hangs about the infant years of our city, to introduce a thousand pleasing fictions. But I have scrupulously discarded many a pithy tale and marvellous adventure, whereby the drowsy ear of summer indolence might be enthralled, jealously maintaining that fidelity, gravity and dignity, which should ever distinguish the historian. 'For a writer of this class,' observes an elegant critic, 'must sustain the character of a wise man, writing for the instruction of posterity, one who has studied to inform himself well, who has pondered his subject with care, and addresses himself to our judgment, rather than to our imagination.'

Thrice happy therefore, is this our renowned city, in having incidents worthy of swelling the theme of history, and doubly thrice happy is it in having such an historian as myself, to relate them. For after all, gentle reader, cities of themselves, and in fact empires of themselves, are nothing without an historian. It is the patient narrator who cheerfully records their prosperity as they rise—who blazons forth the splendor of their noon-tide meridian—who props their feeble memorials as they totter to decay—who gathers together their scattered fragments as they rot—and who piously at length collects their ashes into the mausoleum of his work, and rears a triumphal monument, to transmit their renown to all succeeding time.

'What,' (in the language of Diodorus Siculus), 'What has become of Babylon, of Nineveh, of Palmyra, of Persepolis, of Byzantium, of Agrigentum, of Cyzicum and Mytilene?' They have disappeared from the face of the earth—they have perished for want of an historian! The philanthropist may weep over their desolation—the poet may wander amid their mouldering arches and broken columns, and indulge the visionary flights of his fancy—but alas! alas! the modern historian, whose faithful pen, like my own, is doomed irrevocably to confine itself to dull matter of fact, seeks in vain among their oblivious remains, for some memorial that may tell the instructive tale, of their glory and their ruin.

'Wars, conflagrations, deluges (says Aristotle) destroy nations, and with them all their monuments, their discoveries and their vanities—The torch of science has more than once been extinguished and rekindled—a few individuals who have escaped by accident, reunite the thread of generations.' Thus then the historian is the patron of mankind, the guardian priest, who keeps the perpetual lamp of ages unextinguished—Nor is he without his reward. Every thing in a manner is tributary to his renown—Like the great projector of inland lock navigation, who asserted that rivers, lakes and oceans were only formed to feed canals, so I affirm that cities, empires, plots, conspiracies, wars, havoc and desolation, are ordained by providence only as food for the historian. They form but the pedestal on which he intrepidly mounts to the view of surrounding generations, and claims to himself, from ages as they rise, until the latest sigh of old time himself, the meed of immortality—The world—the world, is nothing without the historian!

The same sad misfortune which has happened to so many ancient cities, will happen again, and from the same sad cause, to nine-tenths of those cities which now flourish on the face of the globe. With most of them the time for recording their history is gone by, their origin, their very foundation, together with the early stages of their settlement, are forever buried in the rubbish of years, and the same would have been the case with this fair portion of the earth, the history of which I have here given, if I had not snatched it from obscurity, in the very nick of time, at the moment that those matters herein recorded, were about entering into the wide-spread, insatiable maw of oblivion—if I had not dragged them out, in a manner, by the very locks, just as the monster's adamant fangs were closing upon them forever! And here have I, as before observed, carefully collected, collated and arranged them, scrip and scrap, punt en punt, gat en gat, and commenced in this little work, a history which may serve as a foundation, on which a host of worthies shall hereafter raise a noble superstructure, swelling in process of time, until Knuckerbocker's New York shall be equally voluminous with Gibbon's Rome, or Hume and Smoller's England!

And now indulge me for a moment, while I lay down my pen, skip to some little eminence at the distance of two or three hundred years ahead, and casting back a bird's-eye glance, over the waste of years that is to roll between, discover myself—little I—at this moment the progenitor, prototype and precursor of them all, posted at the head of this host of literary worthies, with my book under my arm, and New York on my back, pressing forward like a gallant commander, to honor and immortality

Here then I cut my bark adrift, and launch it forth to float upon the waters. And oh! ye mighty Whales, ye Grampuses and Sharks of criticism, who delight in shipwrecking unfortunate adventurers upon the sea of letters, have mercy upon this my crazy vessel. Ye may toss it about in your sport, or spout your dirty water upon it in showers, but do not, for the sake of the unlucky mariner within—do not stave it with your tails and send it to the bottom. And you, oh ye great little fish! ye tadpoles, ye sprats, ye minnows, ye chubbs, ye grubs, ye barnacles, and all you small fry of literature, be cautious how you insult my new-launched vessel, or swim within my view, lest in a moment of mingled sportiveness and scorn, I sweep you up in a scoop net, and roast half a hundred of you for my breakfast

CERTAIN CHRONICLES OF THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE TESTY<sup>1</sup>

CHAP. I

Exposing the craftiness and artful devices of those arch Free Booters, the Book-Makers, and their trusty Squires, the Book-Sellers. Containing furthermore, the universal acquirements of William the Testy, and how a man may learn so much as to render himself good for nothing

If ever I had my readers completely by the button, it is at this moment. Here is a redoubtable fortress reduced to the greatest extremity, a valiant commander in a state of the most imminent jeopardy—and a legion of implacable foes thronging upon every side. The sentimental reader is preparing to indulge his sympathies, and bewail the sufferings of the brave. The philosophic reader, to come with his first principles, and coolly take the dimensions and ascertain the proportions of great actions, like an antiquary, measuring a pyramid with a two-foot rule—while the mere reader, for amusement, promises to regale himself after the monotonous pages through which he has dozed, with murders, rapes, ravages, conflagrations, and all the other glorious incidents, that give éclat to victory, and grace the triumph of the conqueror.

Thus every reader must press forward—he cannot refrain, if he has the least spark of curiosity in his disposition, from turning over the ensuing page. Having therefore gotten him fairly in my clutches—what hinders me from indulging in a little recreation, and varying the dull task of narrative by stultifying my readers with a drove of sober reflections about this, that and the other thing—by pushing forward a few of my own darling opinions, or talking a little about myself—all which the reader will have to peruse, or else give up the book altogether, and remain in utter ignorance of the mighty deeds, and great events, that are contained in the sequel.

To let my readers into a great literary secret, your experienced writers, who wish to instil peculiar tenets, either in religion, politics or morals, do often resort to this expedient—illustrating their favorite doctrines by pleasing fictions on established facts—and so mingling historic truth, and subtle speculation together, that the unwary million never perceive the medley, but, running with open mouth, after an interesting story, are often made to swallow the most heterodox opinions, ridiculous theories, and abominable heresies. This is particularly the case with the industrious advocates of the modern philosophy, and many an honest unsuspicious reader, who devours their works under an idea of acquiring solid knowledge, must not be surprised if, to use a pious quotation, he finds 'his belly filled with the east wind.'

This same expedient is likewise a literary artifice, by which one sober truth, like a patient and laborious pack horse, is made to carry a couple of panniers of rascally little conjectures on its back. In this manner books are increased, the pen is kept going and trade flourishes, for if every writer were obliged to tell merely what he knew, there would soon be an end of great books, and Tom Thumb's folio would be considered as a gigantic production—A man might then carry his library in his pocket, and the whole race of book-makers, book-printers, book-binders and book-sellers might starve together, but by being entitled to tell every thing he thinks, and every thing he does not think—to talk about every thing he knows, or does not know—to conjecture, to doubt, to argue with himself, to laugh with and laugh at his reader, (the latter of which we writers do nine times out of ten—in our sleeves) to indulge in hypotheses, to deal in dashes—and stars * * * * and a thousand other innocent indulgences—all these I say, do marvelously concur to fill the pages of books, the pockets of book-sellers, and the hungry stomachs of authors—do contribute to the amusement and edification of the reader, and redound to the glory, the increase and the profit of the craft!

Having thus, therefore, given my readers the whole art and mystery of book-making, they have nothing further to do, than to take pen in hand, set down and write a book for themselves—while in the mean time I will proceed with my history, without claiming any of the privileges above recited.

Wilhelmus Kieft who in 1634 ascended the Gubernatorial chair, (to borrow a favorite, though clumsy appellation of modern phraseologists) was in form, feature and character, the very reverse of Wouter Van Twiller, his renowned predecessor. He was of very respectable descent, his father being Inspector of Windmills in the ancient town of Saardam, and our hero we are told made very curious investigations into the nature and operations of those machines when a little boy, which is one reason why he afterwards came to be so ingenious a governor. His name according to the most ingenious etymologists was a corruption of Kyver, that is to say a wrangler or scolder, and expressed the hereditary disposition of his family, which for nearly two centuries, had kept the windy town of Saardam in hot water, and produced more tartars and brimstones than any ten families in the place—and so truly did Wilhelmus Kieft inherit this family endowment, that he had scarcely been a year in the discharge of his government, before he was universally known by the appellation of William the Testy.

He was a brisk, waspish, little old gentleman, who had dried and wilted away, partly through the natural process of years, and partly from being parched and burnt up by his fiery soul, which blazed like a vehement rush light in his bosom, constantly inciting him to most valorous broils, altercations and misadventures. I have heard it observed by a profound and philosophical judge of human nature, that if a woman waxes fat as she grows old, the tenure of her life is very precarious, but if haply she wilts, she lives forever—such likewise was the case with William the Testy, who grew tougher in proportion as he dried. He was some such a little Dutchman as we may now and then see, stumping briskly about the streets of our city, in a broad skirted coat, with buttons nearly as large as the shield of Ajax, which makes such a figure in Dan Homer, an old fashioned cocked hat stuck on the back of his head, and a cane as high as his chin. His visage was broad, but his features sharp, his nose turned up with a most petulant curl, his cheeks, like the region of Terra del Fuego, were scorched into a dusky red—doubtless in consequence of the neighborhood of two fierce little grey eyes, through which his torrid soul beamed as fervently, as a tropical sun blazing through a pair of burning glasses. The corners of his mouth were curiously modeled into a kind of fret work, not a little resembling the wrinkled proboscis of an irritable pug dog—in a word he was one of the most positive, restless, ugly little men, that ever put himself in a passion about nothing.

Such were the personal endowments of William the Testy, but it was the sterling riches of his mind that raised him to dignity and power. In his youth he had passed with great credit through a celebrated academy at the Hague, noted for producing finished scholars, with a dispatch unequalled, except by certain of our American colleges, which seem to manufacture bachelors of arts, by some patent machine. Here he skumished very smartly on the frontiers of several of the sciences, and made such a gallant inroad into the dead languages, as to bring off captive a host of Greek nouns and Latin verbs, together with divers pithy saws and apothegms, all which he constantly paraded in conversation and writing, with as much vain glory as would a triumphant general of yore display the spoils of the countries he had ravaged. He had moreover puzzled himself considerably with logic, in which he had advanced so far as to attain a very familiar acquaintance, by name at least, with the whole family of syllogisms and dilemmas, but what he chiefly valued himself on, was his knowledge of metaphysics, in which, having once upon a time ventured too deeply, he came well nigh being smothered in a slough of unintelligible learning—a fearful peril, from the effects of which he never perfectly recovered.—In plain words, like many other profound intermeddlers in this abstruse bewildering science, he so confused his brain, with abstract speculations which he could not comprehend, and artificial distinctions which he could not realize, that he could never think clearly on any subject however simple, through the whole course of his life afterwards. This I must confess was in some measure a misfortune, for he never engaged in argument, of which he was exceeding fond, but what between logical deductions and metaphysical jargon, he soon involved himself and his subject in a fog of contradictions and perplexities, and then would get into a mighty passion with his adversary, for not being convinced gratis.

It is in knowledge, as in swimming, he who ostentatiously sports and flounders on the surface, makes more noise and splashing, and attracts more attention, than the industrious pearl diver, who plunges in search of treasures to the bottom. The 'universal acquirements' of William Kieft, were the subject of great marvel and admiration among his countrymen—he figured about at the Hague with as much vain glory, as does a profound Bonze at Peking, who has mastered half the letters of the Chinese alphabet, and in a word was unan-mously pronounced an universal genius!—I have known many universal geniuses in my time, though to speak my mind freely I never knew one, who, for the ordinary purposes of life, was worth his weight in straw—but, for the purposes of government, a little sound judgment and plain common sense, is worth all the sparkling genius that ever wrote poetry, or invented theories.

Strange as it may sound therefore, the universal acquirements of the illustrious Wilhelmus, were very much in his way, and had he been a less learned little man, it is possible he would have been a much greater governor. He was exceedingly fond of trying philosophical and political experiments, and having stuffed his head full of scraps and remnants of ancient republics, and oligarchies, and aristocracies, and monarchies, and the laws of Solon and Lycurgus and Charondas, and the imaginary commonwealth of Plato, and the Pandects of Justinian, and a thousand other fragments of venerable antiquity, he was forever bent upon introducing some one or other of them into use, so that between one contradictory measure and another, he entangled the government of the little province of Nieuw Nederlandts in more knots during his administration, than half a dozen successors could have untied.

No sooner had this bustling little man been blown by a whiff of fortune into the seat of government, than he called together his council and delivered a very animated speech on the affairs of the province. As every body knows what a glorious opportunity a governor, a president, or even an emperor has, of drubbing his enemies in his speeches, messages and bulletins, where he has the talk all on his own side, they may be sure the high-mettled William Kieft did not suffer so favorable an occasion to escape him, of evincing that gallantry of tongue, common to all able legislators. Before he commenced, it is recorded that he took out of his pocket a red cotton handkerchief, and gave a very sonorous blast of the nose, according to the usual custom of great orators. This in general I believe is intended as a signal trumpet, to call the attention of the auditors, but with William the Testy it boasted a more classic cause, for he had read of the singular expedient of that famous demagogue Caius Gracchus, who when he harangued the Roman populace, modulated his tones by an oratorical flute or pitch-pipe—'which,' said the shrewd Wilhelmus, 'I take to be nothing more nor less, than an elegant and figurative mode of saying—he previously blew his nose'

This preparatory symphony being performed, he commenced by expressing a humble sense of his own want of talents—his utter unworthiness of the honor conferred upon him, and his humiliating incapacity to discharge the important duties of his new station—in short, he expressed so contemptible an opinion of himself, that many simple country members present, ignorant that these were mere words of course, always used on such occasions, were very uneasy, and even felt wrath that he should accept an office, for which he was consciously so inadequate

He then proceeded in a manner highly classic, profoundly erudite, and nothing at all to the purpose, being nothing more than a pompous account of all the governments of ancient Greece, and the wars of Rome and Carthage, together with the rise and fall of sundry outlandish empires, about which the assembly knew no more than their great grand children who were yet unborn. Thus having, after the manner of your learned orators, convinced the audience that he was a man of many words and great erudition, he at length came to the less important part of his speech, the situation of the province—and here he soon worked himself into a fearful rage against the Yankees, whom he compared to the Gauls who desolated Rome, and the Goths and Vandals who overran the fairest plains of Europe—nor did he forget to mention, in terms of adequate opprobrium, the insolence with which they had encroached upon the territories of New Netherlands, and the unparalleled audacity with which they had commenced the town of New Plymouth, and planted the onion patches of Weathersfield under the very walls, or rather mud batteries of Fort Goed Hoop

Having thus artfully wrought up his tale of terror to a climax, he assumed a self-satisfied look, and declared, with a nod of knowing import, that he had taken measures to put a final stop to these encroachments—that he had been obliged to have recourse to a dreadful engine of warfare, lately invented, awful in its effects, but authorized by direful necessity. In a word, he was resolved to conquer the Yankees—by proclamation!

For this purpose he had prepared a tremendous instrument of the kind ordering, commanding and enjoining the intruders aforesaid, forthwith to remove, depart and withdraw from the districts, regions and territories aforesaid, under pain of suffering all the penalties, forfeitures, and punishments in such case made and provided, &c. This proclamation he assured them, would at once exterminate the enemy from the face of the country, and he pledged his valor as a governor, that within two months after it was published, not one stone should remain on another, in any of the towns which they had built

The council remained for some time silent, after he had finished, whether struck dumb with admiration at the brilliancy of his project, or put to sleep by the length of his harangue, the history of the times doth not mention. Suffice it to say, they at length gave a universal grunt of acquiescence—the proclamation was immediately dispatched with due ceremony, having the great seal of the province, which was about the size of a buckwheat pancake, attached to it by a broad red ribband. Governor Kieft having thus vented his indignation, felt greatly relieved—adjourned the council sine die—put on his cocked hat and corduroy small-clothes, and mounting a tall raw boned charger, trotted out to his country seat, which was situated in a sweet, sequestered swamp, now called Dutch Street, but more commonly known by the name of Dog's Misery

Here, like the good Numa, he reposed from the toils of legislation, taking lessons in government, not from the nymph Egeria, but from the honored wife of his bosom, who was one of that peculiar kind of females, sent upon earth a little after the flood, as a punishment for the sins of mankind, and commonly known by the appellation of knowing women. In fact, my duty as an historian obliges me to make known a circumstance which was a great secret at the time, and consequently was not a subject of scandal to more than half the tea tables in New Amsterdam, but which like many other great secrets, has leaked out in the lapse of years—and this was, that the great Wilhelmus the Testy, though one of the most potent little men that ever breathed, yet submitted at home to a species of government, neither laid down in Aristotle, nor Plato, in short, it partook of the nature of a pure, unmixed tyranny, and is familiarly denominated petticoat government—An absolute sway, which though exceedingly common in these modern days, was very rare among the ancients, if we may judge from the rout made about the domestic economy of honest Socrates, which is the only ancient case on record

The great Kieft however, warded off all the sneers and sarcasms of his particular friends, who are ever ready to joke with a man on sore points of the kind, by alleging that it was a government of his own election, which he submitted to through choice, adding at the same time that it was a profound maxim which he had found in an ancient author—‘he who would aspire to govern, should first learn to obey’

CHAP II

In which are recorded the sage Projects of a Ruler of universal Genus—The art of Fighting by Proclamation—and how that the valiant Jacobus Van Curlet came to be foully dishonored at Fort Goed Hoop

Never was a more comprehensive, a more expeditious, or, what is still better, a more economical measure devised, than this of defeating the Yankees by proclamation—an expedient, likewise, so humane, so gentle and pacific, there were ten chances to one in favour of its succeeding,—but then there was one chance to ten that it would not succeed—as the ill-natured fates would have it, that single chance carried the day! The proclamation was perfect in all its parts, well constructed, well written, well sealed and well published—all that was wanting to insure its effect, was that the Yankees should stand in awe of it, but, provoking to relate, they treated it with the most absolute contempt, applied it to an unseemly purpose, which shall be nameless, and thus did the first warlike proclamation come to a shameful end—a fate which I am credibly informed, has befallen but too many of its successors

It was a long time before Wilhelmus Kieft could be persuaded by the united efforts of all his counsellors, that his war measure had failed in producing any effect—On the contrary, he flew in a passion whenever any one dared to question its efficacy, and swore, that though it was slow in operating, yet when once it began to work, it would soon purge the land from these rapacious intruders Time however, that tester of all experiments both in philosophy and politics, at length convinced the great Kieft that his proclamation was abortive, and that notwithstanding he had waited nearly four years, in a state of constant irritation, yet he was still further off than ever from the object of his wishes His implacable adversaries in the east became more and more troublesome in their encroachments, and founded the thriving colony of Hartford close upon the skirts of Fort Goed Hoop They moreover commenced the fair settlement of New Haven (alias the Red Hills) within the domains of their high mightinesses—while the onion patches of Pyquag were a continual eye sore to the garrison of Van Curlet Upon beholding therefore the inefficacy of his measure, the sage Kieft like many a worthy practitioner of physic, laid the blame, not to the medicine, but the quantity administered, and resolutely resolved to double the dose

In the year 1638 therefore, that being the fourth year of his reign, he fulminated against them a second proclamation, of heavier metal than the former, written in thundering long sentences, not one word of which was under five syllables This, in fact, was a kind of non-intercourse bill, forbidding and prohibiting all commerce and connexion, between any and every of the said Yankee intruders, and the said fortified post of Fort Goed Hoop, and ordering, commanding and advising all his trusty, loyal and well-beloved subjects, to furnish them with no supplies of gin, gingerbread or sourcrou, to buy none of their pacing horses, meazly pork, apple brandy, Yankee rum, cyder water, apple sweetmeats, Weathersfield onions or wooden bowls, but to starve and exterminate them from the face of the land

Another pause of a twelve month ensued, during which the last proclamation received the same attention, and experienced the same fate as the first—at the end of which term, the gallant Jacobus Van Curlet dispatched his annual messenger, with his customary budget of complaints and entreaties. Whether the regular interval of a year, intervening between the arrival of Van Curlet's couriers, was occasioned by the systematic regularity of his movements, or by the immense distance at which he was stationed from the seat of government is a matter of uncertainty. Some have ascribed it to the slowness of his messengers, who, as I have before noticed, were chosen from the shortest and fattest of his garrison, as least likely to be worn out on the road, and who, being puffy, short-winded little men, generally travelled fifteen miles a day, and then laid by a whole week, to rest. All these, however, are matters of conjecture, and I rather think it may be ascribed to the immemorial maxim of this worthy country—and which has ever influenced all its public transactions—not to do things in a hurry.

The gallant Jacobus Van Curlet, in his dispatches respectfully represented, that several years had now elapsed, since his first application to his late excellency, the renowned Wouter Van Twiller during which interval, his garrison had been reduced nearly one-eighth, by the death of two of his most valiant, and corpulent soldiers, who had accidentally over eaten themselves on some fat salmon, caught in the Varsche Rivier. He further stated that the enemy persisted in their inroads, taking no notice of the fort or its inhabitants, but squatting themselves down, and forming settlements all around it, so that, in a little while, he should find himself enclosed and blockaded by the enemy, and totally at their mercy.

But among the most atrocious of his grievances, I find the following still on record, which may serve to show the bloody minded outrages of these savage intruders: 'In the meanetime, they of Hartford have not onely usurped and taken in the lands of Connecticut, although unrighteously and against the lawes of nations, but have hindered our nation in sowing there owne purchased broken up lands, but have also sowed them with corne in the night. which the Netherlanders had broken up and intended to sowe: and have beaten the servants of the high and mighty the honored companie, which were laboring upon there master's lands, from there lands, with sticks and plow staves in hostile manner lamung, and amongst the rest, struck Ever Duckings<sup>1</sup> a hole in his head, with a stick, soe that the blood ran downe very strongly downe upon his body.'

But what is still more atrocious—

'Those of Hartford sold a hogg, that belonged to the honored companie, under pretence that it had eaten of there grounde grass, when they had not any foot of inheritance. They profered the hogg for 5s if the commissioners would have given 5s for damage, which the commissioners denied, because noe man's owne hogg (as men used to say) can trespasse upon his owne master's grounde.'<sup>2</sup>

The receipt of this melancholy intelligence incensed the whole community—there was something in it that spoke to the full comprehension, and touched the obtuse feelings even of the puissant vulgar, who generally require a kick in the rear, to awaken their slumbering dignity. I have known my profound fellow citizens bear without murmur, a thousand essential infringements of their rights, merely because they were not immediately obvious to their senses—but the moment the unlucky Pearce was shot upon our coasts, the whole body politic was in a ferment—so the enlightened Netherlanders, though they had treated the encroachments of their eastern neighbors with but little regard, and left their quill-valiant governor, to bear the whole brunt of war, with his single pen—yet now every individual felt his head broken in the broken head of Duckings—and the unhappy fate of their fellow citizen the hog, being impressed, carried and sold into captivity, awakened a grunt of sympathy from every bosom.

The governor and council, goaded by the clamors of the multitude, now set themselves earnestly to deliberate upon what was to be done. Proclamations had at length fallen into temporary disrepute, some were for sending the Yankees a tribute, as we make peace offerings to the petty Barbary powers, or as the Indians sacrifice to the devil. Others were for buying them out, but this was opposed, as it would be acknowledging their title to the land they had seized. A variety of measures were, as usual in such cases, proposed, discussed and abandoned, and the council had at last, to adopt the means, which being the most common and obvious, had been knowingly overlooked—for your amazing acute politicians, are for ever looking through telescopes, which only enable them to see such objects as are far off, and unattainable, but which incapacitates them to see such things as are in their reach, and obvious to all simple folk, who are content to look with the naked eyes, heaven has given them. The profound council, as I have said, in their pursuit after Jack-o'-lanterns, accidentally stumbled on the very measure they were in need of, which was to raise a body of troops, and dispatch them to the relief and reinforcement of the garrison. This measure was carried into such prompt operation, that in less than twelve months, the whole expedition, consisting of a sergeant and twelve men, was ready to march, and was reviewed for that purpose, in the public square, now known by the name of the Bowling Green. Just at this juncture the whole community was thrown into consternation, by the sudden arrival of the Gallant Jacobus Van Curllet, who came straggling into town at the head of his crew of tatterdemalions, and bringing the melancholy tidings of his own defeat, and the capture of the redoubtable post of Fort Good Hoop by the ferocious Yankees.

The fate of this important fortress, is an unpressive warning to all military commanders. It was neither carried by storm, nor famine, no practicable breach was effected by cannon or mines, no magazines were blown up by red hot shot, nor were the barracks demolished, or the garrison destroyed, by the bursting of bombshells. In fact, the place was taken by a stratagem no less singular than effectual, and one that can never fail of success, whenever an opportunity occurs of putting it in practice.

Happy am I to add, for the credit of our illustrious ancestors, that it was a stratagem, which though it impeached the vigilance, yet left the bravery of the intrepid Van Curllet and his garrison, perfectly free from reproach.

It appears that the crafty Yankees, having learned the regular habits of the garrison, watched a favorable opportunity and silently introduced themselves into the fort, about the middle of a sultry day, when its vigilant defenders having gorged themselves with a hearty dinner and smoked out their pipes, were one and all snoring most obstreperously at their posts, little dreaming of so disastrous an occurrence. The enemy most inhumanly seized Jacobus Van Curllet, and his sturdy myrmidons by the nape of the neck, gallanted them to the gate of the fort, and dismissed them severally, with a kick on the crupper, as Charles the twelfth dismissed the heavy-bottomed Russians, after the battle of Narva—only taking care to give two kicks to Van Curllet, as a signal mark of distinction.

A strong garrison was immediately established in the fort, consisting of twenty long sided, hard fisted Yankees, with Weathersfield onions stuck in their hats, by way of cockades and feathers—long rusty fowling pieces for muskets—hasty pudding, dumb fish, pork and molasses for stores, and a huge pumpkin was hoisted on the end of a pole, as a standard—liberty caps not having as yet come into fashion.

<sup>1</sup> Irving writes in 'The Author's Account of Himself,' the introductory essay in The Sketch Book: 'I visited various parts of my own country, and had I been merely a lover of fine scenery, I should have felt little desire to seek elsewhere its gratification. But Europe held forth the charms of storied and poetical association. There were to be seen the masterpieces of art, the refinements of highly-cultivated society, the quaint peculiarities of ancient and local custom. My native country was full of youthful promise. Europe was rich in the accumulated treasures of age. Her very ruins told the history of times gone by, and every mouldering stone was a chronicle. I longed to wander over the scenes of renowned achievement—to tread as it were, in the footsteps of antiquity—to loiter about the ruined castle—to meditate on the falling tower—to escape, in

ON one of those sober and rather melancholy days, in the latter part of Autumn, when the shadows of morning and evening almost mingle together, and throw a gloom over the decline of the year, I passed several hours in rambling about Westminster Abbey. There was something congenial to the season in the mournful magnificence of the old pile, and, as I passed its threshold, seemed like stepping back into the regions of antiquity, and losing myself among the shades of former ages.

I entered from the inner court of Westminster School, through a long, low, vaulted passage, that had an almost subterranean look, being dimly lighted in one part by circular perforations in the massive walls. Through this dark avenue I had a distant view of the cloisters, with the figure of an old verger, in his black gown, moving along their shadowy vaults, and seeming like a spectre from one of the neighboring tombs. The approach to the abbey through these gloomy monastic remains prepares the mind for its solemn contemplation. The cloisters still retain something of the quiet and seclusion of former days. The gray walls are discolored by damps, and crumbling with age, a coat of hoary moss has gathered over the inscriptions of the mural monuments, and obscured the death's-heads, and other funereal emblems. The sharp touches of the chisel are gone from the rich tracery of the arches, the roses which adorned the key-stones have lost their leafy beauty, every-thing bears marks of the gradual dilapi-short, from the commonplace realities of the present, and lose myself among the shadowy grandeurs of the past.

ations of time, which yet has something touching and pleasing in its very decay.

The sun was pouring down a yellow autumnal ray into the square of the cloisters, beaming upon a scanty plot of grass in the centre, and lighting up an angle of the vaulted passage with a kind of dusky splendor. From between the arcades, the eye glanced up to a bit of blue sky or a passing cloud, and beheld the sun-gilt pinnacles of the abbey towering into the azure heaven.

As I paced the cloisters, sometimes contemplating this mingled picture of glory and decay, and sometimes endeavoring to decipher the inscriptions on the tombstones, which formed the pavement beneath my feet, my eye was attracted to three figures, rudely carved in relief, but nearly worn away by the footsteps of many generations. They were the effigies of three of the early abbots, the epitaphs were entirely effaced, the names alone remained, having no doubt been renewed in later times (Vitalis Abbas 1082, and Gislebertus Crispinus Abbas 1114, and Laurentius Abbas 1176.) I remained some little while, musing over these casual relics of antiquity, thus left like wrecks upon this distant shore of time, telling no tale but that such beings had been and had perished, teaching no moral but the futility of that pride which hopes still to exact homage in its ashes, and to live in an inscription. A little longer, and even these faint records will be obliterated, and the monument will cease to be a memorial. Whilst I was yet looking down upon these gravestones, I was roused by the sound of the abbey clock, reverberating from buttress to buttress, and echoing among the cloisters. It is almost startling to hear this warning of departed time sounding among the tombs, and telling the lapse of the hour, which, like a billow, has rolled us onward towards the grave. I pursued my walk to an arched door opening to the interior of the abbey. On entering here, the magnitude of the building breaks fully upon the mind, contrasted with the vaults of the cloisters. The eyes gaze with wonder at clustered columns of gigantic dimensions, with arches springing from them to such an amazing height, and man wandering about their bases, shrunk into insignificance in comparison with his own handiwork. The spaciousness and gloom of this vast edifice produce a profound and mysterious awe We step cautiously and softly about, as if fearful of disturbing the hallowed silence of the tomb, while every footfall whispers along the walls, and chatters among the sepulchres, making us more sensible of the quiet we have interrupted

It seems as if the awful nature of the place presses down upon the soul, and hushes the beholder into noiseless rever- 10 ence We feel that we are surrounded by the congregated bones of the great men of past times, who have filled history with their deeds, and the earth with their renown

And yet it almost provokes a smile at the vanity of human ambition, to see how they are crowded together and jostled in the dust, what parsimony is observed in doling out a scanty nook, a gloomy corner, a little 20 portion of earth, to those, whom, when alive, kingdoms could not satisfy, and how many shapes, and forms, and artifices are devised to catch the casual notice of the passenger, and save from forgetfulness, for a few short years, a name which once aspired to occupy ages of the world's thought and admiration

I passed some time in Poet's Corner, which occupies an end of one of the transepts or cross aisles of the abbey The 30 monuments are generally simple, for the lives of literary men afford no striking themes for the sculptor Shakspeare and Addison have statues erected to their memories, but the greater part have busts, medallions, and sometimes mere inscriptions Notwithstanding the simplicity of these memorials, I have always observed that the visitors to the abbey remained longest about them A kinder and fonder feeling 40 takes place of that cold curiosity or vague admiration with which they gaze on the splendid monuments of the great and the heroic They linger about these as about the tombs of friends and companions, for indeed there is something of companionship between the author and the reader.
Other men are known to posterity only through the medium of history, which is continually growing faint and obscure, but 50 the intercourse between the author and his fellowmen is ever new, active, and immediate He has lived for them more than for himself, he has sacrificed surrounding enjoyments, and shut himself up from the delights of social life, that he might the more intimately commune with distant minds and distant ages Well may the world cherish his renown, for it has been purchased, not by deeds of violence and blood, but by the diligent dispensation of pleasure Well may posterity be grateful to his memory, for he has left it an inheritance, not of empty names and sounding actions, but whole treasures of wisdom, bright gems of thought, and golden veins of language

From Poet's Corner I continued my stroll towards that part of the abbey which contains the sepulchres of the kings I wandered among what once were chapels, but which are now occupied by the tombs and monuments of the great At every turn I met with some illustrious name, or the cognizance of some powerful house renowned in history As the eye darts into these dusky 20 chambers of death, it catches glimpses of quaint effigies, some kneeling in niches, as if in devotion, others stretched upon the tombs, with hands piously pressed together warriors in armor, as if reposing after battle, prelates with crosiers and mitres, and nobles in robes and coronets, lying as it were in state In glancing over this scene, so strangely populous, yet where every form is so still and silent, it seems almost as if we were treading a mansion of that fabled city, where every being had been suddenly transmuted into stone

I paused to contemplate a tomb on which lay the effigy of a knight in complete armor A large buckler was on one arm, the hands were pressed together in supplication upon the breast, the face was almost covered by the morion, the legs were crossed, in token of the warrior's having been engaged in the 40 holy war It was the tomb of a Crusader, of one of those military enthusiasts who so strangely mingled religion and romance, and whose exploits form the connecting link between fact and fiction, between the history and the fairy tale There is something extremely picturesque in the tombs of these adventurers, decorated as they are with rude armorial bearings and Gothic sculpture. They comport with the antiquated chapels in which they are generally found, and in considering them, the imagination is apt to kindle with the legendary associations, the romantic fiction, the chivalrous pomp and pageantry, which poetry has spread over the wars for the sepulchre of Christ. They are the relics of times utterly gone by, of beings passed from recollection, of customs and manners with which ours have no affinity. They are like objects from some strange and distant land, of which we have no certain knowledge, and about which all our conceptions are vague and visionary. There is something extremely solemn and awful in those effigies on Gothic tombs, extended as if in the sleep of death, or in the supplication of the dying hour. They have an effect infinitely more impressive on my feelings than the fanciful attitudes, the overwrought conceits, and allegorical groups, which abound on modern monuments. I have been struck, also, with the superiority of many of the old sepulchral inscriptions. There was a noble way, in former times, of saying things simply, and yet saying them proudly, and I do not know an epitaph that breathes a loftier consciousness of family worth and honorable lineage than one which affirms, of a noble house, that 'all the brothers were brave, and all the sisters virtuous.'

In the opposite transept to Poet's Corner stands a monument which is among the most renowned achievements of modern art, but which to me appears horrible rather than sublime. It is the tomb of Mrs. Nightingale, by Roubillac. The bottom of the monument is represented as throwing open its marble doors, and a sheeted skeleton is starting forth. The shroud is falling from his fleshless frame as he launches his dart at his victim. She is sinking into her affrighted husband's arms, who strives, with vain and frantic effort, to avert the blow. The whole is executed with terrible truth and spirit, we almost fancy we hear the gibbering yell of triumph bursting from the distended jaws of the spectre.—But why should we thus seek to clothe death with unnecessary terrors, and to spread horrors round the tomb of those we love? The grave should be surrounded by everything that might inspire tenderness and veneration for the dead, or that might win the living to virtue. It is the place, not of disgust and dismay, but of sorrow and meditation.

While wandering about these gloomy vaults and silent aisles, studying the records of the dead, the sound of busy existence from without occasionally reaches the ear, —the rumbling of the passing equipage, the murmur of the multitude, or perhaps the light laugh of pleasure. The contrast is striking with the deathlike repose around, and it has a strange effect upon the feelings, thus to hear the surges of active life hurrying along, and beating against the very walls of the sepulchre.

I continued in this way to move from tomb to tomb, and from chapel to chapel. The day was gradually wearing away, the distant tread of loiterers about the abbey grew less and less frequent, the sweet-tongued bell was summoning to evening prayers, and I saw at a distance the choristers, in their white surplices, crossing the aisle and entering the choir. I stood before the entrance to Henry the Seventh's chapel. A flight of steps lead up to it, through a deep and gloomy, but magnificent arch. Great gates of brass, richly and delicately wrought, turn heavily upon their hinges, as if proudly reluctant to admit the feet of common mortals into this most gorgeous of sepulchres.

On entering, the eye is astonished by the pomp of architecture, and the elaborate beauty of sculptured detail. The very walls are wrought into universal ornament, incrustated with tracery, and scooped into niches, crowded with the statues of saints and martyrs. Stone seems, by the cunning labor of the chisel, to have been robbed of its weight and density, suspended aloft, as if by magic, and the fretted roof achieved with the wonderful minuteness and airy security of a cobweb.

Along the sides of the chapel are the lofty stalls of the Knights of the Bath, richly carved of oak, though with the grotesque decorations of Gothic architecture. On the pinnacles of the stalls are affixed the helmets and crests of the knights, with their scarfs and swords, and above them are suspended their banners, emblazoned with armorial bearings, and contrasting the splendor of gold and purple and crimson with the cold gray fretwork of the roof. In the midst of this grand mausoleum stands the sepulchre of its founder,—his effigy, with that of his queen, extended on a sumptuous tomb, and the whole surrounded by a superbly wrought brazen railing.

There is a sad dreariness in this magnificence; this strange mixture of tombs and trophies, these emblems of living and aspiring ambition, close beside mementos which show the dust and oblivion in which all must sooner or later terminate. Nothing impresses the mind with a deeper feeling of loneliness than to tread the silent and deserted scene of former throng and pageant. On looking round on the vacant stalls of the knights and their esquires, and on the rows of dusty but gorgeous banners that were once borne before them, my imagination conjured up the scene when this hall was bright with the valor and beauty of the land, glittering with the splendor of jewelled rank and military array, alive with the tread of many feet and the hum of an admiring multitude. All had passed away, the silence of death had settled again upon the place, interrupted only by the casual chirping of birds, which had found their way into the chapel, and built their nests among its friezes and pendants—sure signs of solitariness and desertion.

When I read the names inscribed on the banners, they were those of men scattered far and wide about the world, some tossing upon distant seas, some under arms in distant lands, some mingling in the busy intrigues of courts and cabinets, all seeking to deserve one more distinction in this mansion of shadowy honors—the melancholy reward of a monument.

Two small aisles on each side of this chapel present a touching instance of the equality of the grave, which brings down the oppressor to a level with the oppressed, and mingles the dust of the bitterest enemies together. In one is the sepulchre of the haughty Elizabeth, in the other is that of her victim, the lovely and unfortunate Mary. Not an hour in the day but some ejaculation of pity is uttered over the fate of the latter, mingled with indignation at her oppressor. The walls of Elizabeth's sepulchre continually echo with the sighs of sympathy heaved at the grave of her rival.

A peculiar melancholy reigns over the aisle where Mary lies buried. The light struggles dimly through windows darkened by dust. The greater part of the place is in deep shadow, and the walls are stained and tinted by time and weather. A marble figure of Mary is stretched upon the tomb, round which is an iron railing, much corroded, bearing her national emblem—the thistle. I was weary with wandering, and sat down to rest myself by the monument, revolving in my mind the chequered and disastrous story of poor Mary.

The sound of casual footsteps had ceased from the abbey. I could only hear, now and then, the distant voice of the priest repeating the evening service, and the faint responses of the choir, these paused for a time, and all was hushed. The stillness, the desertion and obscurity that were gradually prevailing around, gave a deeper and more solemn interest to the place.

For in the silent grave no conversation, No joyful tread of friends, no voice of lovers,
No careful father's counsel—nothing's heard,
For nothing is, but all oblivion, Dust, and an endless darkness

Suddenly the notes of the deep-laboring organ burst upon the ear, falling with doubled and redoubled intensity, and rolling, as it were, huge billows of sound. How well do their volume and grandeur accord with this mighty building! With what pomp do they swell through its vast vaults, and breathe their awful harmony through these caves of death, and make the silent sepulchre vocal!—And now they rise in triumph and acclamation, heaving higher and higher their accordant notes, and piling sound on sound—And now they pause, and the soft voices of the choir break out into sweet gushes of melody, they soar aloft, and warble along the roof, and seem to play about these lofty vaults like the pure airs of heaven. Again the pealing organ heaves its thrilling thunders, compressing air into music, and rolling it forth upon the soul. What long-drawn cadences! What solemn sweeping concords! It grows more and more dense and powerful—it fills the vast pile, and seems to jar the very walls—the ear is stunned—the senses are overwhelmed. And now it is winding up in full jubilee—it is rising from the earth to heaven—the very soul seems rapt away and floated upwards on this swelling tide of harmony!

I sat for some time lost in that kind of reverie which a strain of music is apt sometimes to inspire the shadows of evening were gradually thickening round me, the monuments began to cast deeper and deeper gloom, and the distant clock again gave token of the slowly waning day

I rose and prepared to leave the abbey. As I descended the flight of steps which lead into the body of the building, my eye was caught by the shrine of Edward the Confessor, and I ascended the small staircase that conducts to it, to take from thence a general survey of this wilderness of tombs. The shrine is elevated upon a kind of platform, and close around it are the sepulchres of various kings and queens. From this eminence the eye looks down between pillars and funeral trophies to the chapels and chambers below, crowded with tombs, —where warriors, prelates, courtiers, and statesmen lie mouldering in their 'beds of darkness.' Close by me stood the great chair of coronation, rudely carved of oak, in the barbarous taste of a remote and Gothic age. The scene seemed almost as if contrived, with theatrical artifice, to produce an effect upon the beholder. Here was a type of the beginning and the end of human pomp and power, here it was literally but a step from the throne to the sepulchre. Would not one think that these incongruous mementos had been gathered together as a lesson to living greatness?—to show it, even in the moment of its proudest exaltation, the neglect and dishonor to which it must soon arrive, how soon that crown which encircles its brow must pass away, and it must lie down in the dust and disgraces of the tomb, and be trampled upon by the feet of the meanest of the multitude. For, strange to tell, even the grave is here no longer a sanctuary. There is a shocking levity in some natures, which leads them to sport with awful and hallowed things, and there are base minds, which delight to revenge on the illustrious dead the abject homage and grovelling servility which they pay to the living. The coffin of Edward the Confessor has been broken open, and his remains despoiled of their funereal ornaments, the sceptre has been stolen from the hand of the imperious Elizabeth, and the effigy of Henry the Fifth lies headless. Not a royal monument but bears some proof how false and fugitive is the homage of mankind. Some are plundered, some mutilated, some covered with ribaldry and insult,—all more or less outraged and dishonored!

The last beams of day were now faintly streaming through the painted windows in the high vaults above me, the lower parts of the abbey were already wrapped in the obscurity of twilight. The chapels and aisles grew darker and darker. The effigies of the kings faded into shadows, the marble figures of the monuments assumed strange shapes in the uncertain light, the evening breeze crept through the aisles like the cold breath of the grave, and even the distant footfall of a verger, traversing the Poet's Corner, had something strange and dreary in its sound. I slowly retraced my morning's walk, and as I passed out at the portal of the cloisters, the door, closing with a jarring noise behind me, filled the whole building with echoes.

I endeavored to form some arrangement in my mind of the objects I had been contemplating, but found they were already fallen into indistinctness and confusion. Names, inscriptions, trophies, had all become confounded in my recollection, though I had scarcely taken my foot from off the threshold. What, thought I, is this vast assemblage of sepulchres but a treasury of humiliation, a huge pile of reiterated homilies on the emptiness of renown, and the certainty of oblivion! It is, indeed, the empire of death—his great shadowy palace, where he sits in state, mocking at the relics of human glory, and spreading dust and forgetfulness on the monuments of princes. How idle a boast, after all, is the immortality of a name! Time is ever silently turning over his pages, we are too much engrossed by the story of the present, to think of the characters and anecdotes that gave interest to the past, and each age is a volume thrown aside to be speedily forgotten. The idol of to-day pushes the hero of yesterday out of our recollection, and will, in turn, be supplanted by his successor of to-morrow. 'Our fathers,' says Sir Thomas Browne, 'find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors.' History fades into fable, fact becomes clouded with doubt and controversy, the inscription moulders from the tablet, the statue falls from the pedestal. Columns, arches, pyramids, what are they but heaps of sand, and their epitaphs, but characters written in the dust? What is the security of a tomb, or the perpetuity of an embalment? The remains of Alexander the Great have been scattered to the wind, and his empty sarcophagus is now the mere curiosity of a museum 'The Egyptian mummies, which Cambyses or time hath spared, avarice now consumeth, Mizraim cures wounds, and Pharaoh is sold for balsams'

What then is to insure this pile which now towers above me from sharing the fate of mightier mausoleums? The time must come when its gilded vaults, which now spring so loftily, shall lie in rubbish beneath the feet, when, instead of the sound of melody and praise, the wind shall whistle through the broken arches, and the owl hoot from the shattered tower,—when the garish sunbeam shall break into these gloomy mansions of death, and the ivy twine round the fallen column, and the fox-glove hang its blossoms about the nameless urn, as if in mockery of the dead Thus man passes away, his name perishes from record and recollection, his history is as a tale that is told, and his very monument becomes a ruin

A POSTHUMOUS WRITING OF DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER

By Woden, God of Saxons, From whence comes Wensday, that is Wodensday

Truth is a thing that ever I will keep Unto thylke day in which I creep into My sepulchre—

CARTWRIGHT

[THE following Tale was found among the papers of the late Diedrich Knickerbocker, an old gentleman of New York, who was very curious in the Dutch history of the province, and the manners of the descendants from its primitive settlers His historical researches, however, did not lie so much among books as among men, for the former are lamentably scanty on his favorite topics,

whereas he found the old burghers, and still more their wives, rich in that legendary lore so invaluable to true history. Whenever, therefore, he happened upon a genuine Dutch family, snugly shut up in its low-roofed farmhouse under a spreading sycamore, he looked upon it as a little clasped volume of black-letter, and studied it with the zeal of a book-worm.

10 The result of all these researches was a history of the province during the reign of the Dutch governors, which he published some years since There have been various opinions as to the literary character of his work, and, to tell the truth, it is not a whit better than it should be Its chief merit is its scrupulous accuracy, which indeed was a little questioned on its first appearance, but has since been completely established, and it is now admitted into all historical collec-20 tions, as a book of unquestionable authority

The old gentleman died shortly after the publication of his work, and now that he is dead and gone, it cannot do much harm to his memory to say that his time might have been much better employed in weightier labors He, however, was apt to ride his hobby his own way, and though it did now 30 and then kick up the dust a little in the eyes of his neighbors, and grieve the spirit of some friends, for whom he felt the truest deference and affection, yet his errors and follies are remembered 'more in sorrow than in anger,' and it begins to be suspected that he never intended to injure or offend But however his memory may be appreciated by critics, it is still held dear by many folk, whose good opinion is well worth hav-40 ing, particularly by certain biscuit-bakers, who have gone so far as to imprint his likeness on their new-year cakes, and have thus given him a chance for immortality, almost equal to the being stamped on a Waterloo Medal, or a Queen Anne's Farthing ]

Whoever has made a voyage up the Hudson must remember the Kaatskill mountains They are a dismembered branch of 50 the great Appalachian family, and are seen away to the west of the river, swelling up to a noble height, and lording it over the surrounding country Every change of season, every change of weather, indeed every hour of the day, produces some change in the magical hues and shapes of these mountains, and they are regarded by all the good wives, far and near, as perfect barometers. When the weather is fair and settled, they are clothed in blue and purple, and print their bold outlines on the clear evening sky, but sometimes, when the rest of the landscape is cloudless, they will gather a hood of gray vapors about their summits, which, in the last rays of the setting sun, will glow and light up like a crown of glory

At the foot of these fairy mountains, the voyager may have descried the light smoke curling up from a village, whose shingle-roofs gleam among the trees, just where the blue tints of the upland melt away into the fresh green of the nearer landscape. It is a little village of great antiquity, having been founded by some of the Dutch colonists in the early times of the province, just about the beginning of the government of the good Peter Stuyvesant (may he rest in peace!), and there were some of the houses of the original settlers standing within a few years, built of small yellow bricks brought from Holland, having latticed windows and gable fronts, surmounted with weather-cocks

In that same village, and in one of these very houses (which, to tell the precise truth, was sadly time-worn and weather-beaten), there lived many years since, while the country was yet a province of Great Britain, a simple, good-natured fellow, of the name of Rip Van Winkle. He was a descendant of the Van Winkles who figured so gallantly in the chivalrous days of Peter Stuyvesant, and accompanied him to the siege of Fort Christina. He inherited, however, but little of the martial character of his ancestors. I have observed that he was a simple, good-natured man, he was, moreover, a kind neighbor, and an obedient hen-pecked husband. Indeed, to the latter circumstance might be owing that meekness of spirit which gained him such universal popularity, for those men are most apt to be obsequious and conciliating abroad, who are under the discipline of shrews at home. Their tempers, doubtless, are rendered pliant and malleable in the fiery furnace of domestic tribulation, and a curtain lecture is worth all the sermons in the world for teaching the virtues of patience and long-suffering. A termagant wife may, therefore, in some respects be considered a tolerable blessing, and if so, Rip Van Winkle was thrice blessed.

Certain it is, that he was a great favorite among all the good wives of the village, who, as usual with the amiable sex, took his part in all family squabbles, and never failed, whenever they talked those matters over in their evening gossipings, to lay all the blame on Dame Van Winkle. The children of the village, too, would shout with joy whenever he approached. He assisted at their sports, made their playthings, taught them to fly kites and shoot marbles, and told them long stories of ghosts, witches, and Indians. Whenever he went dodging about the village, he was surrounded by a troop of them, hanging on his skirts, clambering on his back, and playing a thousand tricks on him with impunity, and not a dog would bark at him throughout the neighborhood.

The great error in Rip's composition was an insuperable aversion to all kinds of profitable labor. It could not be from the want of assiduity or perseverance, for he would sit on a wet rock, with a rod as long and heavy as a Tartar's lance, and fish all day without a murmur, even though he should not be encouraged by a single nibble. He would carry a fowling-piece on his shoulder for hours together, trudging through woods and swamps, and up hill and down dale, to shoot a few squirrels or wild pigeons. He would never refuse to assist a neighbor, even in the roughest toil, and was a foremost man at all country frolics for husking Indian corn, or building stone-fences, the women of the village, too, used to employ him to run their errands, and to do such little odd jobs as their less obliging husbands would not do for them. In a word, Rip was ready to attend to anybody's business but his own, but as to doing family duty, and keeping his farm in order, he found it impossible.

In fact, he declared it was of no use to work on his farm, it was the most pestilent little piece of ground in the whole country, everything about it went wrong, and would go wrong, in spite of him. His fences were continually falling to pieces, his cow would either go astray or get among the cabbages, weeds were sure to grow quicker in his fields than anywhere else, the rain always made a point of setting in just as he had some outdoor work to do, so that though his patrimonial estate had dwindled away under his management, acre by acre, until there was little more left than a mere patch of Indian corn and potatoes, yet it was the worst-conditioned farm in the neighborhood

His children, too, were as ragged and wild as if they belonged to nobody. His son Rip, an urchin begotten in his own likeness, promised to inherit the habits, with the old clothes of his father. He was generally seen trooping like a colt at his mother's heels, equipped in a pair of his father's cast-off-galligaskins, which he had much ado to hold up with one hand, as a fine lady does her train in bad weather.

Rip Van Winkle, however, was one of those happy mortals, of foolish, well-oiled dispositions, who take the world easy, eat white bread or brown, whichever can be got with least thought or trouble, and would rather starve on a penny than work for a pound. If left to himself, he would have whistled life away in perfect contentment, but his wife kept continually dinning in his ears about his idleness, his carelessness, and the ruin he was bringing on his family. Morning, noon, and night her tongue was incessantly going, and everything he said or did was sure to produce a torrent of household eloquence. Rip had but one way of replying to all lectures of the kind, and that, by frequent use, had grown into a habit. He shrugged his shoulders, shook his head, cast up his eyes, but said nothing. This, however, always provoked a fresh volley from his wife, so that he was fain to draw off his forces, and take to the outside of the house—the only side which, in truth, belongs to a henpecked husband.

Rip's sole domestic adherent was his dog Wolf, who was as much henpecked as his master, for Dame Van Winkle regarded them as companions in idleness, and even looked upon Wolf with an evil eye, as the cause of his master's going so often astray. True it is, in all points of spirit befitting an honorable dog, he was as courageous an animal as ever scoured the woods—but what courage can withstand the ever-during and all-besetting terrors of a woman's tongue? The moment Wolf entered the house his crest fell, his tail drooped to the ground or curled between his legs, he sneaked about with a gallows air, casting many a sidelong glance at Dame Van Winkle, and at the least flourish of a broomstick or ladle he would fly to the door with yelping precipitation.

Times grew worse and worse with Rip Van Winkle as years of matrimony rolled on, a tart temper never mellows with age, and a sharp tongue is the only edged tool that grows keener with constant use. For a long while he used to console himself, when driven from home, by frequenting a kind of perpetual club of the sages, philosophers, and other idle personages of the village, which held its sessions on a bench before a small inn, designated by a rubicund portrait of His Majesty George the Third. Here they used to sit in the shade through a long lazy summer's day, talking listlessly over village gossip, or telling endless sleepy stories about nothing. But it would have been worth any statesman's money to have heard the profound discussions that sometimes took place, when by chance an old newspaper fell into their hands from some passing traveller. How solemnly they would listen to the contents, as drawled out by Derrick Van Bummel, the school-master, a dapper learned little man, who was not to be daunted by the most gigantic word in the dictionary, and how sagely they would deliberate upon public events some months after they had taken place.

The opinions of this junta were completely controlled by Nicholas Vedder, a patriarch of the village, and landlord of the inn, at the door of which he took his seat from morning till night, just moving sufficiently to avoid the sun and keep in the shade of a large tree, so that the neighbors could tell the hour by his movements as accurately as by a sun-dial. It is true he was rarely heard to speak, but smoked his pipe incessantly. His adherents, however (for every neat man has his adherents), perfectly understood him, and knew how to gather his opinions. When anything that was read or related displeased him, he was observed to smoke his pipe vehemently, and to send forth short, frequent and angry puffs, but when pleased, he would inhale the smoke slowly and tranquilly, and emit it in light and placid clouds, and sometimes, taking the pipe from his mouth, and letting the fragrant vapor curl about his nose, would gravely nod his head in token of perfect approbation

From even this stronghold the unlucky Rip was at length routed by his termagant wife, who would suddenly break in upon the tranquillity of the assemblage and call the members all to naught, nor was that august personage, Nicholas Vedder himself, sacred from the daring tongue of this terrible virago, who charged him outright with encouraging her husband in habits of idleness

Poor Rip was at last reduced almost to despair, and his only alternative, to escape from the labor of the farm and clamor of his wife, was to take gun in hand and stroll away into the woods. Here he would sometimes seat himself at the foot of a tree, and share the contents of his wallet with Wolf, with whom he sympathized as a fellow-sufferer in persecution. 'Poor Wolf,' he would say, 'thy mistress leads thee a dog's life of it, but never mind, my lad, whilst I live thou shalt never want a friend to stand by thee!' Wolf would wag his tail, look wistfully in his master's face, and if dogs can feel pity I verily believe he reciprocated the sentiment with all his heart

In a long ramble of the kind on a fine autumnal day, Rip had unconsciously scrambled to one of the highest parts of the Kaatskill mountains. He was after his favorite sport of squirrel shooting, and the still solitudes had echoed and reechoed with the reports of his gun. Panting and fatigued, he threw himself, late in the afternoon, on a green knoll, covered with mountain herbage, that crowned the brow of a precipice. From an opening between the trees he could overlook all the lower country for many a mile of rich woodland. He saw at a distance the lordly Hudson, far, far below him, moving on its silent but majestic course, with the reflection of a purple cloud, or the sail of a lagging bark, here and there sleeping on its glassy bosom, and at last losing itself in the blue high-lands

On the other side he looked down into a deep mountain glen, wild, lonely, and shagged, the bottom filled with fragments from the impending cliffs, and scarcely lighted by the reflected rays of the setting sun. For some time Rip lay musing on this scene, evening was gradually advancing, the mountains began to throw their long blue shadows over the valleys; he saw that it would be dark long before he could reach the village, and he heaved a heavy sigh when he thought of encountering the terrors of Dame Van Winkle.

As he was about to descend, he heard a voice from a distance, hallooing, 'Rip Van Winkle! Rip Van Winkle!' He looked round, but could see nothing but a crow winging its solitary flight across the mountain. He thought his fancy must have deceived him, and turned again to descend, when he heard the same cry ring through the still evening air. 'Rip Van Winkle! Rip Van Winkle!'—at the same time Wolf bristled up his back, and giving a low growl, skulked to his master's side, looking fearfully down into the glen. Rip now felt a vague apprehension stealing over him, he looked anxiously in the same direction, and perceived a strange figure slowly toiling up the rocks, and bending under the weight of something he carried on his back. He was surprised to see any human being in this lonely and unfrequented place, but supposing it to be some one of the neighborhood in need of his assistance, he hastened down to yield it.

On nearer approach he was still more surprised at the singularity of the stranger's appearance. He was a short, square-built old fellow, with thick bushy hair, and a grizzled beard. His dress was of the antique Dutch fashion—a cloth jerkin strapped round the waist—several pair of breeches, the outer one of ample volume, decorated with rows of buttons down the sides, and bunches at the knees. He bore on his shoulder a stout keg, that seemed full of liquor, and made signs for Rip to approach and assist him with the load. Though rather shy and distrustful of this new acquaintance, Rip complied with his usual alacrity, and mutually relieving each other, they clambered up a narrow gully, apparently the dry bed of a mountain torrent. As they ascended, Rip every now and then heard long rolling peals, like distant thunder, that seemed to issue out of a deep ravine, or rather cleft, between lofty rocks, toward which their rugged path conducted. He paused for an instant, but supposing it to be the muttering of one of those transient thunder-showers which often take place in mountain heights, he proceeded. Passing through the ravine, they came to a hollow, like a small amphitheatre, surrounded by perpendicular precipices, over the brinks of which impending trees shot their branches, so that you only caught glimpses of the azure sky and the bright evening cloud. During the whole time Rip and his companion had labored on in silence, for though the former marvelled greatly what could be the object of carrying a keg of liquor up this wild mountain, yet there was something strange and incomprehensible about the unknown, that inspired awe and checked familiarity.

On entering the amphitheatre, new objects of wonder presented themselves. On a level spot in the centre was a company of odd-looking personages playing at nine-pins. They were dressed in a quaint outlandish fashion, some wore short doublets, others jerkins, with long knives in their belts, and most of them had enormous breeches of similar style with that of the guide's. Their visages, too, were peculiar: one had a large head, broad face, and small piggy eyes, the face of another seemed to consist entirely of nose, and was surmounted by a white sugar-loaf hat, set off with a little red cock's tail. They all had beards, of various shapes and colors. There was one who seemed to be the commander. He was a stout old gentleman, with a weather-beaten countenance, he wore a laced doublet, broad belt and hanger, high-crowned hat and feather, red stockings, and high-heeled shoes, with roses in them. The whole group reminded Rip of the figures in an old Flemish painting in the parlor of Dominie Van Shaick, the village parson, which had been brought over from Holland at the time of the settlement.

What seemed particularly odd to Rip was, that though these folks were evidently amusing themselves, yet they maintained the gravest faces, the most mysterious silence, and were, withal, the most melancholy party of pleasure he had ever witnessed. Nothing interrupted the stillness of the scene but the noise of the balls, which, whenever they were rolled, echoed along the mountains like rumbling peals of thunder.

As Rip and his companion approached them, they suddenly desisted from their play, and stared at him with such fixed, statue-like gaze, and such strange, uncouth, lack-lustre countenances, that his heart turned within him, and his knees smote together. His companion now emptied the contents of the keg into large flagons, and made signs to him to wait upon the company. He obeyed with fear and trembling, they quaffed the liquor in profound silence, and then returned to their game.

By degrees Rip's awe and apprehension subsided. He even ventured, when no eye was fixed upon him, to taste the beverage, which he found had much of the flavor of excellent Hollands. He was naturally a thirsty soul, and was soon tempted to repeat the draught. One taste provoked another, and he reiterated his visits to the flagon so often that at length his senses were overpowered, his eyes swam in his head, his head gradually declined, and he fell into a deep sleep.

On waking, he found himself on the green knoll whence he had first seen the old man of the glen. He rubbed his eyes—it was a bright, sunny morning. The birds were hopping and twittering among the bushes, and the eagle was wheeling aloft, and breasting the pure mountain breeze. 'Surely,' thought Rip, 'I have not slept here all night.' He recalled the occurrences before he fell asleep. The strange man with a keg of liquor—the mountain ravine—the wild retreat among the rocks—the woe-begone party at nine-pins—the flagon—'Oh! that flagon! that wicked flagon!' thought Rip—'what excuse shall I make to Dame Van Winkle?'

He looked round for his gun, but in place of the clean, well-oiled fowling-piece, he found an old firelock lying by him, the barrel incrustated with rust, the lock falling off, and the stock worm-eaten. He now suspected that the grave roisters of the mountain had put a trick upon him, and, having dosed him with liquor, had robbed him of his gun. Wolf, too, had disappeared, but he might have strayed away after a squirrel or partridge. He whistled after him, and shouted his name, but all in vain, the echoes repeated his whistle and shout, but no dog was to be seen.

He determined to revisit the scene of the last evening's gambol, and if he met with any of the party, to demand his dog and gun. As he rose to walk, he found himself stiff in the joints, and wanting in his usual activity 'These mountain beds do not agree with me,' thought Rip, 'and if this frolic should lay me up with a fit of the rheumatism, I shall have a blessed time with Dame Van Winkle.' With some difficulty he got down into the glen; he found the gully up which he and his companion had ascended the preceding evening, but to his astonishment a mountain stream was now foaming down it, leaping from rock to rock, and filling the glen with babbling murmurs. He, however, made shift to scramble up its sides, working his toilsome way through thickets of birch, sassafras, and witch-hazel, and sometimes tripped up or entangled by the wild grapevines that twisted their coils or tendrils from tree to tree, and spread a kind of network in his path.

At length he reached to where the ravine had opened through the cliffs to the amphitheatre, but no traces of such opening remained. The rocks presented a high, impenetrable wall, over which the torrent came tumbling in a sheet of feathery foam, and fell into a broad, deep basin, black from the shadows of the surrounding forest. Here, then, poor Rip was brought to a stand. He again called and whistled after his dog, he was only answered by the cawing of a flock of idle crows, sporting high in air about a dry tree that overhung a sunny precipice, and who, secure in their elevation, seemed to look down and scoff at the poor man's perplexities. What was to be done? the morning was passing away, and Rip felt famished for want of his breakfast. He grieved to give up his dog and gun, he dreaded to meet his wife, but it would not do to starve among the mountains. He shook his head, shouldered the rusty firelock, and, with a heart full of trouble and anxiety, turned his steps homeward.

As he approached the village he met a number of people, but none whom he knew, which somewhat surprised him, for he had thought himself acquainted with every one in the country round. Their dress, too, was of a different fashion from that to which he was accustomed. They all stared at him with equal marks of surprise, and whenever they cast their eyes upon him, invariably stroked their chins. The constant recurrence of this gesture induced Rip, involuntarily, to do the same, when, to his astonishment, he found his beard had grown a foot long!

He had now entered the skirts of the village. A troop of strange children ran at his heels, hooting after him, and pointing at his gray beard. The dogs, too, not one of which he recognized for an old acquaintance, barked at him as he passed. The very village was altered, it was larger and more populous. There were rows of houses which he had never seen before, and those which had been his familiar haunts had disappeared. Strange names were over the doors—strange faces at the windows,—everything was strange. His mind now misgave him, he began to doubt whether both he and the world around him were not bewitched. Surely this was his native village, which he had left but the day before. There stood the Kaatskill mountains—there ran the silver Hudson at a distance—there was every hill and dale precisely as it had always been—Rip was sorely perplexed—'That flagon last night,' thought he, 'has addled my poor head sadly!'

It was with some difficulty that he found the way to his own house, which he approached with silent awe, expecting every moment to hear the shrill voice of Dame Van Winkle. He found the house gone to decay—the roof fallen in, the windows shattered, and the doors off the hinges. A half-starved dog that looked like Wolf was skulking about it. Rip called him by name, but the cur snarled, showed his teeth, and passed on. This was an unkind cut indeed—'My very dog,' sighed poor Rip, 'has forgotten me!'

He entered the house, which, to tell the truth, Dame Van Winkle had always kept in neat order. It was empty, forlorn, and apparently abandoned. This desolateness overcame all his connubial fears—he called loudly for his wife and children—the lonely chambers rang for a moment with his voice, and then all again was silence.

He now hurried forth, and hastened to his old resort, the village inn—but it, too, was gone. A large, rickety wooden building stood in its place, with great gaping windows, some of them broken and mended with old hats and petticoats, and over the door was painted, 'The Union Hotel, by Jonathan Doolittle.' Instead of the great tree that used to shelter the quiet little Dutch inn of yore, there now was reared a tall naked pole, with something on the top that looked like a red night-cap, and from it was fluttering a flag, on which was a singular assemblage of stars and stripes—10 all this was strange and incomprehensible. He recognized on the sign, however, the ruby face of King George, under which he had smoked so many a peaceful pipe, but even this was singularly metamorphosed. The red coat was changed for one of blue and buff, a sword was held in the hand instead of a sceptre, the head was decorated with a cocked hat, and underneath was painted in large characters, GENERAL

 WASHINGTON

There was, as usual, a crowd of folk about the door, but none that Rip recollected. The very character of the people seemed changed. There was a busy, bustling, disputatious tone about it, instead of the accustomed phlegm and drowsy tranquillity. He looked in vain for the sage Nicholas Vedder, with his broad face, 20 double chin, and fair long pipe, uttering clouds of tobacco-smoke instead of idle speeches, or Van Bummel, the school-master, doling forth the contents of an ancient newspaper. In place of these, a lean, bilious-looking fellow, with his pockets full of handbills, was haranguing vehemently about rights of citizens—elections—members of congress—liberty—Bunker's Hill—30 heroes of seventy-six—and other words, which were a perfect Babylonish jargon to the bewildered Van Winkle.

The appearance of Rip, with his long grizzled beard, his rusty fowling-piece, his uncouth dress, and an army of women and children at his heels, soon attracted the attention of the tavern-politicians. They crowded round him, eyeing him from head to foot with great curiosity. The orator 40 bustled up to him, and, drawing him partly aside, inquired 'on which side he voted?' Rip stared in vacant stupidity. Another short but busy little fellow pulled him by the arm, and, rising on tiptoe, inquired in his ear, 'Whether he was Federal or Democrat?' Rip was equally at a loss to comprehend the question, when a knowing, self-important old gentleman, in a sharp cocked hat, made his way through the crowd, putting them to the right and left with his elbows as he passed, and planting himself before Van Winkle, with one arm akimbo, the other resting on his cane, his keen eyes and sharp hat penetrating, as it were, into his very soul, demanded in an austere tone, 10 'what brought him to the election with a gun on his shoulder, and a mob at his heels, and whether he meant to breed a riot in the village?'—'Alas! gentlemen,' cried Rip, somewhat dismayed, 'I am a poor quiet man, a native of the place, and a loyal subject of the king, God bless him!'

Here a general shout burst from the bystanders—'A tory! a tory! a spy! a refugee! hustle him! away with him!' It was with great difficulty that the self-important man in the cocked hat restored order, and, having assumed a tenfold austerity of brow, demanded again of the unknown culprit what he came there for, and whom he was seeking? The poor man humbly assured him that he meant no harm, but merely came there in search of some of his neighbors, who used to keep about the tavern.

'Well—who are they?—name them.'

Rip bethought himself a moment, and inquired, 'Where's Nicholas Vedder?'

There was a silence for a little while, when an old man replied, in a thin, piping voice 'Nicholas Vedder! why, he is dead and gone these eighteen years! There was a wooden tombstone in the churchyard that used to tell all about him, but that's rotten and gone too.'

'Where's Brom Dutcher?'

40 'Oh, he went off to the army in the beginning of the war, some say he was killed at the storming of Stony Point—others say he was drowned in a squall at the foot of Antony's Nose. I don't know—he never came back again.'

'Where's Van Bummel, the school-master?'

'He went off to the wars too, was a great militia general, and is now in Congress.'

50 Rip's heart died away at hearing of these sad changes in his home and friends, and finding himself thus alone in the world. Every answer puzzled him too, by treating of such enormous lapses of time, and of matters which he could not understand.

war—Congress—Stony Point,—he had no courage to ask after any more friends, but cried out in despair, 'Does nobody here know Rip Van Winkle?'

'Oh, Rip Van Winkle!' exclaimed two or three, 'Oh, to be sure! that's Rip Van Winkle yonder, leaning against the tree.'

Rip looked, and beheld a precise counterpart of himself, as he went up the mountain apparently as lazy, and certainly as ragged. The poor fellow was now completely confounded. He doubted his own identity, and whether he was himself or another man. In the midst of his bewilderment, the man in the cocked hat demanded who he was, and what was his name?

'God knows,' exclaimed he, at his wit's end, 'I'm not myself—I'm somebody else—that's me yonder—no—that's somebody else got into my shoes—I was myself last night, but I fell asleep on the mountain, and they've changed my gun, and everything's changed, and I'm changed, and I can't tell what's my name, or who I am!'

The bystanders began now to look at each other, nod, wink significantly, and tap their fingers against their foreheads. There was a whisper, also, about securing the gun, and keeping the old fellow from doing mischief, at the very suggestion of which the self-important man in the cocked hat retired with some precipitation. At this critical moment a fresh, comely woman pressed through the throng to get a peep at the gray-bearded man. She had a chubby child in her arms, which, frightened at his looks, began to cry. 'Hush, Rip,' cried she, 'hush, you little fool, the old man won't hurt you.' The name of the child, the air of the mother, the tone of her voice, all awakened a train of recollections in his mind. 'What is your name, my good woman?' asked he.

'Judith Gardenier.'

'And your father's name?'

'Ah, poor man, Rip Van Winkle was his name, but it's twenty years since he went away from home with his gun, and never has been heard of since,—his dog came home without him, but whether he shot himself, or was carried away by the Indians, nobody can tell. I was then but a little girl.'

Rip had but one question more to ask, but he put it with a faltering voice:

'Where's your mother?'

'Oh, she too had died but a short time since, she broke a blood-vessel in a fit of passion at a New England peddler.'

There was a drop of comfort, at least, in this intelligence. The honest man could contain himself no longer. He caught his daughter and her child in his arms. 'I am your father!' cried he—'Young Rip Van Winkle once—old Rip Van Winkle now!—Does nobody know poor Rip Van Winkle?'

All stood amazed, until an old woman, tottering out from among the crowd, put her hand to her brow, and peering under it in his face for a moment, exclaimed, 'Sure enough! it is Rip Van Winkle—it is himself! Welcome home again, old neighbor—Why, where have you been these twenty long years?'

Rip's story was soon told, for the whole twenty years had been to him but as one night. The neighbors stared when they heard it, some were seen to wink at each other, and put their tongues in their cheeks, and the self-important man in the cocked hat, who, when the alarm was over, had returned to the field, screwed down the corners of his mouth, and shook his head—upon which there was a general shaking of the head throughout the assemblage.

It was determined, however, to take the opinion of old Peter Vanderdonk, who was seen slowly advancing up the road. He was a descendant of the historian of that name, who wrote one of the earliest accounts of the province. Peter was the most ancient inhabitant of the village, and well versed in all the wonderful events and traditions of the neighborhood. He recollected Rip at once, and corroborated his story in the most satisfactory manner. He assured the company that it was a fact, handed down from his ancestor the historian, that the Kaatskill mountains had always been haunted by strange beings. That it was affirmed that the great Hendrick Hudson, the first discover of the river and country, kept a kind of vigil there every twenty years, with his crew of the Half-moon, being permitted in this way to revisit the scenes of his enterprise, and keep a guardian eye upon the river and the great city called by his name. That his father had once seen them in their old Dutch dresses playing at ninepins in a hollow of the mountain, and that he himself had heard, one summer afternoon, the sound of their balls like distant peals of thunder

To make a long story short, the company broke up, and returned to the more important concerns of the election. Rip's daughter took him home to live with her, she had a snug, well-furnished house, and a stout cheery farmer for a husband, whom Rip recollected for one of the urchins that used to climb upon his back. As to Rip's son and heir, who was the ditto of himself, seen leaning against the tree, he was employed to work on the farm, but evinced an hereditary disposition to attend to anything else but his business.

Rip now resumed his old walks and habits, he soon found many of his former cronies, though all rather the worse for the wear and tear of time, and preferred making friends among the rising generation, with whom he soon grew into great favor.

Having nothing to do at home, and being arrived at that happy age when a man can be idle with impunity, he took his place once more on the bench at the inn door, and was revered as one of the patriarchs of the village, and a chronicle of the old times 'before the war.' It was some time before he could get into the regular track of gossip, or could be made to comprehend the strange events that had taken place during his torpor. How that there had been a revolutionary war—that the country had thrown off the yoke of old England—and that, instead of being a subject of his Majesty George the Third, he was now a free citizen of the United States. Rip, in fact, was no politician, the changes of states and empires made but little impression on him, but there was one species of despotism under which he had long groaned, and that was—petticoat government. Happily that was at an end, he had got his neck out of the yoke of matrimony, and could go in and out whenever he pleased, without dreading the tyranny of Dame Van Winkle. Whenever her name was mentioned, however, he shook his head, shrugged his shoulders, and cast up his eyes, which might pass either for an expression of resignation to his fate, or joy at his deliverance.

He used to tell his story to every stranger that arrived at Mr. Doolittle's hotel. He was observed, at first, to vary on some points every time he told it, which was, doubtless, owing to his having so recently awaked. It at last settled down precisely to the tale I have related, and not a man, woman, or child in the neighborhood but knew it by heart. Some always pretended to doubt the reality of it, and insisted that Rip had been out of his head, and that this was one point on which he always remained flighty. The old Dutch inhabitants, however, almost universally gave it full credit. Even to this day they never hear a thunder-storm of a summer afternoon about the Kaatskill, but they say Hendrick Hudson and his crew are at their game of ninepins, and it is a common wish of all henpecked husbands in the neighborhood, when life hangs heavy on their hands, that they might have a queting draught out of Rip Van Winkle's flagon.

LEGEND OF THE ROSE OF THE ALHAMBRA

FOR some time after the surrender of Granada by the Moors, that delightful city was a frequent and favorite residence of the Spanish sovereigns, until they were frightened away by successive shocks of earthquakes, which toppled down various houses, and made the old Moslem towers rock to their foundation.

Many, many years then rolled away, during which Granada was rarely honored by a royal guest. The palaces of the nobility remained silent and shut up, and the Alhambra, like a slighted beauty, sat in mournful desolation among her neglected gardens. The tower of the Infantas, once the residence of the three beautiful Moorish princesses, partook of the general desolation, the spider spun her web athwart the gilded vault, and bats and owls nestled in those chambers that had been graced by the presence of Zayda, Zorayda, and Zorahayda. The neglect of this tower may partly have been owing to some superstitious notions of the neighbors. It was rumored that the spirit of the youthful Zorahayda, who had perished in that tower, was often seen by moonlight seated beside the fountain in the hall, or moaning about the battlements, and that the notes of her silver ute would be heard at midnight by wayfarers passing along the glen

At length the city of Granada was once more welcomed by the royal presence. All the world knows that Philip V. was the first Bourbon that swayed the Spanish sceptre. All the world knows that he married, in second nuptials, Elizabetha or Isabella (for they are the same), the beautiful princess of Parma, and all the world knows that by this chain of contingencies a French prince and an Italian princess were seated together on the Spanish throne. For a visit of this illustrious pair, the Alhambra was repaired and fitted up with all possible expedition. The arrival of the court changed the whole aspect of the lately deserted palace. The clangor of drum and trumpet, the tramp of steed about the avenues and outer court, the glitter of arms and display of banners about barbican and battlement, recalled the ancient and warlike glories of the fortress. A softer spirit, however, reigned within the royal palace. There was the rustling of robes and the cautious tread and murmuring voice of reverential courtiers about the antechambers, a loitering of pages and maids of honor about the gardens, and the sound of music stealing from open casements.

Among those who attended in the train of the monarchs was a favorite page of the queen, named Ruyz de Alarcon. To say that he was a favorite page of the queen was at once to speak his eulogium, for every one in the suite of the stately Elizabetha was chosen for grace, and beauty, and accomplishments. He was just turned of eighteen, light and lithe of form, and graceful as a young Antinous. To the queen he was all deference and respect, yet he was at heart a roguish stripling, petted and spoiled by the ladies about the court, and experienced in the ways of women far beyond his years.

This loitering page was one morning rambling about the groves of the Generalife, which overlook the grounds of the Alhambra. He had taken with him for his amusement a favorite ger-falcon of the queen. In the course of his rambles, seeing a bird rising from a thicket, he unhooded the hawk and let him fly. The falcon towered high in the air, made a swoop at his quarry, but missing it, soared away, regardless of the calls of the page. The latter followed the truant bird with his eye, in its capricious flight, until he saw it alight upon the battlements of a remote and lonely tower, in the outer wall of the Alhambra, built on the edge of a ravine that separated the royal fortress from the grounds of the Generalife. It was in fact the "Tower of the Princesses."

The page descended into the ravine and approached the tower, but it had no entrance from the glen, and its lofty height rendered any attempt to scale it fruitless. Seeking one of the gates of the fortress, therefore, he made a wide circuit to that side of the tower facing within the walls.

A small garden, enclosed by a trellis-work of reeds overhung with myrtle, lay before the tower. Opening a wicket, the page passed between beds of flowers and thickets of roses to the door. It was closed and bolted. A crevice in the door gave him a peep into the interior. There was a small Moorish hall with fretted walls, light marble columns, and an alabaster fountain surrounded with flowers. In the centre hung a gilt cage containing a singing-bird, beneath it, on a chair, lay a tortoise-shell cat among reels of silk and other articles of female labor, and a gutar decorated with ribbons leaned against the fountain.

Ruyz de Alarcon was struck with these traces of female taste and elegance in a lonely, and, as he had supposed, deserted tower. They reminded him of the tales of enchanted halls current in the Alhambra, and the tortoise-shell cat might be some spell-bound princess.

He knocked gently at the door. A beautiful face peeped out from a little window above, but was instantly withdrawn. He waited, expecting that the door would be opened, but he waited in vain, no footstep was to be heard within—all was silent. Had his senses deceived him, or was this beautiful apparition the fairy of the tower? He knocked again, and more loudly. After a little while the beaming face once more peeped forth, it was that of a blooming damsel of fifteen.

The page immediately doffed his plumed bonnet, and entreated in the most courteous accents to be permitted to ascend the tower in pursuit of his falcon.

"I dare not open the door, Señor," replied the little damsel, blushing, 'my aunt has forbidden it'

'I do beseech you, fair maid—it is the favorite falcon of the queen. I dare not return to the palace without it'

'Are you then one of the cavaliers of the court?'

'I am, fair maid, but I shall lose the queen's favor and my place, if I lose this hawk'

'Santa Maria! It is against you cavaliers of the court my aunt has charged me especially to bar the door'

'Against wicked cavaliers doubtless, but I am none of these, but a simple, harmless page, who will be ruined and undone if you deny me this small request'

The heart of the little damsel was touched by the distress of the page. It was a thousand pities he should be ruined for the want of so trifling a boon. Surely too he could not be one of those dangerous beings whom her aunt had described as a species of cannibal, ever on the prowl to make prey of thoughtless damsels, he was gentle and modest, and stood so entreatingly with cap in hand, and looked so charming

The sly page saw that the garrison began to waver, and redoubled his entreaties in such moving terms that it was not in the nature of mortal maiden to deny him, so the blushing little warden of the tower descended, and opened the door with a trembling hand, and if the page had been charmed by a mere glimpse of her countenance from the window, he was ravished by the full-length portrait now revealed to him

Her Andalusian bodice and trim basquina set off the round but delicate symmetry of her form, which was as yet scarce verging into womanhood. Her glossy hair was parted on her forehead with scrupulous exactness, and decorated with a fresh plucked rose, according to the universal custom of the country. It is true her complexion was tinged by the ardor of a southern sun, but it served to give richness to the mantling bloom of her cheek, and to heighten the lustre of her melting eyes

Ruyz de Alarcon beheld all this with a single glance, for it became him not to tarry, he merely murmured his acknowledgments, and then bounded lightly up the spiral staircase in quest of his falcon.

He soon returned with the truant bird upon his fist. The damsel, in the mean time, had seated herself by the fountain in the hall, and was winding silk, but in her agitation she let fall the reel upon the pavement. The page sprang and picked it up, then dropping gracefully on one knee, presented it to her, but, seizing the hand extended to receive it, imprinted on it a kiss more fervent and devout than he had ever imprinted on the fair hand of his sovereign

'Ave Maria, Señor!' exclaimed the damsel, blushing still deeper with confusion and surprise, for never before had she received such a salutation

The modest page made a thousand apologies, assuring her it was the way at court of expressing the most profound homage and respect

Her anger, if anger she felt, was easily pacified, but her agitation and embarrassment continued, and she sat blushing deeper and deeper, with her eyes cast down upon her work, entangling the silk which she attempted to wind

The cunning page saw the confusion in the opposite camp, and would fain have profited by it, but the fine speeches he would have uttered died upon his lips, his attempts at gallantry were awkward and ineffectual, and to his surprise, the adroit page, who had figured with such grace and effrontery among the most knowing and experienced ladies of the court, found himself awed and abashed in the presence of a simple damsel of fifteen

In fact, the artless maiden, in her own modesty and innocence, had guardians more effectual than the bolts and bars prescribed by her vigilant aunt. Still, where is the female bosom proof against the first whisperings of love? The little damsel, with all her artlessness, instinctively comprehended all that the faltering tongue of the page failed to express, and her heart was fluttered at beholding, for the first time, a lover at her feet—and such a lover!

The diffidence of the page, though genuine, was short-lived, and he was recovering his usual ease and confidence, when a shrill voice was heard at a distance

'My aunt is returning from mass!' cried the damsel in affright. 'I pray you, Señor, depart'

'Not until you grant me that rose from your hair as a remembrance'

She hastily untwisted the rose from her raven locks 'Take it,' cried she, agitated and blushing, 'but pray begone'

The page took the rose, and at the same time covered with kisses the fair hand that gave it Then, placing the flower in his bonnet, and taking the falcon upon his fist, he bounded off through the garden, bearing away with him the heart of the gentle Jacinta

When the vigilant aunt arrived at the tower, she remarked the agitation of her niece, and an air of confusion in the hall; but a word of explanation sufficed 'A ger-falcon had pursued his prey into the hall'

'Mercy on us! to think of a falcon flying into the tower Did ever one hear of so saucy a hawk? Why, the very bird in the cage is not safe!'

The vigilant Fredegonda was one of the most wary of ancient spinsters She had a becoming terror and distrust of what she denominated 'the opposite sex,' which had gradually increased through a long life of celibacy Not that the good lady had ever suffered from their wiles, nature having set up a safeguard in her face that forbade all trespass upon her premises, but ladies who have least cause to fear for themselves are most ready to keep a watch over their more tempting neighbors

The niece was the orphan of an officer who had fallen in the wars She had been educated in a convent, and had recently been transferred from her sacred asylum to the immediate guardianship of her aunt, under whose overshadowing care she vegetated in obscurity, like an opening rose blooming beneath a brier Nor indeed is this comparison entirely accidental, for, to tell the truth, her fresh and dawning beauty had caught the public eye, even in her seclusion, and, with that poetical turn common to the people of Andalusia, the peasantry of the neighborhood had given her the appellation of 'the Rose of the Alhambra'

The wary aunt continued to keep a faithful watch over her tempting little niece as long as the court continued at Granada, and flattered herself that her vigilance had been successful It is true, the good lady was now and then discomposed by the tinkling of guitars and chanting of love-duties from the moonlit groves beneath the tower, but she would exhort her niece to shut her ears against such idle minstrelsy, assuring her that it was one of the arts of the opposite sex, by which simple maids were often lured to their undoing Alas! what chance with a simple maid has a dry lecture against a moonlight serenade?

At length king Philip cut short his sojourn at Granada, and suddenly departed with all his train The vigilant Fredegonda watched the royal pageant as it issued forth from the Gate of Justice, and descended the great avenue leading to the city When the last banner disappeared from her sight, she returned exulting to her tower, for all her cares were over To her surprise, a light Arabian steed pawed the ground at the wicket-gate of the garden,—to her horror she saw through the thickets of roses a youth in gayly-embroidered dress, at the feet of her niece At the sound of her footsteps he gave a tender adieu, bounded lightly over the barrier of reeds and myrtles, sprang upon his horse, and was out of sight in an instant

The tender Jacinta, in the agony of her grief, lost all thought of her aunt's displeasure Throwing herself into her arms, she broke forth into sobs and tears

'Ay de mi!' cried she, 'he's gone!—he's gone!—he's gone! and I shall never see him more!'

'Gone!—who is gone?—what youth is that I saw at your feet?'

'A queen's page, aunt, who came to bid me farewell'

'A queen's page, child!' echoed the vigilant Fredegonda, faintly, 'and when did you become acquainted with the queen's page?'

'The morning that the ger-falcon came into the tower It was the queen's ger-falcon, and he came in pursuit of it'

'Ah silly, silly girl! know that there are no ger-falcons half so dangerous as these young pranking pages, and it is precisely such simple birds as thee that they pounce upon'

The aunt was at first indignant at learning that in despite of her boasted vigilance, a tender intercourse had been carried on by the youthful lovers, almost beneath her eye, but when she found that her simple-hearted niece, though thus exposed, without the protection of bolt or bar, to all the machinations of the opposite sex, had come forth unsinged from the fiery ordeal, she consoled herself with the persuasion that it was owing to the chaste and cautious maxims in which she had, as it were, steeped her to the very lips

While the aunt laid this soothing unction to her pride, the niece treasured up the oft-repeated vows of fidelity of the page But what is the love of restless, roving man? A vagrant stream that dallies for a time with each flower upon its bank, then passes on, and leaves them all in tears.

Days, weeks, months elapsed, and nothing more was heard of the page The pomegranate ripened, the vine yielded up its fruit, the autumnal rains descended in torrents from the mountains, the Sierra Nevada became covered with a snowy mantle, and wintry blasts howled through the halls of the Alhambra—still he came not The winter passed away. Again the genial spring burst forth with song and blossom and balmy zephyr, the snows melted from the mountains, until none remained but on the lofty summit of Nevada, glistening through the sultry summer air Still nothing was heard of the forgetful page

In the mean time, the poor little Jacinta grew pale and thoughtful Her former occupations and amusements were abandoned, her silk lay entangled, her guitar unstrung, her flowers were neglected, the notes of her bird unheeded, and her eyes, once so bright, were dimmed with secret weeping If any solitude could be devised to foster the passion of a love-lorn damsel, it would be such a place as the Alhambra, where everything seems disposed to produce tender and romantic reveries. It is a very paradise for lovers how hard then to be alone in such a paradise—and not merely alone, but forsaken!

'Alas, silly child!' would the staid and immaculate Fredegonda say, when she found her niece in one of her desponding moods—'did I not warn thee against the wiles and deceptions of these men? What couldst thou expect, too, from one of a haughty and aspiring family—thou an orphan, the descendant of a fallen and impoverished line? Be assured, if the youth were true, his father, who is one of the proudest nobles about the court, would prohibit his union with one so humble and portionless as thou Pluck up thy resolution, therefore, and drive these idle notions from thy mind'

The words of the immaculate Fredegonda only served to increase the melancholy of her niece, but she sought to indulge it in private At a late hour one mid-summer night, after her aunt had retired to rest, she remained alone in the hall of the tower, seated beside the alabaster fountain It was here that the faithless page had first knelt and kissed her hand, it was here that he had often vowed eternal fidelity The poor little damsel's heart was overlaid with sad and tender recollections, her tears began to flow, and slowly fell drop by drop into the fountain By degrees the crystal water became agitated, and—bubble—bubble—bubble—boiled up and was tossed about, until a female figure, richly clad in Moorish robes, slowly rose to view

Jacinta was so frightened that she fled from the hall, and did not venture to return The next morning she related what she had seen to her aunt, but the good lady treated it as a fantasy of her troubled mind, or supposed she had fallen asleep and dreamt beside the fountain 'Thou hast been thinking of the story of the three Moorish princesses that once inhabited this tower,' continued she, 'and it has entered into thy dreams'

'What story, aunt? I know nothing of it'

'Thou hast certainly heard of the three princesses, Zayda, Zorayda, and Zorahayda, who were confined in this tower by the king their father, and agreed to fly with three Christian cavaliers The two first accomplished their escape, but the third failed in her resolution, and, it is said, died in this tower'

'I now recollect to have heard of it,' said Jacinta, 'and to have wept over the fate of the gentle Zorahayda'

'Thou mayest well weep over her fate,' continued the aunt, 'for the lover of Zorahayda was thy ancestor He long bemoaned his Moorish love, but time cured him of his grief, and he married a Spanish lady, from whom thou art descended'

Jacinta ruminated upon these words 'That what I have seen is no fantasy of the brain,' said she to herself, 'I am confident. If indeed it be the spirit of the gentle Zorahayda, which I have heard lingers about this tower, of what should I be afraid? I'll watch by the fountain to-night—perhaps the visit will be repeated.'

Towards midnight, when everything was quiet, she again took her seat in the hall. As the bell in the distant watch-tower of the Alhambra struck the midnight hour, the fountain was again agitated, and bubble—bubble—bubble—it tossed about the waters until the Moorish female again rose to view. She was young and beautiful, her dress was rich with jewels, and in her hand she held a silver lute. Jacinta trembled and was faint, but was reassured by the soft and plaintive voice of the apparition, and the sweet expression of her pale, melancholy countenance.

'Daughter of mortality,' said she, 'what aileth thee? Why do thy tears trouble my fountain, and thy sighs and complaints disturb the quiet watches of the night?'

'I weep because of the faithlessness of man, and I bemoan my solitary and forsaken state.'

'Take comfort, thy sorrows may yet have an end. Thou beholdest a Moorish princess, who, like thee, was unhappy in her love. A Christian knight, thy ancestor, won my heart, and would have borne me to his native land and to the bosom of his church. I was a convert in my heart, but I lacked courage equal to my faith, and lingered till too late. For this the evil geni are permitted to have power over me, and I remain enchanted in this tower until some pure Christian will deign to break the magic spell. Wilt thou undertake the task?'

'I will,' replied the damsel, trembling.

'Come hither then, and fear not, dip thy hand in the fountain, sprinkle the water over me, and baptize me after the manner of thy faith, so shall the enchantment be dispelled, and my troubled spirit have repose.'

The damsel advanced with faltering steps, dipped her hand in the fountain, collected water in the palm, and sprinkled it over the pale face of the phantom.

The latter smiled with ineffable benig-nity. She dropped her silver lute at the feet of Jacinta, crossed her white arms upon her bosom, and melted from sight, so that it seemed merely as if a shower of dew-drops had fallen into the fountain.

Jacinta retired from the hall filled with awe and wonder. She scarcely closed her eyes that night, but when she awoke at daybreak out of a troubled slumber, the whole appeared to her like a distempered dream. On descending into the hall, however, the truth of the vision was established, for beside the fountain she beheld the silver lute glittering in the morning sunshine.

She hastened to her aunt, to relate all that had befallen her, and called her to behold the lute as a testimonial of the reality of her story. If the good lady had any lingering doubts, they were removed when Jacinta touched the instrument, for she drew forth such ravishing tones as to thaw even the frigid bosom of the immaculate Fredegonda, that region of eternal winter, into a genial flow. Nothing but supernatural melody could have produced such an effect.

The extraordinary power of the lute became every day more and more apparent. The wayfarer passing by the tower was detained, and, as it were, spell-bound, in breathless ecstasy. The very birds gathered in the neighboring trees, and hushing their own strains, listened in charmed silence.

Rumor soon spread the news abroad. The inhabitants of Granada thronged to the Alhambra to catch a few notes of the transcendent music that floated about the tower of Las Infantas.

The lovely little minstrel was at length drawn forth from her retreat. The rich and powerful of the land contended who should entertain and do honor to her, or rather, who should secure the charms of her lute to draw fashionable throngs to their saloons. Wherever she went her vigilant aunt kept a dragon watch at her elbow, awing the throngs of impassioned admirers who hung in raptures on her strains. The report of her wonderful powers spread from city to city. Malaga, Seville, Cordova, all became successively mad on the theme, nothing was talked of throughout Andalusia but the beautiful minstrel of the Alhambra. How could it be otherwise among a people so musical and gallant as the Andalusians, when the lute was magical in its powers, and the minstrel inspired by love!

While all Andalusia was thus music mad, a different mood prevailed at the court of Spain Philip V, as is well known, was a miserable hypochondriac, and subject to all kinds of fancies. Sometimes he would keep to his bed for weeks together, groaning under imaginary complaints. At other times he would insist upon abdicating his throne, to the great annoyance of his royal spouse, who had a strong relish for the splendors of a court and the glories of a crown, and guided the sceptre of her imbecile lord with an expert and steady hand.

Nothing was found to be so efficacious in dispelling the royal megrims as the power of music, the queen took care, therefore, to have the best performers, both vocal and instrumental, at hand, and retained the famous Italian singer Farinelli about the court as a kind of royal physician.

At the moment we treat of, however, a freak had come over the mind of this sapient and illustrious Bourbon that surpassed all former vagaries. After a long spell of imaginary illness, which set all the strains of Farinelli and the consultations of a whole orchestra of court-fiddlers at defiance, the monarch fairly, in idea, gave up the ghost, and considered himself absolutely dead.

This would have been harmless enough, and even convenient both to his queen and courtiers, had he been content to remain in the quietude befitting a dead man, but to their annoyance he insisted upon having the funeral ceremonies performed over him, and, to their inexpressible perplexity, began to grow impatient, and to revile bitterly at them for negligence and disrespect, in leaving him unburied. What was to be done? To disobey the king's positive commands was monstrous in the eyes of the obsequious courtiers of a punctilious court—but to obey him, and bury him alive would be downright regicide!

In the midst of this fearful dilemma a rumor reached the court, of the female minstrel who was turning the brains of all Andalusia. The queen dispatched missions in all haste to summon her to St Ildefonso, where the court at that time resided.

Within a few days, as the queen with her maids of honor was walking in those stately gardens, intended, with their avenues and terraces and fountains, to eclipse the glories of Versailles, the far-famed minstrel was conducted into her presence. The imperial Elizabetta gazed with surprise at the youthful and unpretending appearance of the little being that had set the world madding. She was in her picturesque Andalusian dress, her silver lute in hand, and stood with modest and downcast eyes, but with a simplicity and freshness of beauty that still bespoke her 'the Rose of the Alhambra'.

As usual she was accompanied by the ever-vigilant Fredegonda, who gave the whole history of her parentage and descent to the inquiring queen. If the stately Elizabetta had been interested by the appearance of Jacinta, she was still more pleased when she learnt that she was of a meritorious though impoverished line, and that her father had bravely fallen in the service of the crown. 'If thy powers equal their renown,' said she, 'and thou canst cast forth this evil spirit that possesses thy sovereign, thy fortunes shall henceforth be my care, and honors and wealth attend thee.'

Impatient to make trial of her skill, she led the way at once to the apartment of the moody monarch.

Jacinta followed with downcast eyes through files of guards and crowds of courtiers. They arrived at length at a great chamber hung with black. The windows were closed to exclude the light of day; a number of yellow wax tapers in silver sconces diffused a lugubrious light, and dimly revealed the figures of mutes in mourning dresses, and courtiers who glided about with noiseless step and woebegone visage. In the midst of a funeral bed or bier, his hands folded on his breast, and the tip of his nose just visible, lay extended this would-be-buried monarch.

The queen entered the chamber in silence, and pointing to a footstool in an obscure corner, beckoned to Jacinta to sit down and commence.

At first she touched her lute with a faltering hand, but gathering confidence and animation as she proceeded, drew forth such soft aerial harmony, that all present could scarce believe it mortal. As to the monarch, who had already considered himself in the world of spirits, he set it down for some angelic melody or the music of the spheres. By degrees the theme was varied, and the voice of the minstrel accompanied the instrument She poured forth one of the legendary ballads treating of the ancient glories of the Alhambra and the achievements of the Moors Her whole soul entered into the theme, for with the recollections of the Alhambra was associated the story of her love The funeral chamber resounded with the animating strain It entered into the gloomy heart of the monarch He raised his head and gazed around he sat up on his couch, his eye began to kindle—at length, leaping upon the floor, he called for sword and buckler

The triumph of music, or rather of the enchanted lute, was complete, the demon of melancholy was cast forth, and, as it were, a dead man brought to life The windows of the apartment were thrown open, the glorious effulgence of Spanish sunshine burst into the late lugubrious chamber, all eyes sought the lovely enchantress, but the lute had fallen from her hand, she had sunk upon the earth, and the next moment was clasped to the bosom of Ruyz de Alarcon

The nuptials of the happy couple were celebrated soon afterwards with great splendor, and the Rose of the Alhambra became the ornament and delight of the court 'But hold—not so fast'—I hear the reader exclaim, 'this is jumping to the end of a story at a furious rate! First let us know how Ruyz de Alarcon managed to account to Jacinta for his long neglect?' Nothing more easy, the venerable, time-honored excuse, the opposition to his wishes by a proud, pragmatism old father besides, young people who really like one another soon come to an amicable understanding, and bury all past grievances when once they meet

But how was the proud, pragmatism old father reconciled to the match?

Oh! as to that, his scruples were easily overcome by a word or two from the queen, especially as dignities and rewards were showered upon the blooming favorite of royalty. Besides, the lute of Jacinta, you know, possessed a magic power, and could control the most stubborn head and hardest breast

And what came of the enchanted lute?

O that is the most curious matter of all, and plainly proves the truth of the whole story That lute remained for some time in the family, but was purloined and carried off, as was supposed, by the great singer Farinelli, in pure jealousy At his death it passed into other hands in Italy, who were ignorant of its mystic powers, and melting down the silver, transferred the strings to an old Cremona fiddle The strings still retain something of their magic virtues A word in the reader's ear, but let it go no further—that fiddle is now bewitching the whole world,—it is the fiddle of Paganini!

'Behold the threaten sails, winds, Draw the huge bottoms through the furrowed sea, Breasting the lofty surge'

SHAKESPEARE

It has been already explained to the reader, that there were threatening symptoms in the appearance of the weather to create serious forebodings of evil in the breast of a seaman When removed from the shadows of the cliffs, the night was not so dark but objects could be discerned at some little distance, and in the eastern horizon there was a streak of fearful light impending over the gloomy waters, in which the swelling outline formed by the rising waves was becoming each moment more distinct, and, consequently, more alarming Several dark clouds overhung the vessel, whose towering masts apparently propped the black vapor, while a few stars were seen twinkling, with a sickly flame, in the streak of clear sky that skirted the ocean. Still, light currents of air, occasionally, swept across the bay, bringing with them the fresh odor from the shore, but their flitting irregularity too surely foretold them to be the expiring breath of the land breeze. The roaring of the surf, as it rolled on the margin of the bay, produced a dull, monotonous sound, that was only interrupted, at times, by a hollow bellowing, as a larger wave than usual broke violently against some cavity in the rock. Everything, in short, united to render the scene gloomy and portentous, without creating instant terror, for the ship rose easily on the long billows, without even straightening the heavy cable that held her to her anchor.

The higher officers were collected around the capstan, engaged in earnest discourse about their situation and prospects, while some of the oldest and most favored seamen would extend their short walk to the hallowed precincts of the quarter-deck, to catch, with greedy ears, the opinions that fell from their superiors. Numberless were the uneasy glances that were thrown from both officers and men at their commander and the pilot, who still continued their secret communion in a distant part of the vessel. Once, an ungovernable curiosity, or the heedlessness of his years, led one of the youthful midshipmen near them, but a stern rebuke from his captain sent the boy, abashed and cowering, to hide his mortification among his fellows. This reprimand was received by the elder officers as an intimation that the consultation which they beheld was to be strictly inviolate, and, though it by no means suppressed the repeated expressions of their impatience, it effectually prevented an interruption to the communications, which all, however, thought were unreasonably protracted for the occasion.

'This is no time to be talking over bearings and distances,' observed the officer next in rank to Griffith, 'but we should call the hands up, and try to kedgie her off while the sea will suffer a boat to live.'

'Twould be a tedious and bootless job to attempt warping a ship for miles against a head-beating sea,' returned the first lieutenant, 'but the land breeze yet flutters aloft, and if our light sails would draw, with the aid of this ebb tide we might be able to shove her from the shore.'

'Hail the tops, Griffith,' said the other, 'and ask if they feel the air above, 'twill be a hint at least to set the old man and that lubberly pilot in motion.'

Griffith laughed as he complied with the request, and when he received the customary reply to his call, he demanded in a loud voice—

'Which way have you the wind, aloft?'

'We feel a light cat's-paw, now and then, from the land, sir,' returned the sturdy captain of the top, 'but our top-sail hangs in the clew-lines, sir, without winking.'

Captain Munson and his companion suspended their discourse while this question and answer were exchanged, and then resumed their dialogue as earnestly as if it had received no interruption.

'If it did wink, the hint would be lost on our betters,' said the officer of the marines, whose ignorance of seamanship added greatly to his perception of the danger, but who, from pure idleness, made more jokes than any other man in the ship. 'That pilot would not receive a delicate intimation through his ears, Mr Griffith, suppose you try him by the nose.'

'Faith, there was a flash of gunpowder between us in the barge,' returned the first-lieutenant, 'and he does not seem a man to stomach such hints as you advise. Although he looks so meek and quiet, I doubt whether he has paid much attention to the book of Job.'

'Why should he?' exclaimed the chaplain, whose apprehensions at least equalled those of the marine, and with a much more disheartening effect, 'I am sure it would have been a great waste of time there are so many charts of the coast, and books on the navigation of these seas, for him to study, that I sincerely hope he has been much better employed.'

A loud laugh was created at this speech among the listeners, and it apparently produced the effect that was so long anxiously desired, by putting an end to the mysterious conference between their captain and the pilot. As the former came forward towards his expecting crew, he said, in the composed, steady manner that formed the principal trait in his character —

'Get the anchor, Mr Griffith, and make sail on the ship, the hour has arrived when we must be moving'

The cheerful 'Ay, ay, sir!' of the young lieutenant was hardly uttered, before the cries of half a dozen midshipmen were heard summoning the boatswain and his mates to their duty

There was a general movement in the living masses that clustered around the mainmast, on the booms, and in the gangways, though their habits of discipline held the crew a moment longer in suspense. The silence was first broken by the sound of the boatswain's whistle, followed by the hoarse cry of 'All hands, up anchor, ahoy!'—the former rising on the night air from its first low mellow notes to a piercing shrillness that gradually died away on the waters, and the latter bellowing through every cranny of the ship, like the hollow murmurs of distant thunder

The change produced by the customary summons was magical. Human beings sprang out from between the guns, rushed up the hatches, threw themselves with careless activity from the booms, and gathered from every quarter so rapidly, that in an instant, the deck of the frigate was alive with men. The profound silence, that had hitherto been only interrupted by the low dialogue of the officers, was now changed for the stern orders of the lieutenants, mingled with the shriller cries of the midshipmen, and the hoarse bawling of the boatswain's crew, rising above the tumult of preparation and general bustle

The captain and the pilot alone remained passive, in this scene of general exertion; for apprehension had even stimulated that class of officers which is called 'idlers' to unusual activity, though frequently reminded by their more experienced messmates that, instead of aiding, they retarded the duty of the vessel. The bustle, however, gradually ceased, and in a few minutes, the same silence pervaded the ship as before.

'We are brought-to, sir,' said Griffith, who stood overlooking the scene, holding in one hand a short speaking-trumpet, and grasping with the other one of the shrouds of the ship, to steady himself in the position he had taken on a gun

'Heave round, sir,' was the calm reply

'Heave round!' repeated Griffith, aloud

'Heave round!' echoed a dozen eager voices at once, and the lively strains of a fife struck up a brisk air, to enliven the labor. The capstan was instantly set in motion, and the measured tread of the seamen was heard, as they stamped the deck in the circle of their march. For a few minutes no other sounds were heard, if we except the voice of an officer, occasionally cheering the sailors, when it was announced that they 'were short', or, in other words, that the ship was nearly over her anchor

'Heave and pull,' cried Griffith; when the quivering notes of the whistle were again succeeded by a general stillness in the vessel.

'What is to be done now, sir?' continued the lieutenant, 'shall we trip the anchor? There seems not a breath of air, and as the tide runs slack, I doubt whether the sea do not heave the ship ashore'

There was so much obvious truth in this conjecture, that all eyes turned from the light and animation afforded by the decks of the frigate, to look abroad on the waters, in a vain desire to pierce the darkness, as if to read the fate of their apparently devoted ship, from the aspect of nature

'I leave all to the pilot,' said the captain, after he had stood a short time by the side of Griffith, anxiously studying the heavens and the ocean 'What say you, Mr Gray?'

The man who was thus first addressed by name was leaning over the bulwarks, with his eyes bent in the same direction as the others, but as he answered he turned his face towards the speaker, and the light from the deck fell full upon his quiet features, which exhibited a calmness bordering on the supernatural, considering his station and responsibility

'There is much to fear from this heavy ground-swell,' he said, in the same unmoved tones as before, 'but there is certain destruction to us, if the gale that is brewing in the east finds us waiting its fury in this wild anchorage. All the hemp that ever was spun into cordage would not hold a ship an hour, chafing on these rocks, with a north-easter pouring its fury on her. If the powers of man can compass it, gentlemen, we must get an offing, and that speedily.'

'You say no more, sir, than the youngest boy in the ship can see for himself,' said Griffith, 'ha! here comes the schooner!'

The dashing of the long sweeps in the water was now plainly audible, and the little Ariel was seen through the gloom, moving heavily under their feeble impulse. As she passed slowly under the stern of the frigate, the cheerful voice of Barnstable was first heard, opening the communications between them.

'Here's a night for spectacles, Captain Munson!' he cried, 'but I thought I heard your fife, sir. I trust in God, you do not mean to ride it out here till morning.'

'I like the berth as little as yourself, Mr Barnstable,' returned the veteran seaman, in his calm manner, in which anxiety was, however, beginning to grow evident. 'We are short, but are afraid to let go our hold of the bottom, lest the sea cast us ashore. How make you out the wind?'

'Wind!' echoed the other, 'there is not enough to blow a lady's curl aside. If you wait, sir, till the land breeze fills your sails, you will wait another moon. I believe I've got my egg-shell out of that nest of gray-caps, but how it has been done in the dark, a better man than myself must explain.'

'Take your directions from the pilot, Mr Barnstable,' returned his commanding officer, 'and follow them strictly and to the letter.'

A deathlike silence, in both vessels, succeeded this order, for all seemed to listen eagerly to catch the words that fell from the man on whom, even the boys now felt, depended their only hopes for safety. A short time was suffered to elapse, before his voice was heard, in the same low but distinct tones as before—

'Your sweeps will soon be of no service to you,' he said, 'against the sea that begins to heave in, but your light sails will help them to get you out. So long as you can head east-and-by-north, you are doing well, and you can stand on till you open the light from that northern headland, when you can heave to, and fire a gun, but if, as I dread, you are struck aback before you open the light, you may trust to your lead on the larboard tack, but beware, with your head to the southward, for no lead will serve you there.'

'I can walk over the same ground on one tack as on the other,' said Barnstable, 'and make both legs of a length.'

'It will not do,' returned the pilot. 'If you fall off a point to starboard from east-and-by-north, in going large, you will find both rocks and points of shoals to bring you up, and beware, as I tell you, of the starboard tack.'

'And how shall I find my way? you will let me trust to neither time, lead, nor log.'

'You must trust to a quick eye and a ready hand. The breakers only will show you the dangers, when you are not able to make out the bearings of the land. Tack in season, sir, and don't spare the lead when you head to port.'

'Ay, ay,' returned Barnstable, in a low muttering voice. 'This is a sort of blind navigation with a vengeance, and all for no purpose that I can see—see! damme, eyesight is of about as much use now as a man's nose would be in reading the Bible.'

'Softly, softly, Mr Barnstable,' interrupted his commander,—for such was the anxious stillness in both vessels that even the rattling of the schooner's rigging was heard, as she rolled in the trough of the sea,—'the duty on which Congress has sent us must be performed, at the hazard of our lives.'

'I don't mind my life, Captain Munson,' said Barnstable, 'but there is a great want of conscience in trusting a vessel in such a place as this. However, it is a time to do, and not to talk. But if there be such danger to an easy draught of water, what will become of the frigate? had I not better play jackal, and try and feel the way for you?'

'I thank you,' said the pilot, 'the offer is generous, but would avail us nothing. I have the advantage of knowing the ground well, and must trust to my memory and God's good favor. Make sail, make sail, sir, and if you succeed, we will venture to break ground.'

The order was promptly obeyed, and in a very short time the Ariel was covered with canvas. Though no air was perceptible on the decks of the frigate, the little schooner was so light, that she succeeded in stemming her way over the rising waves, aided a little by the tide, and in a few minutes her low hull was just discernible in the streak of light along the horizon, with the dark outline of her sails rising above the sea, until their fanciful summits were lost in the shadows of the clouds.

Griffith had listened to the foregoing dialogue, like the rest of the junior officers, in profound silence, but when the Ariel began to grow indistinct to the eye, he jumped lightly from the gun to the deck, and cried—

'She slips off, like a vessel from the stocks! shall I trip the anchor, sir, and follow?'

'We have no choice,' replied his captain. 'You hear the question, Mr. Gray? shall we let go the bottom?'

'It must be done, Captain Munson, we may want more drift than the rest of this tide to get us to a place of safety,' said the pilot, 'I would give five years from a life that I know will be short, if the ship lay one mile further seaward.'

This remark was unheard by all, except the commander of the frigate, who again walked aside with the pilot, where they resumed their mysterious communications. The words of assent were no sooner uttered, however, than Griffith gave forth from his trumpet the command to 'Heave away!' Again the strains of the fife were followed by the tread of the men at the capstan. At the same time that the anchor was heaving up, the sails were loosened from the yards, and opened to invite the breeze. In effecting this duty, orders were thundered through the trumpet of the first lieutenant, and executed with the rapidity of thought. Men were to be seen, like spots in the dim light from the heavens, lying on every yard, or hanging as in air, while strange cries were heard issuing from every part of the rigging, and each spar of the vessel. 'Ready the fore-royal,' cried a shrill voice, as if from the clouds, 'Ready the fore-yard,' uttered the hoarser tones of a seaman beneath him, 'All ready aft, sir,' cried a third, from another quarter, and in a few moments the order was given to 'let fall.'

The little light which fell from the sky was now excluded by the falling canvas, and a deeper gloom was cast athwart the decks of the ship, that served to render the brilliancy of the lanterns even vivid, while it gave to objects outboard a more appalling and dreary appearance than before.

Every individual, excepting the commander and his associate, was now earnestly engaged in getting the ship under way. The sounds of 'We're away,' were repeated by a burst from fifty voices, and the rapid evolutions of the capstan announced that nothing but the weight of the anchor was to be lifted. The hauling of cordage, the rattling of blocks, blended with the shrill calls of the boatswain and his mates, succeeded, and though to a landsman all would have appeared confusion and hurry, long practice and strict discipline enabled the crew to exhibit their ship under a cloud of canvas, from her deck to the trucks, in less time than we have consumed in relating it.

For a few minutes, the officers were not disappointed by the result, for though the heavy sails flapped lazily against the masts, the light duck on the loftier spars swelled outwardly, and the ship began sensibly to yield to their influence.

'She travels! she travels!' exclaimed Griffith, joyously, 'ah, the hussy! she has as much antipathy to the land as any fish that swims, it blows a little gale aloft yet!'

'We feel its dying breath,' said the pilot, in low, soothing tones, but in a manner so sudden as to startle Griffith, at whose elbow they were unexpectedly uttered. 'Let us forget, young man, everything but the number of lives that depend, this night, on your exertions and my knowledge.'

'If you be but half as able to exhibit the one, as I am willing to make the other, we shall do well,' returned the lieutenant, in the same tone. 'Remember, whatever may be your feelings, that we are on an enemy's coast, and love it not enough to wish to lay our bones there.'

With this brief explanation they separated, the vessel requiring the constant and close attention of the officer to her movements.

The exultation produced in the crew by the progress of their ship through the water was of short duration, for the breeze that had seemed to await their motions, after forcing the vessel for a quarter of a mile, fluttered for a few minutes amid their light canvas, and then left them entirely. The quartermaster, whose duty it was to superintend the helm, soon announced that he was losing the command of the vessel, as she was no longer obedient to her rudder. Thus ungrateful intelligence was promptly communicated to his commander by Griffith, who suggested the propriety of again dropping an anchor.

'I refer you to Mr Gray,' returned the captain, 'he is the pilot, sir, and with him rests the safety of the vessel'

'Pilots sometimes lose ships as well as save them,' said Griffith. 'know you the man well, Captain Munson, who holds all our lives in his keeping, and so coolly as if he cared but little for the venture?'

'Mr Griffith, I do know him, he is, in my opinion, both competent and faithful 10 Thus much I tell you, to relieve your anxiety, more you must not ask,—but is there not a shift of wind?'

'God forbid!' exclaimed his lieutenant, 'if that north-easter catches us within the shoals, our case will be desperate indeed!'

The heavy rolling of the vessel caused an occasional expansion, and as sudden a reaction, in their sails, which left the oldest seaman in the ship in doubt which way the 20 currents of air were passing, or whether there existed any that were not created by the flapping of their own canvas. The head of the ship, however, began to fall off from the sea, and notwithstanding the darkness, it soon became apparent that she was driving in, bodily, towards the shore.

During these few minutes of gloomy doubt, Griffith, by one of those sudden revulsions of the mind, that connect the opposite extremes of feeling, lost his animated anxiety, and relapsed into the listless apathy that so often came over him, even in the most critical moments of trial and danger. He was standing with one elbow resting on his capstan, shading his eyes from the light of the battle-lantern that stood near him with one hand, when he felt a gentle pressure of the other, that recalled his recollection. Looking affectionately, 40 though still recklessly, at the boy who stood at his side, he said—

'Dull music, Mr Merry'

'So dull, sir, that I can't dance to it,' returned the midshipman. 'Nor do I believe there is a man in the ship who would not rather hear "The girl I left behind me," than those execrable sounds'

'What sounds, boy?' The ship is as quiet as the Quaker meeting in the Jerseys, before your good old grandfather used to break the charm of silence with his sonorous voice'

'Ah! laugh at my peaceable blood, if thou wilt, Mr Griffith,' said the arch youngster,

'but remember, there is a mixture of it in all sorts of veins. I wish I could hear one of the old gentleman's chants now, sir, I could always sleep to them, like a gull in the surf. But he that sleeps to-night, with that lullaby, will make a nap of it'

'Sounds! I hear no sounds, boy, but the flapping aloft, even that pilot, who struts the quarter-deck like an admiral, has nothing to say'

'Is not that a sound to open a seaman's ear?'

'It is in truth a heavy roll of the surf, lad, but the night air carries it heavily to our ears. Know you not the sounds of the surf yet, younker?'

'I know it too well, Mr Griffith, and do not wish to know it better. How fast are we tumbling in towards that surf, sir?'

'I think we hold our own,' said Griffith, rousing again, 'though we had better anchor. Luff, fellow, luff, you are broadside to the sea!'

The man at the wheel repeated his former intelligence, adding a suggestion, that he thought the ship 'was gathering sternway'

'Haul up your courses, Mr Griffith,' said Captain Munson, 'and let us feel the wind'

The rattling of the blocks was soon heard, and the enormous sheets of canvas that hung from the lower yards were instantly suspended 'in the brails'. When this change was effected, all on board stood silent and breathless, as if expecting to learn their fate by the result. Several contradictory opinions were, at length, hazarded among the officers, when Griffith seized the candle from the lantern, and springing on 40 one of the guns, held it on high, exposed to the action of the air. The little flame waved, with uncertain glimmering, for a moment, and then burned steadily, in a line with the masts. Griffith was about to lower his extended arm, when, feeling a slight sensation of coolness on his hand, he paused, and the light turned slowly towards the land, flared, flickered, and finally deserted the wick.

'Lose not a moment, Mr Griffith,' cried the pilot, aloud, 'clew up and furl everything but your three top-sails, and let them be double-reefed. Now is the time to fulfill your promise'

The young man paused one moment in astonishment, as the clear, distinct tones of the stranger struck his ears so unexpectedly, but turning his eyes to seaward, he sprang on the deck, and proceeded to obey the order, as if life and death depended on his despatch

'She rights! she rights, boys! wear off shore!'

SONG.

THE extraordinary activity of Griffith, which communicated itself with promptitude to the crew, was produced by a sudden alteration in the weather. In place of the well-defined streak along the horizon, that has been already described, an immense body of misty light appeared to be moving in, with rapidity, from the ocean, while a distinct but distant roaring announced the sure approach of the tempest that had so long troubled the waters. Even Griffith, while thundering his orders through the trumpet, and urging the men, by his cries, to expedition, would pause, for instants, to cast anxious glances in the direction of the coming storm, and the faces of the sailors who lay on the yards were turned, instinctively, towards the same quarter of the heavens, while they knotted the reef-points, or passed the gaskets, that were to confine the unruly canvas to the prescribed limits.

The pilot alone, in that confused and busy throng, where voice rose above voice, and cry echoed cry, in quick succession, appeared as if he held no interest in the important stake. With his eyes steadily fixed on the approaching mist, and his arms folded together in composure, he stood calmly waiting the result.

The ship had fallen off, with her broadside to the sea, and was become unmanageable, and the sails were already brought into the folds necessary to her security, when the quick and heavy fluttering of canvas was thrown across the water, with all the gloomy and chilling sensations that such sounds produce, where darkness and danger unite to appal the seaman.

'The schooner has it!' cried Griffith, 'Barnstable has held on, like himself, to the last moment. God send that the squall leave him cloth enough to keep him from the shore!'

'His sails are easily handled,' the commander observed, 'and she must be over the principal danger. We are falling off before it, Mr Gray, shall we try a cast of the lead?'

The pilot turned from his contemplative posture, and moved slowly across the deck before he returned any reply to this question—like a man who not only felt that everything depended on himself, but that he was equal to the emergency.

'Tis unnecessary,' he at length said, 'twould be certain destruction to be taken aback, and it is difficult to say, within several points, how the wind may strike us.'

'Tis difficult no longer,' cried Griffith, 'for here it comes, and in right earnest!'

The rushing sounds of the wind were now, indeed, heard at hand, and the words were hardly past the lips of the young lieutenant, before the vessel bowed down heavily to one side, and then, as she began to move through the water, rose again majestically to her upright position, as if saluting, like a courteous champion, the powerful antagonist with which she was about to contend. Not another minute elapsed, before the ship was throwing the waters aside, with a lively progress, and, obedient to her helm, was brought as near to the desired course as the direction of the wind would allow. The hurry and bustle on the yards gradually subsided, and the men slowly descended to the deck, all straining their eyes to pierce the gloom in which they were enveloped, and some shaking their heads, in melancholy doubt, afraid to express the apprehensions they really entertained. All on board anxiously waited for the fury of the gale, for there were none so ignorant or inexperienced in that gallant frigate, as not to know that as yet they only felt the infant effects of the wind. Each moment, however, it increased in power, though so gradual was the alteration, that the relieved mariners began to believe that all their gloomy forebodings were not to be realized. During this short interval of uncertainty, no other sounds were heard than the whistling of the breeze, as it passed quickly through the mass of rigging that belonged to the vessel, and the dashing of the spray that began to fly from her bows, like the foam of a cataract.

'It blows fresh,' cried Griffith, who was the first to speak in that moment of doubt and anxiety, 'but it is no more than a cap-full of wind after all. Give us elbow-room, and the right canvas, Mr. Pilot, and I'll handle the ship like a gentleman's yacht, in this breeze.'

'Will she stay, think ye, under this sail?' said the low voice of the stranger.

'She will do all that man, in reason, can ask of wood and iron,' returned the lieutenant, 'but the vessel don't float the ocean that will tack under double-reefed top-sails alone, against a heavy sea. Help her with the courses, pilot, and you shall see her come round like a dancing-master.'

'Let us feel the strength of the gale first,' returned the man who was called Mr. Gray, moving from the side of Griffith to the weather gangway of the vessel, where he stood in silence, looking ahead of the ship, with an air of singular coolness and abstraction.

All the lanterns had been extinguished on the deck of the frigate, when her anchor was secured, and as the first must of the gale had passed over, it was succeeded by a faint light that was a good deal aided by the glittering foam of the waters, which now broke in white curls around the vessel in every direction. The land could be faintly discerned, rising like a heavy bank of black fog, above the margin of the waters, and was only distinguishable from the heavens by its deeper gloom and obscurity. The last rope was coiled, and deposited in its proper place, by the seamen, and for several minutes the stillness of death pervaded the crowded decks. It was evident to every one, that their ship was dashing at a prodigious rate through the waves, and as she was approaching, with such velocity, the quarter of the bay where the shoals and dangers were known to be situated, nothing but the habits of the most exact discipline could suppress the uneasiness of the officers and men within their own bosoms. At length the voice of Captain Munson was heard, calling to the pilot.

'Shall I send a hand into the chains, Mr. Gray,' he said, 'and try our water?'

Although this question was asked aloud, and the interest it excited drew many of the officers and men around him, in eager impatience for his answer, it was unheeded by the man to whom it was addressed. His head rested on his hand, as he leaned over the hammock-cloths of the vessel, and his whole air was that of one whose thoughts wandered from the pressing necessity of their situation. Griffith was among those who had approached the pilot, and after waiting a moment, from respect, to hear the answer to his commander's question, he presumed on his own rank, and leaving the circle that stood at a little distance, stepped to the side of the mysterious guardian of their lives.

'Captain Munson desires to know whether you wish a cast of the lead?' said the young officer, with a little impatience of manner. No immediate answer was made to this repetition of the question, and Griffith laid his hand unceremoniously on the shoulder of the other, with an intent to rouse him before he made another application for a reply, but the convulsive start of the pilot held him silent in amazement.

'Fall back there,' said the lieutenant, sternly, to the men, who were closing around them in a compact circle, 'away with you to your stations, and see all clear for stays.' The dense mass of heads dissolved, at this order, like the water of one of the waves commingling with the ocean, and the lieutenant and his companions were left by themselves.

'This is not a time for musing, Mr. Gray,' continued Griffith, 'remember our compact, and look to your charge—is it not time to put the vessel in stays? of what are you dreaming?'

The pilot laid his hand on the extended arm of the lieutenant, and grasped it with a convulsive pressure, as he answered,— ''Tis a dream of reality. You are young, Mr. Griffith, nor am I past the noon of life, but should you live fifty years longer, you never can see and experience what I have encountered in my little period of three-and-thirty years!'

A good deal astonished at this burst of feeling, so singular at such a moment, the young sailor was at a loss for a reply, but as his duty was uppermost in his thoughts, he still dwelt on the theme that most interested him.

'I hope much of your experience has been on this coast, for the ship travels lively,' he said, 'and the daylight showed us so much to dread, that we do not feel over-valiant in the dark. How much longer shall we stand on, upon this tack?"

The pilot turned slowly from the side of the vessel, and walked towards the commander of the frigate, as he replied, in a tone that seemed deeply agitated by his melancholy reflections,—

"You have your wish, then, much, very much of my early life was passed on this dreaded coast. What to you is all darkness and gloom, to me is as light as if a noon-day sun shone upon it. But tack your ship, sir, tack your ship, I would see how she works before we reach the point where she must behave well, or we perish."

Griffith gazed after him in wonder, while the pilot slowly paced the quarter-deck, and then, rousing from his trance, gave forth the cheering order that called each man to his station, to perform the desired evolution. The confident assurances which the young officer had given to the pilot respecting the qualities of his vessel, and his own ability to manage her, were fully realized by the result. The helm was no sooner put a-lee, than the huge ship bore up gallantly against the wind, and, dashing directly through the waves, threw the foam high into the air, as she looked boldly into the very eye of the wind, and then, yielding gracefully to its power, she fell off on the other tack, with her head pointed from those dangerous shoals that she had so recently approached with such terrifying velocity. The heavy yards swung round, as if they had been vanes to indicate the currents of the air, and in a few moments the frigate again moved, with stately progress, through the water, leaving the rocks and shoals behind her on one side of the bay, but advancing towards those that offered equal danger on the other.

During this time the sea was becoming more agitated, and the violence of the wind was gradually increasing. The latter no longer whistled amid the cordage of the vessel, but it seemed to howl, surfly, as it passed the complicated machinery that the frigate obtruded on its path. An endless succession of white surges rose above the heavy billows, and the very air was glittering with the light that was disengaged from the ocean. The ship yielded, each moment, more and more before the storm, and in less than half an hour from the time that she had lifted her anchor, she was driven along with tremendous fury by the full power of a gale of wind. Still the hardy and experienced mariners who directed her movements, held her to the course that was necessary to their preservation, and still Griffith gave forth, when directed by their unknown pilot, those orders that turned her in the narrow channel where alone safety was to be found.

So far, the performance of his duty appeared easy to the stranger, and he gave the required directions in those still, calm tones, that formed so remarkable a contrast to the responsibility of his situation. But when the land was becoming dim, in distance as well as darkness, and the agitated sea alone was to be discovered as it swept by them in foam, he broke in upon the monotonous roaring of the tempest with the sounds of his voice, seeming to shake off his apathy, and rouse himself to the occasion.

"Now is the time to watch her closely, Mr. Griffith," he cried, "here we get the true tide and the real danger. Place the best quartermaster of your ship in those chains, and let an officer stand by him, and see that he gives us the right water."

"I will take that office on myself," said the captain, "pass a light into the weather main-chains."

"Stand by your braces!" exclaimed the pilot, with startling quickness. "Heave away that lead!"

These preparations taught the crew to expect the crisis, and every officer and man stood in fearful silence, at his assigned station, awaiting the issue of the trial. Even the quartermaster at the gun gave out his orders to the men at the wheel, in deeper and hoarser tones than usual, as if anxious not to disturb the quiet and order of the vessel.

While this deep expectation pervaded the frigate, the piercing cry of the leadsmen, as he called "by the mark seven," rose above the tempest, crossed over the decks, and appeared to pass away to leeward, borne on the blast like the warnings of some water spirit.

"'Tis well," returned the pilot, calmly, "try it again."

The short pause was succeeded by another cry, "And a half-five!"

'She shoals! she shoals!' exclaimed Griffith, 'keep her a good full'

'Ay! you must hold the vessel in command, now,' said the pilot, with those cool tones that are most appalling in critical moments, because they seem to denote most preparation and care

The third call 'by the deep four!' was followed by a prompt direction from the stranger to tack

Griffith seemed to emulate the coolness of the pilot, in issuing the necessary orders to execute this manoeuvre

The vessel rose slowly from the inclined position into which she had been forced by the tempest, and the sails were shaking violently, as if to release themselves from their confinement, while the ship stemmed the billows, when the well-known voice of the sailing-master was heard shouting from the fore-castle,—

'Breakers! breakers, dead ahead!'

This appalling sound seemed yet to be lingering about the ship, when a second voice cried,—

'Breakers on our lee-bow!'

'We are in a bight of the shoals, Mr Gray,' cried the commander 'She loses her way, perhaps an anchor might hold her'

'Clear away that best bower!' shouted Griffith through his trumpet

'Hold on!' cried the pilot, in a voice that reached the very hearts of all who heard him, 'hold on everything'

The young man turned fiercely to the daring stranger who thus defied the discipline of his vessel, and at once demanded,—

'Who is it that dares to countermand my orders? is it not enough that you run the ship into danger, but you must interfere to keep her there? If another word—'

'Peace, Mr Griffith,' interrupted the captain, bending from the rigging, his gray locks blowing about in the wind, and adding a look of wildness to the haggard care that he exhibited by the light of his lantern; 'yield the trumpet to Mr. Gray, he alone can save us'

Griffith threw his speaking-trumpet on the deck, and as he walked proudly away, muttered in bitterness of feeling,—

'Then all is lost, indeed! and among the rest, the foolish hopes with which I visited 'his coast'

There was, however, no time for reply, the ship had been rapidly running into the wind, and as the efforts of the crew were paralyzed by the contradictory orders they had heard, she gradually lost her way, and in a few seconds all her sails were taken aback

Before the crew understood their situation the pilot had applied the trumpet to his mouth, and in a voice that rose above the tempest, he thundered forth his orders. Each command was given distinctly, and with a precision that showed him to be master of his profession. The helm was kept fast, the head-yards swung up heavily against the wind, and the vessel was soon whirling round on her heel, with a retrograde movement

Griffith was too much of a seaman not to perceive that the pilot had seized, with a perception almost intuitive, the only method that promised to extricate the vessel from her situation. He was young, impetuous, and proud—but he was also generous. Forgetting his resentment and his mortification, he rushed forward among the men, and, by his presence and example, added certainty to the experiment. The ship fell off slowly before the gale, and bowed her yards nearly to the water, as she felt the blast pouring its fury on her broadside, while the surly waves beat violently against her stern, as if in reproach at departing from her usual manner of moving

The voice of the pilot, however, was still heard, steady and calm, and yet so clear and high as to reach every ear, and the obedient seamen whirled the yards at his bidding, in despite of the tempest, as if they handled the toys of their childhood. When the ship had fallen off dead before the wind, her head-sails were shaken, her after-yards trimmed, and her helm shifted, before she had time to run upon the danger that had threatened, as well to leeward as to windward. The beautiful fabric, obedient to her government, threw her bows up gracefully towards the wind again, and, as her sails were trimmed, moved out from amongst the dangerous shoals, in which she had been embayed, as steadily and swiftly as she had approached them

A moment of breathless astonishment succeeded the accomplishment of this nice manoeuvre, but there was no time for the usual expressions of surprise. The stranger still held the trumpet, and continued to lift his voice amid the howlings of the blast, whenever prudence or skill required any change in the management of the ship. For an hour longer there was a fearful struggle for their preservation, the channel becoming at each step more complicated, and the shoals thickening around the mariners on every side. The lead was cast rapidly, and the quick eye of the pilot seemed to pierce the darkness with a keenness of vision that exceeded human power. It was apparent to all in the vessel that they were under the guidance of one who understood the navigation thoroughly, and their exertions kept pace with their reviving confidence. Again and again the frigate appeared to be rushing blindly on shoals where the sea was covered with foam, and where destruction would have been as sudden as it was certain, when the clear voice of the stranger was heard warning them of the danger, and inciting them to their duty. The vessel was implicitly yielded to his government, and during those anxious moments when she was dashing the waters aside, throwing the spray over her enormous yards, each ear would listen eagerly for those sounds that had obtained a command over the crew, that can only be acquired, under such circumstances, by great steadiness and consummate skill. The ship was recovering from the inaction of changing her course, in one of those critical tacks that she had made so often, when the pilot, for the first time, addressed the commander of the frigate, who still continued to superintend the all-important duty of the leadsman.

'Now is the pinch,' he said, 'and if the ship behaves well, we are safe, but if otherwise, all we have yet done will be useless.'

The veteran seaman whom he addressed, left the chains at this portentous notice, and calling to his first lieutenant, required of the stranger an explanation of his warning.

'See you yon light on the southern headland?' returned the pilot, 'you may know it from the star near it—by its sinking, at times, in the ocean. Now observe the hummock—a little north of it, looking like a shadow in the horizon—'tis a hill far inland. If we keep that light open from the hill, we shall do well—but if not, we surely go to pieces.'

'Let us tack again!' exclaimed the lieutenant.

The pilot shook his head as he replied,—

'There is no more tacking or box-hauling to be done to-night. We have barely room to pass out of the shoals on this course, and if we can weather the "Devil's Grip," we clear their outermost point—but if not, as I said before, there is but an alternative.'

10 'If we had beaten out the way we entered,' exclaimed Griffith, 'we should have done well.'

'Say, also, if the tide would have let us do so,' returned the pilot, calmly. 'Gentlemen, we must be prompt, we have but a mile to go, and the ship appears to fly. That top-sail is not enough to keep her up to the wind, we want both jib and mainsail.'

20 'Tis a perilous thing to loosen canvas in such a tempest!' observed the doubtful captain.

'It must be done,' returned the collected stranger, 'we perish without it—see! the light already touches the edge of the hummock, the sea casts us to leeward!'

'It shall be done!' cried Griffith, seizing the trumpet from the hand of the pilot.

The orders of the lieutenant were executed almost as soon as issued, and, everything being ready, the enormous folds of the mainsail were trusted loose to the blast. There was an instant when the result was doubtful, the tremendous threshing of the heavy sail seemed to bid defiance to all restraint, shaking the ship to her centre, but art and strength prevailed, and gradually the canvas was distended, and belling as it filled, was drawn down to its usual place by the power of a hundred men. The vessel yielded to this immense addition of force, and bowed before it like a reed bending to a breeze. But the success of the measure was announced by a joyful cry from the stranger, that seemed to burst from his inmost soul.

'She feels it! she springs her luff! observe,' he said, 'the light opens from the hummock already if she will only bear her canvas, we shall go clear!'

50 A report, like that of a cannon, interrupted his exclamation, and something resembling a white cloud was seen drifting before the wind from the head of the ship, till it was driven into the gloom far to leeward.

'Tis the jub, blown from the bolt-ropes,' said the commander of the frigate 'This is no time to spread light duck—but the mainsail may stand it yet.'

'The sail would laugh at a tornado,' returned the lieutenant, 'but the mast springs like a piece of steel.'

'Silence all!' cried the pilot. 'Now, gentlemen, we shall soon know our fate. Let her luff—luff you can!'

This warning effectually closed all discourse, and the hardy mariners, knowing that they had already done all in the power of man to insure their safety, stood in breathless anxiety, awaiting the result. At a short distance ahead of them the whole ocean was white with foam, and the waves, instead of rolling on in regular succession, appeared to be tossing about in mad gambols. A single streak of dark billows, not half a cable's length in width, could be discerned running into this chaos of water, but it was soon lost to the eye amid the confusion of the disturbed element. Along this narrow path the vessel moved more heavily than before, being brought so near the wind as to keep her sails touching. The pilot silently proceeded to the wheel, and, with his own hands, he undertook the steering of the ship. No noise proceeded from the frigate to interrupt the horrid tumult of the ocean, and she entered the channel among the breakers, with the silence of a desperate calmness. Twenty times, as the foam rolled away to leeward, the crew were on the eve of uttering their joy, as they supposed the vessel past the danger, but breaker after breaker would still heave up before them, following each other into the general mass, to check their exultation. Occasionally, the fluttering of the sails would be heard, and when the looks of the startled seamen were turned to the wheel, they beheld the stranger grasping its spokes, with his quick eye glancing from the water to the canvas. At length the ship reached a point, where she appeared to be rushing directly into the jaws of destruction, when, suddenly her course was changed, and her head receded rapidly from the wind. At the same instant the voice of the pilot was heard shouting,— 'Square away the yards!—in mainsail!'

A general burst from the crew echoed, 'square away the yards!' and, quick as thought, the frigate was seen gliding along the channel before the wind. The eye had hardly time to dwell on the foam, which seemed like clouds driving in the heavens, and directly the gallant vessel issued from her perils, and rose and fell on the heavy waves of the sea.

The seamen were yet drawing long breaths, and gazing about them like men recovered from a trance, when Griffith approached the man who had so successfully conducted them through their perils. The lieutenant grasped the hand of the other, as he said,—

'You have this night proved yourself a faithful pilot, and such a seaman as the world cannot equal.'

The pressure of the hand was warmly returned by the unknown mariner, who replied,—

'I am no stranger to the seas, and I may yet find my grave in them. But you, too, have deceived me, you have acted nobly, young man, and Congress—'

'What of Congress?' asked Griffith, observing him to pause.

'Why, Congress is fortunate if it has many such ships as this,' said the stranger, coldly, walking away toward the commander.

Griffith gazed after him a moment in surprise, but, as his duty required his attention, other thoughts soon engaged his mind.

The vessel was pronounced to be in safety. The gale was heavy and increasing, but there was a clear sea before them, and, as she slowly stretched out into the bosom of the ocean, preparations were made for her security during its continuance. Before midnight, everything was in order.

A gun from the Ariel soon announced the safety of the schooner also, which had gone out by another and an easier channel, that the frigate had not dared to attempt, when the commander directed the usual watch to be set, and the remainder of the crew to seek their necessary repose.

The captain withdrew with the mysterious pilot to his own cabin. Griffith gave his last order, and renewing his charge to the officer instructed with the care of the vessel, he wished him a pleasant watch, and sought the refreshment of his own cot. For an hour the young lieutenant lay musing on the events of the day The remark of Barnstable would occur to him, in connection with the singular comment of the boy, and then his thoughts would recur to the pilot, who, taken from the hostile shores of Britain, and with her accent on his tongue, had served them so faithfully and so well He remembered the anxiety of Captain Munson to procure this stranger, at the very hazard from which they had just been relieved, and puzzled himself with conjecturing why a pilot was to be sought at such a risk His more private feelings would then resume their sway, and the recollection of America, his mistress, and his home, mingled with the confused images of the drowsy youth. The dashing of the billows against the side of the ship, the creaking of guns and bulk-heads, with the roaring of the tempest, however, became gradually less and less distinct, until nature yielded to necessity, and the young man forgot even the romantic images of his love, in the deep sleep of a seaman

PREFACE TO THE LEATHER-STOCKING TALES

THIS series of Stories, which has obtained the name of The Leather-Stocking Tales, has been written in a very desultory and artificial manner The order in which the several books appeared was essentially different from that in which they would have been presented to the world, had the regular course of their incidents been consulted In The Pioneers, the first of the series written, the Leather-Stocking is represented as already old, and driven from his early haunts in the forest, by the sound of the axe, and the smoke of the settler The Last of the Mohicans, the next book in the order of publication, carried the readers back to a much earlier period in the history of our hero, representing him as middle-aged, and in the fullest vigor of manhood In The Prairie, his career terminates, and he is laid in his grave There, it was originally the intention to leave him, in the expectation that, as in the case of the human mass, he would soon be forgotten But a latent regard for this character induced the author to resuscitate him in The Pathfinder, a book that was not long after succeeded by The Deerslayer, thus completing the series as it now exists

While the five books that have been written were originally published in the order just mentioned, that of the incidents, inasmuch as they are connected with the career of their principal character, is, as has been stated, very different. Taking the life of the Leather-Stocking as a guide, The Deerslayer should have been the opening book, for in that work he is seen just emerging into manhood, to be succeeded by The Last of the Mohicans, The Pathfinder, The Pioneers, and The Prairie This arrangement embraces the order of events, though far from being that in which the books at first appeared The Pioneers was published in 1822, The Deerslayer in 1841, making the interval between them nineteen years Whether these progressive years have had a tendency to lessen the value of the last-named book by lessening the native fire of its author, or of adding somewhat in the way of improved taste and a more matured judgment, is for others to decide

If anything from the pen of the writer of these romances is at all to outlive himself, it is, unquestionably, the series of The Leather-Stocking Tales. To say this, is not to predict a very lasting reputation for the series itself, but simply to express the belief it will outlast any, or all, of the works from the same hand

It is undeniable that the desultory manner in which The Leather-Stocking Tales were written, has, in a measure, impaired their harmony, and otherwise lessened their interest This is proved by the fate of the two books last published, though probably the two most worthy an enlightened and cultivated reader's notice If the facts could be ascertained, it is probable the result would show that of all those (in America, in particular) who have read the three first books of the series, not one in ten has a knowledge of the existence even of the two last Several causes have tended to produce this result. The long interval of time between the appearance of The Prairie and that of The Pathfinder, was itself a reason why the later books of the series should be overlooked There was no longer novelty to attract attention, and the interest was materially impaired by the manner in which events were necessarily anticipated, in laying the last of the series first before the world. With the generation that is now coming on the stage this fault will be partially removed by the edition contained in the present work, in which the several tales will be arranged solely in reference to their connexion with each other.

The author has often been asked if he had any original in his mind, for the character of Leather-Stocking. In a physical sense, different individuals known to the writer in early life, certainly presented themselves as models, through his recollections, but in a moral sense this man of the forest is purely a creation. The idea of delineating a character that possessed little of civilization but its highest principles as they are exhibited in the uneducated, and all of savage life that is not incompatible with these great rules of conduct, is perhaps natural to the situation in which Natty was placed. He is too proud of his origin to sink into the condition of the wild Indian, and too much a man of the woods not to imitate as much as was at all desirable, from his friends and companions. In a moral point of view it was the intention to illustrate the effect of seed scattered by the way side. To use his own language, his 'gifts' were 'white gifts,' and he was not disposed to bring on them discredit. On the other hand, removed from nearly all the temptations of civilized life, placed in the best associations of that which is deemed savage, and favorably disposed by nature to improve such advantages, it appeared to the writer that his hero was a fit subject to represent the better qualities of both conditions, without pushing either to extremes.

There was no violent stretch of the imagination, perhaps, in supposing one of civilized associations in childhood, retaining many of his earliest lessons amid the scenes of the forest. Had these early impressions, however, not been sustained by continued, though casual connexion with men of his own color, if not of his own caste, all our information goes to show he would soon have lost every trace of his origin. It is believed that sufficient attention was paid to the particular circumstances in which this individual was placed to justify the picture of his qualities that has been drawn. The Delawares early attracted the attention of missionaries, and were a tribe unusually influenced by their precepts and example. In many instances they became Christians, and cases occurred in which their subsequent lives gave proof of the efficacy of the great moral changes that had taken place within them.

A leading character in a work of fiction has a fair right to the aid which can be obtained from a poetical view of the subject. It is in this view, rather than in one more strictly circumstantial, that Leather-Stocking has been drawn. The imagination has no great task in portraying to itself a being removed from the every-day inducements to err, which abound in civilized life, while he retains the best and simplest of his early impressions, who sees God in the forest, hears him in the winds, bows to him in the firmament that o'ercanopies all, submits to his sway in a humble belief of his justice and mercy, in a word, a being who finds the impress of the Deity in all the works of nature, without any of the blots produced by the expedients, and passion, and mistakes of man. This is the most that has been attempted in the character of Leather-Stocking. Had this been done without any of the drawbacks of humanity, the picture would have been, in all probability, more pleasing than just. In order to preserve the vraisemblable, therefore, traits derived from the prejudices, tastes, and even the weaknesses of his youth, have been mixed up with these higher qualities and longings, in a way, it is hoped, to represent a reasonable picture of human nature, without offering to the spectator a 'monster of goodness.'

It has been objected to these books that they give a more favorable picture of the red man than he deserves. The writer apprehends that much of this objection arises from the habits of those who have made it. One of his critics, on the appearance of the first work in which Indian character was portrayed, objected that its 'characters were Indians of the school of Heckewelder, rather than of the school of nature.' These words quite probably contain the substance of the true answer to the objection. Heckewelder was an ardent, benevolent missionary, bent on the good of the red man, and seeing in him one who had the soul, reason, and characteristics of a fellow-being. The critic is understood to have been a very distin-gushed agent of the government, one very familiar with Indians, as they are seen at the councils to treat for the sale of their lands, where little or none of their domestic qualities come in play, and where, indeed, their evil passions are known to have the fullest scope. As just would it be to draw conclusions of the general state of American society from the scenes of the capital, as to suppose that the negotiating of one of these treaties is a fair picture of Indian life

It is the privilege of all writers of fiction, more particularly when their works aspire to the elevation of romances, to present the beau-ideal of their characters to the reader. Thus it is which constitutes poetry, and to suppose that the red man is to be represented only in the squalid misery or in the degraded moral state that certainly more or less belongs to his condition, is, we apprehend, taking a very narrow view of an author's privileges. Such criticism would have deprived the world of even Homer

FROM THE DEERSLAYER

I

*'Thou hast been busy, Death, this day, and yet But half thy work is done! The gates of hell Are thronged, yet twice ten thousand spirits more, Who, from their warm and healthful tenements,
Fear no divorce, must, ere the sun go down, Enter the world of woe!'*—

SOUTHEY

ONE experienced in the signs of the heavens, would have seen that the sun wanted but two or three minutes of the zenith, when Deerslayer landed on the point where the Hurons were now encamped, nearly abreast of the castle. This spot was similar to the one already described, with the exception that the surface of the land was less broken and less crowded with trees. Owing to these two circumstances it was all the better suited to the purpose for which it had been selected, the space beneath the branches bearing some resemblance to a densely wooded lawn. Favored by its position and its spring, it had been much resorted to by savages and hunters, and the natural grasses had succeeded their fires, leaving an appearance of sward in places, a very unusual accompaniment of the virgin forest. Nor was the margin of water fringed with bushes, as on so much of its shore, but the eye penetrated the woods immediately on reaching the strand, commanding nearly the whole area of the projection

If it was a point of honor with the Indian warrior to redeem his word, when pledged to return and meet his death at a given hour, so was it a point of characteristic pride to show no womanish impatience, but to re-appear as nearly as possible at the appointed moment. It was well not to exceed the grace accorded by the generosity of the enemy, but it was better to meet it to a minute. Something of this dramatic effect mingles with most of the graver usages of the American aborigines, and no doubt, like the prevalence of a similar feeling among people more sophisticated and refined, may be referred to a principle of nature. We all love the wonderful, and when it comes attended by chivalrous self-devotion and a rigid regard to honor, it presents itself to our admiration in a shape doubly attractive. As respects Deerslayer, though he took a pride in showing his white blood, by often deviating from the usages of the red-men, he frequently dropped into their customs, and oftener into their feelings, unconsciously to himself, in consequence of having no other arbiters to appeal to than their judgments and tastes. On the present occasion, he would have abstained from betraying a feverish haste by a too speedy return, since it would have contained a tacit admission that the time asked for was more than had been wanted, but, on the other hand, had the idea occurred to him, he would have quickened his movements a little, in order to avoid the dramatic appearance of returning at the precise instant set as the utmost limit of his absence. Still, accident had interfered to defeat the last intention, for when the young man put his foot on the point, and advanced with a steady tread towards the group of chiefs that was seated in grave array on a fallen tree, the oldest of their number cast his eye upwards at an opening in the trees, and pointed out to his companions the startling fact that the sun was just entering a space that was known to mark the zenith. A common, but low exclamation of surprise and admiration escaped every mouth, and the grim warriors looked at each other, some with envy and disappointment, some with astonishment, at the precise accuracy of their victim, and others with a more generous and liberal feeling. The American Indian always deemed his moral victories the noblest, prizing the groans and yielding of his victim under torture more than the trophy of his scalp, and the trophy itself more than his life. To slay, and not to bring off the proof of victory, indeed, was scarcely deemed honorable, even these rude and fierce tenants of the forest, like their more nurtured brethren of the court and the camp, having set up for themselves imaginary and arbitrary points of honor, to supplant the conclusions of the right, and the decisions of reason.

The Hurons had been divided in their opinions concerning the probability of their captive's return. Most among them, indeed, had not expected it possible for a pale-face to come back voluntarily and meet the known penalties of an Indian torture, but a few of the seniors expected better things from one who had already shown himself so singularly cool, brave, and upright. The party had come to its decision, however, less in the expectation of finding the pledge redeemed, than in the hope of disgracing the Delawares by casting into their teeth the delinquency of one bred in their villages. They would have greatly preferred that Chungachgook should be their prisoner, and prove the traitor, but the pale-face scion of the hated stock was no bad substitute, for their purposes, failing in their designs against the ancient stem. With a view to render the triumph as signal as possible, in the event of the hour's passing without the re-appearance of the hunter, all the warriors and scouts of the party had been called in, and the whole band, men, women, and children, was now assembled at this single point to be a witness of the expected scene. As the castle was in plain view, and by no means distant, it was easily watched by daylight, and it being thought that its inmates were now limited to Hurry, the Delaware, and the two girls, no apprehensions were felt of their being able to escape unseen. A large raft, having a breast-work of logs, had been prepared, and was in actual readiness to be used against either ark or castle, as occasion might require, so soon as the fate of Deerslayer was determined, the seniors of the party having come to the opinion that it was getting to be hazardous to delay their departure for Canada, beyond the coming night. In short, the band waited merely to dispose of this single affair, ere it brought matters to a crisis, and prepared to commence its retreat towards the distant waters of Ontario.

It was an imposing scene, into which Deerslayer now found himself advancing. All the older warriors were seated on the trunk of the fallen tree, waiting his approach with grave decorum. On the right stood the young men, armed, while the left was occupied by the women and children. In the centre was an open space of considerable extent, always canopied by leaves, but from which the underbrush, dead wood, and other obstacles had been carefully removed. The more open area had probably been much used by former parties, for this was the place where the appearance of a sward was the most decided. The arches of the woods, even at high noon, cast their sombre shadows on the spot, which the brilliant rays of the sun that struggled through the leaves contributed to mellow, and, if such an expression can be used, to illuminate. It was probably from a similar scene that the mind of man first got its idea of the effects of Gothic tracery and churchly hues, this temple of nature producing some such effect, so far as light and shadows were concerned, as the well-known offspring of human invention.

As was not unusual among the tribes and wandering bands of the aborigines, two chiefs shared, in nearly equal degrees, the principal and primitive authority that was wielded over these children of the forest. There were several who might claim the distinction of being chief men, but the two in question were so much superior to all the rest in influence, that, when they agreed, no one disputed their mandates, and when they were divided, the band hesitated, like men who had lost their governing principle of action. It was also in conformity with practice—perhaps we might add, in conformity with nature, that one of the chiefs was indebted to his mind for his influence, whereas the other owed his distinction altogether to qualities that were physical. One was a senior, well known for eloquence in debate, wisdom in council, and prudence in measures, while his great competitor, if not his rival, was a brave, distinguished in war, notorious for ferocity, and remarkable, in the way of intellect, for nothing but the cunning and expedients of the war-path. The first was Rivenoak, who has already been introduced to the reader, while the last was called le Panthère, in the language of the Canadas, or the Panther, to resort to the vernacular of the English colonies. The appellation of the fighting chief was supposed to indicate the qualities of the warrior, agreeably to a practice of the red-man's nomenclature, ferocity, cunning, and treachery, being, perhaps, the distinctive features of his character. The title had been received from the French, and was prized so much the more from that circumstance, the Indian submitting profoundly to the greater intelligence of his pale-face allies, in most things of this nature. How well the sobriquet was merited, will be seen in the sequel.

Rivenoak and the Panther sat side by side, awaiting the approach of their prisoner, as Deerslayer put his moccasined foot on the strand, nor did either move or utter a syllable until the young man had advanced into the centre of the area, and proclaimed his presence with his voice. This was done firmly, though in the simple manner that marked the character of the individual.

'Here I am, Mingos,' he said, in the dialect of the Delawares, a language that most present understood, 'here I am, and there is the sun. One is not more true to the laws of nature', than the other has proved true to his word. I am your prisoner, do with me what you please. My business with man and 'arth is settled, nothing remains now but to meet the white man's God, according to a white man's duties and gifts.'

A murmur of approbation escaped even the women at this address, and for an instant there was a strong and pretty general desire to adopt into the tribe one who owned so brave a spirit. Still there were dissenters from this wish, among the principal of whom might be classed the Panther, and his sister, le Sumach, so called from the number of her children, who was the widow of le Loup Cervier, now known to have fallen by the hand of the captive. Native ferocity held one in subjection, while the corroding passion of revenge prevented the other from admitting any gentler feeling at the moment. Not so with Rivenoak. This chief arose, stretched his arm before him, in a gesture of courtesy, and paid his compliments with an ease and dignity that a prince might have envied. As, in that band, his wisdom and eloquence were confessedly without rivals, he knew that on himself would properly fall the duty of first replying to the speech of the pale-face.

'Pale-face, you are honest,' said the Huron orator. 'My people are happy in having captured a man, and not a skulking fox. We now know you, we shall treat you like a brave. If you have slain one of our warriors, and helped to kill others, you have a life of your own ready to give away in return. Some of my young men thought that the blood of a pale-face was too thin, that it would refuse to run under the Huron knife. You will show them it is not so, your heart is stout as well as your body. It is a pleasure to make such a prisoner, should my warriors say that the death of le Loup Cervier ought not to be forgotten, and that he cannot travel towards the land of spirits alone, that his enemy must be sent to overtake him, they will remember that he fell by the hand of a brave, and send you after him with such signs of our friendship as shall not make him ashamed to keep your company. I have spoken, you know what I have said.'

'True enough, Mingo, all true as the gospel,' returned the simple-minded hunter, 'you have spoken, and I do know not only what you have said, but, what is still more important, what you mean. I dare to say your warrior the Lynx, was a stout-hearted brave, and worthy of your friendship and respect, but I do not feel unworthy to keep his company, without any passport from your hands. Nevertheless, here I am, ready to receive judgment from your council, if, indeed, the matter was not determined among you, afore I got back.'

'My old men would not sit in council over a pale-face until they saw him among them,' answered Rivenoak, looking around him a little ironically, 'they said it would be like sitting in council over the winds, they go where they will, and come back as they see fit, and not otherwise. There was one voice that spoke in your favor, Deerslayer, but it was alone, like the song of the wren whose mate has been struck by the hawk.'

'I thank that voice whos'ever it may have been, Mingo, and will say it was as true a voice as the rest were lying voices. A furlough is as binding on a pale-face, if he be honest, as it is on a red-skin, and was it not so, I would never bring disgrace on the Delawares, among whom I may be said to have received my education. But words are useless, and lead to braggin' feelin's, here I am, act your will on me.'

Rivenoak made a sign of acquiescence, and then a short conference was privately held among the chiefs. As soon as the latter ended, three or four young men fell back from among the armed group, and disappeared. Then it was signified to the prisoner that he was at liberty to go at large on the point, until a council was held concerning his fate. There was more of seeming, than of real confidence, however, in this apparent liberality, inasmuch as the young men mentioned, already formed a line of sentinels across the breadth of the point, inland, and escape from any other part was out of the question. Even the canoe was removed beyond this line of sentinels, to a spot where it was considered safe from any sudden attempt. These precautions did not proceed from a failure of confidence, but from the circumstance that the prisoner had now complied with all the required conditions of his parole, and it would have been considered a commendable and honorable exploit to escape from his foes. So nice, indeed, were the distinctions drawn by the savages, in cases of this nature, that they often gave their victims a chance to evade the torture, deeming it as creditable to the captors to overtake, or to out-wit a fugitive, when his exertions were supposed to be quickened by the extreme jeopardy of his situation, as it was for him to get clear from so much extraordinary vigilance.

Nor was Deerslayer unconscious of, or forgetful of, his rights, and of his opportunities. Could he now have seen any probable opening for an escape, the attempt would not have been delayed a minute. But the case seemed desperate. He was aware of the line of sentinels, and felt the difficulty of breaking through it, unharmed. The lake offered no advantages, as the canoe would have given his foes the greatest facilities for overtaking him, else would he have found it no difficult task to swim as far as the castle. As he walked about the point, he even examined the spot to ascertain if it offered no place of concealment, but its openness, its size, and the hundred watchful glances that were turned towards him, even while those who made them affected not to see him, prevented any such expedient from succeeding. The dread and disgrace of failure had no influence on Deerslayer, who deemed it ever a point of honor to reason and feel like a white man, rather than as an Indian, and who felt it a sort of duty to do all he could, that did not involve a dereliction from principle, in order to save his life. Still he hesitated about making the effort, for he also felt that he ought to see the chance of success before he committed himself.

In the meantime the business of the camp appeared to proceed in its regular train. The chiefs consulted apart, admitting no one but the Sumach to their councils, for she, the widow of the fallen warrior, had an exclusive right to be heard on such an occasion. The young men strolled about in indolent listlessness, awaiting the result with Indian impatience, while the females prepared the feast that was to celebrate the termination of the affair, whether it proved fortunate or otherwise for our hero. No one betrayed feeling, and an indifferent observer, beyond the extreme watchfulness of the sentinels, would have detected no extraordinary movement or sensation to denote the real state of things. Two or three old women put their heads together, and, it appeared, unfavorably to the prospect of Deerslayer, by their scowling looks and angry gestures, but a group of Indian girls were evidently animated by a different impulse, as was apparent by stolen glances that expressed pity and regret. In this condition of the camp, an hour soon glided away.

Suspense is, perhaps, the feeling, of all others, that is most difficult to be supported. When Deerslayer landed, he fully expected in the course of a few minutes to undergo the tortures of an Indian revenge, and he was prepared to meet his fate manfully, but the delay proved far more trying than the nearer approach of suffering, and the intended victim began seriously to meditate some desperate effort at escape, as it might be from sheer anxiety to terminate the scene, when he was suddenly summoned to appear, once more, in front of his judges, who had already arranged the band in its former order, in readiness to receive him.

'Killer of the Deer,' commenced Rivenoak, as soon as his captive stood before him, 'my aged men have listened to wise words, they are ready to speak. You are a man whose fathers came from beyond the rising sun, we are children of the setting sun, we turn our faces towards the Great Sweet Lakes when we look towards our villages. It may be a wise country and full of riches towards the morning, but it is very pleasant towards the evening. We love most to look in that direction. When we gaze at the east we feel afraid, canoe after canoe bringing more and more of your people in the track of the sun, as if their land was so full as to run over. The red-men are few already, they have need of help. One of our best lodges has lately been emptied by the death of its master, it will be a long time before his son can grow big enough to sit in his place. There is his widow! she will want venison to feed her and her children, for her sons are yet like the young of the robin before they quit the nest. By your hand has this great calamity befallen her. She has two duties, one to le Loup Cervier, and one to his children. Scalp for scalp, life for life, blood for blood, is one law, to feed her young, another. We know you, Killer of the Deer. You are honest, when you say a thing, it is so. You have but one tongue, and that is not forked like a snake's. Your head is never hid in the grass; all can see it. What you say, that will you do. You are just. When you have done wrong, it is your wish to do right again, as soon as you can. Here is the Sumach, she is alone in her wigwam, with children crying around her for food, yonder is a rifle, it is loaded and ready to be fired. Take the gun, go forth and shoot a deer, bring the venison and lay it before the widow of le Loup Cervier, feed her children, call yourself her husband. After which, your heart will no longer be Delaware, but Huron, le Sumach's ears will not hear the cries of her children, my people will count the proper number of warriors.'

'I feared this, Rivenoak,' answered Deerslayer, when the other had ceased speaking, 'yes, I did dread that it would come to this. Hows'ever, the truth is soon told, and that will put an end to all expectations on this head. Mingo, I'm white, and Christian-born, 'twould ill become me to take a wife, under red-skin forms, from among heathen. That which I wouldn't do in peaceable times, and under a bright sun, still less would I do behind clouds, in order to save my life. I may never marry, most likely Providence, in putting me up here in the woods, has intended I should live single, and without a lodge of my own. But should such a thing come to pass, none but a woman of my own color and gifts shall darken the door of my wigwam. As for feeding the young of your dead warrior, I would do that cheerfully, could it be done without discredit, but it cannot, seeing that I can never live in a Huron village. Your own young men must find the Sumach in venison, and the next time she marries, let her take a husband whose legs are not long enough to overrun territory that don't belong to him. We fou't a fair battle, and he fell, in this there is nothin' but what a brave expects, and should be ready to meet. As for getting a Mingo heart, as well might you expect to see grey hairs on a boy, or the blackberry growing on the pine. No, no, Huron, my gifts are white, so far as wives are concerned, it is Delaware in all things touchin' Indians.'

These words were scarcely out of the mouth of Deerslayer, before a common murmur betrayed the dissatisfaction with which they had been heard. The aged women, in particular, were loud in their expressions of disgust, and the gentle Sumach, herself, a woman quite old enough to be our hero's mother, was not the least pacific in her denunciations. But all the other manifestations of disappointment and discontent were thrown into the background, by the fierce resentment of the

Panther This grim chief had thought it a degradation to permit his sister to become the wife of a pale-face of the Yengeese, at all, and had only given a reluctant consent to the arrangement—one by no means unusual among the Indians, however—at the earnest solicitations of the bereaved widow, and it goaded him to the quick to find his condescension slighted, the honor he had with so much regret been persuaded to accord, contemned The animal from which he got his name does not glare on his intended prey with more frightful ferocity, than his eyes gleamed on the captive, nor was his arm backward in seconding the fierce resentment that almost consumed his breast

'Dog of the pale-faces!' he exclaimed, in Iroquois, 'go yell among the curs of your own evil hunting-grounds!'

The denunciation was accompanied by an appropriate action Even while speaking, his arm was lifted, and the tomahawk hurled Luckily the loud tones of the speaker had drawn the eye of Deerslayer towards him, else would that moment have probably closed his career So great was the dexterity with which this dangerous weapon was thrown, and so deadly the intent, that it would have riven the skull of the prisoner, had he not stretched forth an arm, and caught the handle in one of its turns, with a readiness quite as remarkable as the skill with which the missile had been hurled The projectile force was so great, notwithstanding, that when Deerslayer's arm was arrested, his hand was raised above and behind his own head, and in the very attitude necessary to return the attack It is not certain whether the circumstance of finding himself unexpectedly in this menacing posture and armed, tempted the young man to retaliate, or whether sudden resentment overcame his forbearance and prudence His eye kindled, however, and a small red spot appeared on each cheek, while he cast all his energy into the effort of his arm, and threw back the weapon at his assailant The unexpectedness of this blow contributed to its success, the Panther neither raising an arm, nor bending his head to avoid it The keen little axe struck the victim in a perpendicular line with the nose, directly between the eyes, literally braining him on the spot Sallying forward, as the serpent

10 darts at his enemy even while receiving its own death-wound, this man of powerful frame fell his length into the open area formed by the circle, quivering in death A common rush to his relief left the captive, for a single instant, quite without the crowd, and, willing to make one desperate effort for life, he bounded off with the activity of a deer There was but a breathless instant, when the whole band, old and young, women and children, abandoning the lifeless body of the Panther where it lay, raised the yell of alarm, and followed in pursuit

Sudden as had been the event which induced Deerslayer to make this desperate trial of speed, his mind was not wholly unprepared for the fearful emergency In the course of the past hour, he had pondered well on the chances of such an experiment, and had shrewdly calculated all the details of success and failure At the first leap, therefore, his body was completely under the direction of an intelligence that turned all its efforts to the best account, and prevented everything like hesitation or indecision, at the important instant of the start To this alone was he indebted for the first great advantage, that of getting through the line of sentinels unharmed The manner in which this was done, though sufficiently simple, merits a description

Although the shores of the point were not fringed with bushes, as was the case with most of the others on the lake, it was owing altogether to the circumstance that the spot had been so much used by hunters and fishermen This fringe commenced on what might be termed the main land, and was as dense as usual, extending in long lines both north and south In the latter direction, then, Deerslayer held his way, and, as the sentinels were a little without the commencement of this thicket, before the alarm was clearly communicated to them, the fugitive had gained its cover To run among the bushes, however, was out of the question, and Deerslayer held his way for some forty or fifty yards, in the water which was barely knee deep, offering as great an obstacle to the speed of his pursuers as it did to his own. As soon as a favorable spot presented, he darted through the line of bushes, and issued into the open woods.

Several rifles were discharged at Deerslayer while in the water, and more followed as he came out into the comparative exposure of the clear forest. But the direction of his line of flight, which partially crossed that of the fire, the haste with which the weapons had been aimed, and the general confusion that prevailed in the camp, prevented any harm from being done. Bullets whistled past him, and many cut twigs from the branches at his side, but not one touched even his dress. The delay caused by these fruitless attempts was of great service to the fugitive, who had gained more than a hundred yards on even the leading men of the Hurons, ere something like concert and order had entered into the chase. To think of following with rifle in hand was out of the question, and after emptying their pieces in vague hopes of wounding their captive, the best runners of the Indians threw them aside, calling out to the women and boys to recover and load them again, as soon as possible.

Deerslayer knew too well the desperate nature of the struggle in which he was engaged, to lose one of the precious moments. He also knew that his only hope was to run in a straight line, for as soon as he began to turn, or double, the greater number of his pursuers would put escape out of the question. He held his way, therefore, in a diagonal direction up the acclivity, which was neither very high nor very steep, in this part of the mountain, but which was sufficiently toilsome for one contending for life, to render it painfully oppressive. There, however, he slackened his speed, to recover breath, proceeding even at a quick walk, or a slow trot, along the more difficult parts of the way. The Hurons were whooping and leaping behind him, but thus he disregarded, well knowing they must overcome the difficulties he had surmounted, ere they could reach the elevation to which he had attained. The summit of the first hill was now quite near him, and he saw, by the formation of the land, that a deep glen intervened, before the base of a second hill could be reached. Walking deliberately to the summit, he glanced eagerly about him, in every direction, in quest of a cover. None offered in the ground, but a fallen tree lay near him, and desperate circumstances require desperate remedies. This tree lay in a line parallel to the glen, at the brow of the hill, to leap on it, and then to force his person as close as possible under its lower side, took but a moment. Previously to disappearing from his pursuers, however, Deerslayer stood on the height, and gave a cry of triumph, as if exulting at the sight of the descent that lay before him. — In the next instant he was stretched beneath the tree.

No sooner was this expedient adopted, than the young man ascertained how desperate had been his own efforts, by the violence of the pulsations in his frame. He could hear his heart beat, and his breathing was like the action of a bellows in quick motion. Breath was gained, however, and the heart soon ceased to throb, as if about to break through its confinement. The footsteps of those who toiled up the opposite side of the acclivity were now audible, and presently voices and treads announced the arrival of the pursuers. The foremost shouted as they reached the height, then, fearful that their enemy would escape under favor of the descent, each leaped upon the fallen tree, and plunged into the ravine, trusting to get a sight of the pursued, ere he reached the bottom. In this manner, Huron followed Huron, until Natty began to hope the whole had passed. Others succeeded, however, until quite forty had leaped over the tree, and then he counted them, as the surest mode of ascertaining how many could be behind. Presently all were in the bottom of the glen, quite a hundred feet below him, and some had even ascended part of the opposite hill, when it became evident an inquiry was making, as to the direction he had taken. This was the critical moment, and one of nerves less steady, or of a training that had been neglected, would have seized it to rise, and fly. Not so with Deerslayer. He still lay quiet, watching with jealous vigilance every movement below, and fast regaining his breath.

The Hurons now resembled a pack of hounds at fault. Little was said, but each man ran about, examining the dead leaves, as the hound hunts for the lost scent. The great number of moccasins that had passed made the examination difficult, though the in-toe of an Indian was easily to be distinguished from the freer and wider step of a white man. Believing that no more pursuers remained behind, and hoping to steal away unseen, Deerslayer suddenly threw himself over the tree, and fell on the upper side. This achievement appeared to be effected successfully, and hope beat high in the bosom of the fugitive. Rising to his hands and feet, after a moment lost in listening to the sounds in the glen, in order to ascertain if he had been seen, the young man next scrambled to the top of the hill, a distance of only ten yards, in the expectation of getting its brow between him and his pursuers, and himself so far under cover. Even this was effected, and he rose to his feet, walking swiftly but steadily along the summit, in a direction opposite to that in which he had first fled. The nature of the calls in the glen, however, soon made him uneasy, and he sprang upon the summit again, in order to reconnoitre. No sooner did he reach the height than he was seen, and the chase renewed. As it was better footing on the level ground, Deerslayer now avoided the side-hill, holding his flight along the ridge, while the Hurons, judging from the general formation of the land, saw that the ridge would soon melt into the hollow, and kept to the latter, as the easiest mode of heading the fugitive. A few, at the same time, turned south, with a view to prevent his escaping in that direction, while some crossed his trail towards the water, in order to prevent his retreat by the lake, running southerly.

The situation of Deerslayer was now more critical than it ever had been. He was virtually surrounded on three sides, having the lake on the fourth. But he had pondered well on all the chances, and took his measures with coolness, even while at the top of his speed. As is generally the case with the vigorous border-men, he could outrun any single Indian among his pursuers, who were principally formidable to him on account of their numbers, and the advantages they possessed in position, and he would not have hesitated to break off in a straight line, at any spot, could he have got the whole band again fairly behind him. But no such chance did, or indeed could now offer, and when he found that he was descending towards the glen, by the melting away of the ridge, he turned short, at right angles to his previous course, and went down the declivity with tremendous velocity, holding his way towards the shore. Some of his pursuers came panting up the hill, in direct chase, while most still kept on, in the ravine, intending to head him at its termination.

Deerslayer had now a different, though a desperate project in view. Abandoning all thoughts of escape by the woods, he made the best of his way towards the canoe. He knew where it lay, could it be reached, he had only to run the gauntlet of a few rifles, and success would be certain. None of the warriors had kept their weapons, which would have retarded their speed, and the risk would come either from the uncertain hands of the women, or from those of some well-grown boy, though most of the latter were already out in hot pursuit. Everything seemed propitious to the execution of this plan, and the course being a continued descent, the young man went over the ground at a rate that promised a speedy termination to his toil.

As Deerslayer approached the point, several women and children were passed, but, though the former endeavored to cast dried branches between his legs, the terror inspired by his bold retaliation on the redoubted Panther was so great, that none dared come near enough seriously to molest him. He went by all triumphantly, and reached the fringe of bushes. Plunging through these, our hero found himself once more in the lake, and within fifty feet of the canoe. Here he ceased to run, for he well understood that his breath was now all-important to him. He even stooped, as he advanced, and cooled his parched mouth, by scooping up water in his hand to drink. Still the moments pressed, and he soon stood at the side of the canoe. The first glance told him that the paddles had been removed! This was a sore disappointment after all his efforts, and for a single moment he thought of turning, and of facing his foes by walking with dignity into the centre of the camp again. But an infernal yell, such as the American savage alone can raise, proclaimed the quick approach of the nearest of his pursuers, and the instinct of life triumphed. Preparing himself duly, and giving a right direction to its bows, he ran off into the water bearing the canoe before him, threw all his strength and skill into a last effort, and cast himself forward so as to fall into the bottom of the light craft, without materially impeding its way. Here he remained on his back, both to regain his breath and to cover his person from the deadly rifle. The lightness, which was such an advantage in paddling the canoe, now operated unfavorably. The material was so like a feather that the boat had no momentum, else would the impulse in that smooth and placid sheet have impelled it to a distance from the shore, that would have rendered paddling with the hands safe. Could such a point once be reached, Deerslayer thought he might get far enough out to attract the attention of Chungachgook and Judith, who would not fail to come to his relief with other canoes, a circumstance that promised everything. As the young man lay in the bottom of the canoe, he watched its movements by studying the tops of the trees on the mountain-side, and judged of his distance by the time and the motion. Voices on the shore were now numerous, and he heard something said about manning the raft, which fortunately for the fugitive lay at a considerable distance, on the other side of the point.

Perhaps the situation of Deerslayer had not been more critical that day than it was at this moment. It certainly had not been one half as tantalizing. He lay perfectly quiet for two or three minutes, trusting to the single sense of hearing, confident that the noise in the lake would reach his ears, did any one venture to approach by swimming. Once or twice he fancied that the element was stirred by the cautious movement of an arm, and then he perceived it was the wash of the water on the pebbles of the strand, for, in mimicry of the ocean, it is seldom that those little lakes are so totally tranquil, as not to possess a slight heaving and setting on their shores. Suddenly all the voices ceased, and a death-like stillness pervaded the spot, a quietness as profound as if all lay in the repose of inanimate life. By this time the canoe had drifted so far as to render nothing visible to Deerslayer, as he lay on his back, except the blue void of space, and a few of those brighter rays that proceed from the effulgence of the sun, marked his proximity. It was not possible to endure this uncertainty long. The young man well knew that the profound stillness foreboded evil, the savages never being so silent as when about to strike a blow, resembling the stealthy foot of the panther ere he takes his leap. He took out a knife, and was about to cut a hole through the bark in order to get a view of the shore, when he paused from a dread of being seen in the operation, which would direct the enemy where to aim their bullets. At this instant a rifle was fired, and the ball pierced both sides of the canoe, within eighteen inches of the spot where his head lay. This was close work, but our hero had too lately gone through that which was closer, to be appalled. He lay still half a minute longer, and then he saw the summit of an oak coming slowly within his narrow horizon.

Unable to account for this change, Deerslayer could restrain his impatience no longer. Hitching his body along, with the utmost caution, he got his eye at the bullet-hole, and fortunately commanded a very tolerable view of the point. The canoe, by one of those imperceptible impulses that so often decide the fate of men as well as the course of things, had inclined southerly, and was slowly drifting down the lake. It was lucky that Deerslayer had given it a shove sufficiently vigorous to send it past the end of the point ere it took this inclination, or it must have gone ashore again. As it was, it drifted so near it as to bring the tops of two or three trees within the range of the young man's view, as has been mentioned, and, indeed, to come in quite as close proximity with the extremity of the point as was at all safe. The distance could not much have exceeded a hundred feet, though fortunately a light current of air from the south-west began to set it slowly off shore.

Deerslayer now felt the urgent necessity of resorting to some expedient to get further from his foes, and, if possible, to apprise his friends of his situation. The distance rendered the last difficult, while the proximity to the point rendered the first indispensable. As was usual in such craft, a large, round, smooth stone was in each end of the canoe, for the double purposes of seats and ballast, one of these was within reach of his feet. This stone he contrived to get so far between his legs as to reach it with his hands, and then he managed to roll it to the side of its fellow in the bows, where the two served to keep the trim of the light boat, while he worked his own body as far aft as possible. Before quitting the shore, and as soon as he perceived that the paddles were gone, Deerslayer had thrown a bit of dead branch into the canoe, and this was within reach of his arm. Removing the cap he wore, he put it on the end of this stick, and just let it appear over the edge of the canoe, as far as possible from his own person. This ruse was scarcely adopted, before the young man had a proof how much he had underrated the intelligence of his enemies. In contempt of an artifice so shallow and commonplace, a bullet was fired directly through another part of the canoe, which actually razed his skin. He dropped the cap, and instantly raised it immediately over his head as a safeguard. It would seem that this second artifice was unseen, or what was more probable, the Hurons, feeling certain of recovering their captive, wished to take him alive.

Deerslayer lay passive a few minutes longer, his eye at the bullet hole, however, and much did he rejoice at seeing that he was drifting gradually further and further from the shore. When he looked upwards, the tree tops had disappeared, but he soon found that the canoe was slowly turning, so as to prevent his getting a view of anything at his peep-hole but of the two extremities of the lake. He now bethought him of the stick, which was crooked and offered some facilities for rowing without the necessity of rising. The experiment succeeded, on trial, better even than he had hoped, though his great embarrassment was to keep the canoe straight. That his present manoeuvre was seen soon became apparent by the clamor on the shore, and a bullet entering the stern of the canoe, traversed its length, whistling between the arms of our hero, and passed out at the head. This satisfied the fugitive that he was getting away with tolerable speed, and induced him to increase his efforts. He was making a stronger push than common, when another messenger from the point broke the stick outboard, and at once deprived him of his oar. As the sound of voices seemed to grow more and more distant, however, Deerslayer determined to leave all to the drift until he believed himself beyond the reach of bullets. This was nervous work, but it was the wisest of all the expedients that offered, and the young man was encouraged to persevere in it, by the circumstance that he felt his face fanned by the air, a proof that there was a little more wind.

CONGREVE.

By this time, Deerslayer had been twenty minutes in the canoe, and he began to grow a little impatient for some signs of relief from his friends. The position of the boat still prevented his seeing in any direction, unless it were up or down the lake, and, though he knew that his line of sight must pass within a hundred yards of the castle, it, in fact, passed that distance to the westward of the buildings. The profound stillness troubled him also, for he knew not whether to ascribe it to the increasing space between him and the Indians, or to some new artifice. At length, wearied with fruitless watchfulness, the young man turned himself on his back, closed his eyes, and awaited the result in determined acquiescence. If the savages could so completely control their thirst for revenge, he was resolved to be as calm as themselves, and to trust his fate to the interposition of the currents and air.

Some additional ten minutes may have passed in this quiescent manner, on both sides, when Deerslayer thought he heard a slight noise like a low rubbing against the bottom of his canoe. He opened his eyes of course, in expectation of seeing the face or arm of an Indian rising from the water, and found that a canopy of leaves was impending directly over his head. Starting to his feet, the first object that met his eye was Rivenoak, who had so far aided the slow progress of the boat, as to draw it on the point, the grating on the strand being the sound that had first given our hero the alarm. The change in the drift of the canoe had been altogether owing to the baffling nature of the light currents of air, aided by some eddies in the water.

'Come,' said the Huron, with a quiet gesture of authority to order his prisoner to land, 'my young friend has sailed about till he is tired, he will forget how to run again unless he uses his legs.'

'You've the best of it, Huron,' returned Deerslayer, stepping steadily from the canoe, and passively following his leader to the open area of the point, 'Providence has helped you in an unexpected manner. I'm your prisoner ag'in, and I hope you'll allow that I'm as good at breaking gaol as I am at keeping furloughs.'

'My young friend is a moose!' exclaimed the Huron. 'His legs are very long, they have given my young men trouble. But he is not a fish, he cannot find his way in the lake. We did not shoot him, fish are taken in nets, and not killed by bullets. When he turns moose again he will be treated like a moose.'

'Ay, have your talk, Rivenoak, make the most of your advantage. 'Tis your right, I suppose, and I know it is your gift. On that p'int there'll be no words atween us, for all men must and ought to follow their gifts. Hows'ever, when your women begin to ta'nt and abuse me, as I suppose will soon happen, let 'em remember that if a pale-face struggles for life so long as it's lawful and manful, he knows how to loosen his hold on it decently, when he feels that the time has come. I'm your captyve, work your will on me.'

'My brother has had a long run on the hills, and a pleasant sail on the water,' returned Rivenoak more mildly, smiling at the same time, in a way that his listener knew denoted pacific intentions. 'He has seen the woods, he has seen the water, which does he like best? Perhaps he has seen enough to change his mind, and make him hear reason.'

'Speak out, Huron. Something is in your thoughts, and the sooner it is said, the sooner you'll get my answer.'

'That is straight! There is no turning in the talk of my pale-face friend, though he is a fox in running. I will speak to him, his ears are now open wider than before, and his eyes are not shut. The Sumach is poorer than ever. Once she had a brother and a husband. She had children too. The time came, and the husband started for the happy hunting-grounds without saying farewell, he left her alone with his children. This he could not help, or he would not have done it; le Loup Cervier was a good husband. It was pleasant to see the venison, and wild ducks, and geese, and bear's meat, that hung in his lodge in winter. It is now gone, it will not keep in warm weather. Who shall bring it back again? Some thought the brother would not forget his sister, and that next winter he would see that the lodge should not be empty. We thought this, but the Panther yelled, and followed the husband on the path of death. They are now trying which shall first reach the happy hunting-grounds. Some think the Lynx can run fastest, and some think the Panther can jump the furthest. The Sumach thinks both will travel so fast and so far, that neither will ever come back. Who shall feed her and her young? The man who told her husband and her brother to quit her lodge, that there might be room for him to come into it. He is a great hunter, and we know that the woman will never want.'

'Ay, Huron, this is soon settled, according to your notions, but it goes sorely ag'in the grain of a white man's feelin's. I've heard of men's saving their lives this-away, and I've know'd them that would prefer death to such a sort of captivity. For my part, I do not seek my end, nor do I seek matrimony.'

'The pale-face will think of this while my people get ready for the council. He will be told what will happen. Let him remember how hard it is to lose a husband and a brother. Go when we want him, the name of Deerslayer will be called.'

This conversation had been held with no one near but the speakers. Of all the band that had so lately thronged the place, Rivenoak alone was visible. The rest seemed to have totally abandoned the spot. Even the furniture, clothes, arms, and other property of the camp had entirely disappeared, and the place bore no other proofs of the crowd that had so lately occupied it, than the traces of their fires and resting-places, and the trodden earth that still showed the marks of their feet. So sudden and unexpected a change caused Deerslayer a good deal of surprise and some uneasiness, for he had never known it to occur in the course of his experience among the Delawares. He suspected, however, and rightly, that a change of encampment was intended, and that the mystery of the movement was resorted to, in order to work on his apprehensions.

Rivenoak walked up the vista of trees, as soon as he ceased speaking, leaving Deerslayer by himself. The chief disappeared behind the covers of the forest, and one unpractised in such scenes might have believed the prisoner left to the dictates of his own judgment. But the young man, while he felt a little amazement at the dramatic aspect of things, knew his enemies too well to fancy himself at liberty, or a free agent. Still he was ignorant how far the Hurons meant to carry their artifices, and he determined to bring the question, as soon as practicable, to the proof. Affecting an indifference he was far from feeling, he strolled about the area, gradually getting nearer and nearer to the spot where he had landed, when he suddenly quickened his pace, though carefully avoiding all appearance of flight, and pushing aside the bushes he stepped upon the beach. The canoe was gone, nor could he see any traces of it, after walking to the northern and southern verges of the point, and examining the shores in both directions. It was evidently removed beyond his reach and knowledge, and under circumstances to show that such had been the intention of the savages.

Deerslayer now better understood his actual situation. He was a prisoner on the narrow tongue of land, vigilantly watched beyond a question, and with no other means of escape than that of swimming. He again thought of this last expedient, but the certainty that the canoe would be sent in chase, and the desperate nature of the chances of success, deterred him from the undertaking. While on the strand, he came to a spot where the bushes had been cut, and thrown into a small pile. Removing a few of the upper branches, he found beneath them the dead body of the Panther. He knew that it was kept until the savages might find a place to inter it, when it would be beyond the reach of the scalping-knife. He gazed wistfully towards the castle, but there all seemed to be silent and desolate; and a feeling of loneliness and desertion came over him to increase the gloom of the moment.

'God's will be done!' murmured the young man, as he walked sorrowfully away from the beach, entering again beneath the arches of the wood, 'God's will be done, on 'arth as it is in heaven! I did hope that my days would not be numbered so soon! but it matters little, a'ter all. A few more winters, and a few more summers, and 'twould have been over, accordin' to natur'. Ah's me! the young and actyve seldom think death possible, till he grins in their faces and tells 'em the hour is come!'

While this soliloquy was being pronounced, the hunter advanced into the area, where to his surprise he saw Hetty alone, evidently awaiting his return. The girl carried the Bible under her arm, and her face, over which a shadow of gentle melancholy was usually thrown, now seemed sad and downcast. Moving nearer, Deerslayer spoke.

'Poor Hetty,' he said, 'times have been so troublesome of late, that I'd altogether forgotten you, we meet, as it might be, to mourn over what is to happen. I wonder what has become of Chingachgook and Wah!'

'Why did you kill the Huron, Deerslayer?' returned the girl, reproachfully. 'Don't you know your commandments, which say, "Thou shalt not kill!" They tell me you have now slain the woman's husband and brother.'

'It's true, my good Hetty,—'tis gospel truth, and I'll not deny what has come to pass. But you must remember, gal, that many things are lawful in war, which would be onlawful in peace. The husband was shot in open fight, or, open so far as I was consarned, while he had a better cover than common,—and the brother brought his end on himself by casting his tomahawk at an unarmed prisoner. Did you witness that deed, gal?'

'I saw it, and was sorry it happened, Deerslayer, for I hoped you wouldn't have returned blow for blow, but good for evil.'

'Ah, Hetty, that may do among the missionaries, but 'twould make an onsartain life in the woods. The Panther craved my blood, and he was foolish enough to throw arms into my hands at the very moment he was striving a'ter it 'Twould have been ag'in natur' not to raise a hand in such a trial, and 'twould have done discredit to my training and gifts No, no, I'm as willing to give every man his own, as another, and so I hope you'll testify to them that will be likely to question you as to what you've seen this day'

'Deerslayer, do you mean to marry Sumach, now she has neither husband nor brother to feed her?'

'Are such your idees of matrimony, Hetty? Ought the young to wive with the old—the pale-face with the red-skin—the Christian with the heathen? It's ag'in reason and natur', and so you'll see, if you think of it a moment'

'I've always heard mother say,' returned Hetty, averting her face, more from a feminine instinct than from any consciousness of wrong, 'that people should never marry until they loved each other better than brothers and sisters, and I suppose that is what you mean Sumach is old, and you are young'

'Ay, and she's red, and I'm white Besides, Hetty, suppose you was a wife, now, having married some young man of your own years, and state, and color—Hurry Harry, for instance,'—Deerslayer selected this example, simply from the circumstance that he was the only young man known to both,—'and that he had fallen on a war-path, would you wish to take to your bosom, for a husband, the man that slew him?'

'Oh! no, no, no,' returned the girl, shuddering 'That would be wicked, as well as heartless! No Christian girl could, or would, do that I never shall be the wife of Hurry, I know, but were he my husband, no man should ever be it again after his death'

'I thought it would get to this, Hetty, when you come to understand sarcumstances 'Tis a moral impossibility that I should ever marry Sumach, and, though injin weddin's have no priests, and not much religion, a white man who knows his gifts and duties, can't profit by that, and so make his escape at the fitting time I do think death would be moie nat'ral like, and welcome, than wedlock with this woman'

'Don't say it too loud,' interrupted Hetty, impatiently, 'I suppose she will not like to hear it I'm sure Hurry would rather marry even me, than suffer torments, though I am feeble-minded, and I am sure it would kill me to think he'd prefer death to being my husband'

'Ay, gal, you an't Sumach, but a comely young Christian, with a good heart, pleasant smile, and kind eye Hurry might be proud to get you, and that, too, not in misery and sorrow, but in his best and happiest days Hows'ever, take my advice, and never talk to Hurry about these things, he's only a borderer, at the best'

'I wouldn't tell him, for the world!' exclaimed the girl, looking about her like one affrighted, and blushing, she knew not why 'Mother always said young women shouldn't be forward, and speak their munds before they're asked,—oh! I never forget what mother told me 'Tis a pity Hurry is so handsome, Deerslayer, I do think fewer girls would like him then, and he would sooner know his own mind'

'Poor gal, poor gal, it's plain enough how it is, but the Lord will bear in mind one of your simple heart and kind feeln's! We'll talk no more of these things, if you had reason, you'd be sorrowful at having let others so much into your secret Tell me, Hetty, what has become of all the Hurons, and why they let you roam about the p'int, as if you, too, was a prisoner?'

'I'm no prisoner, Deerslayer, but a free girl, and go when and where I please Nobody dare hurt me! If they did, God would be angry—as I can show them in the Bible No—no—Hetty Hutter is not afraid, she's in good hands The Hurons are up yonder in the woods, and keep a good watch on us both, I'll answer for it, since all the women and children are on the look-out Some are burying the body of the poor girl who was shot, so that the enemy and the wild beasts can't find it I told 'em that father and mother lay in the lake, but I wouldn't let them know in what part of it, for Judith and I don't want any of their heathenish company in our burying-ground'

'Ah's me!—Well, it is an awful despatch to be standing here, alive and angry, and with the feeln's up and furious, one hour, and then to be carried away at the next, and put out of sight of mankind in a hole in the 'arth No one knows what will happen to him on a war-path, that's sartin'

Here the stirring of leaves and the crackling of dried twigs interrupted the discourse, and apprised Deerslayer of the approach of his enemies. The Hurons closed around the spot that had been prepared for the coming scene, and in the centre of which the intended victim now stood, in a circle—the armed men being so distributed among the feeble members of the band, that there was no safe opening through which the prisoner could break. But the latter no longer contemplated flight, the recent trial having satisfied him of his inability to escape, when pursued so closely by numbers. On the contrary, all his energies were aroused, in order to meet his expected fate with a calmness that should do credit to his color and his manhood, one equally removed from recreant alarm and savage boasting.

When Rivenoak reappeared in the circle, he occupied his old place at the head of the area. Several of the elder warriors stood near him, but, now that the brother of Sumach had fallen, there was no longer any recognized chief present, whose influence and authority offered a dangerous rivalry to his own. Nevertheless, it is well known that little which could be called monarchical, or despotic, entered into the politics of the North American tribes, although the first colonists, bringing with them to this hemisphere the notions and opinions of their own countries, often dignified the chief men of those primitive nations with the titles of kings and princes. Hereditary influence did certainly exist, but there is much reason to believe it existed rather as a consequence of hereditary merit and acquired qualifications, than as a birth-right. Rivenoak, however, had not even this claim—having risen to consideration purely by the force of talents, sagacity, and, as Bacon expresses it, in relation to all distinguished statesmen, 'by a union of great and mean qualities', a truth of which the career of the profound Englishman himself furnishes so apt an illustration.

Next to arms, eloquence offers the great avenue to popular favor, whether it be in civilized or savage life, and Rivenoak had succeeded, as so many have succeeded before him, quite as much by rendering fallacies acceptable to his listeners, as by any profound or learned expositions of truth, or the accuracy of his logic. Nevertheless, he had influence, and was far from being altogether without just claims to its possession. Like most men who reason more than they feel, the Huron was not addicted to the indulgence of the mere ferocious passions of his people; he had been commonly found on the side of mercy in all the scenes of vindictive torture and revenge that had occurred in his tribe, since his own attainment to power. On the present occasion, he was reluctant to proceed to extremities, although the provocation was so great, still it exceeded his ingenuity to see how that alternative could well be avoided. Sumach resented her rejection more than she did the deaths of her husband and brother, and there was little probability that the woman would pardon a man who had so unequivocally preferred death to her embraces. Without her forgiveness, there was scarce a hope that the tribe could be induced to overlook its loss, and even to Rivenoak himself, much as he was disposed to pardon, the fate of our hero now appeared to be almost hopelessly sealed.

When the whole band was arrayed around the captive, a grave silence, so much the more threatening from its profound quiet, pervaded the place. Deerslayer perceived that the women and boys had been preparing splinters of the fat pine roots, which he well knew were to be stuck into his flesh and set in flames, while two or three of the young men held the thongs of bark with which he was to be bound. The smoke of a distant fire announced that the burning brands were in preparation, and several of the elder warriors passed their fingers over the edges of their tomahawks, as if to prove their keenness and temper. Even the knives seemed loosened in their sheathes, impatient for the bloody and merciless work to begin.

'Killer of the Deer,' recommenced Rivenoak, certainly without any signs of sympathy or pity in his manner, though with calmness and dignity, 'Killer of the Deer, it is time that my people knew their minds. The sun is no longer over our heads, tired of waiting on the Hurons, he has begun to fall near the pines on this side of the valley. He is travelling fast towards the country of our French fathers, it is to warn his children that their lodges are empty, and that they ought to be at home. The roaming wolf has his den, and he goes to it when he wishes to see his young. The Iroquois are not poorer than the wolves. They have villages, and wigwams, and fields of corn, the good spirits will be tired of watching them alone. My people must go back and see to their own business. There will be joy in the lodges when they hear our whoop from the forest! It will be a sorrowful whoop, when it is understood, grief will come after it. There will be one scalp-whoop, but there will be only one. We have the fur of the Muskrat, his body is among the fishes. Deerslayer must say whether another scalp shall be on our pole. Two lodges are empty, a scalp, living or dead, is wanted at each door.'

'Then take 'em dead, Huron,' firmly, but altogether without dramatic boasting, returned the captive. 'My hour is come, I do suppose, and what must be, must. If you are bent on the torture, I'll do my endeavors to bear up against it, though no man can say how far his nature will stand pain, until he's been tried.'

'The pale-face cur begins to put his tail between his legs!' cried a young and garrulous savage, who bore the appropriate title of the Corbeau Rouge, a sobriquet he had gained from the French, by his facility in making unseasonable noises, and an undue tendency to hear his own voice, 'he is no warrior, he has killed the Loup Cervier when looking behind him not to see the flash of his own rifle. He grunts like a hog already, when the Huron women begin to torment him, he will cry like the young of the catamount. He is a Delaware woman, dressed in the skin of a Yengeese!'

'Have your say, young man, have your say,' returned Deerslayer, unmoved, 'you know no better, and I can overlook it. Talking may aggravate women, but can hardly make knives sharper, fire hotter, or rifles more certain.'

Rivenoak now interfered, reproving the Red Crow for his premature interference, and then directing the proper persons to bind the captive. This expedient was adopted, not from any apprehensions that he would escape, or from any necessity that was yet apparent, of his being unable to endure the torture with his limbs free but from an ingenious design of making him feel his helplessness and of gradually sapping his resolution, by undermining it, as it might be, little by little. Deerslayer offered no resistance. He submitted his arms and his legs, freely if not cheerfully, to the ligaments of bark which were bound around them, by order of the chief, in a way to produce as little pain as possible. These directions were secret, and given in a hope that the captive would finally save himself from any serious bodily suffering, by consenting to take the Sumach for a wife. As soon as the body of Deerslayer was withed in bark sufficiently to create a lively sense of helplessness, he was literally carried to a young tree and bound against it, in a way that effectually prevented him from moving, as well as from falling. The hands were laid flat against the legs, and thongs were passed over all, in a way nearly to incorporate the prisoner with the tree. His cap was then removed, and he was left half-standing, half-sustained by his bonds, to face the coming scene in the best manner he could.

Previously to proceeding to anything like extremities, it was the wish of Rivenoak to put his captive's resolution to the proof, by renewing the attempt at a compromise. This could be effected only in one manner, the acquiescence of the Sumach being indispensably necessary to a compromise of her right to be revenged. With this view, then, the woman was next desired to advance, and to look to her own interest, no agent being considered as efficient as the principal herself in this negotiation. The Indian females, when girls, are usually mild and submissive, with musical tones, pleasant voices, and merry laughs, but toil and suffering generally deprive them of most of these advantages by the time they have reached an age which the Sumach had long before passed. To render their voices harsh, it would seem to require active, malignant passions, though, when excited, their screams can rise to a sufficiently conspicuous degree of discordancy to assert their claim to possess this distinctive peculiarity of the sex. The Sumach was not altogether without feminine attraction, however, and had so recently been deemed handsome in her tribe, as not to have yet learned the full influence that time and exposure produce on man as well as on woman. By an arrangement of Rivenoak's, some of the women around her had been employing the time in endeavoring to persuade the bereaved widow that there was still a hope Deerslayer might be prevailed on to enter her wigwam, in preference to entering the world of spirits, and this, too, with a success that previous symptoms scarcely justified. All this was the result of a resolution on the part of the chief to leave no proper means unemployed, in order to get the greatest hunter that was then thought to exist in all that region transferred to his own nation, as well as a husband for a woman who he felt would be likely to be troublesome, were any of her claims to the attention and care of the tribe overlooked.

In conformity with this scheme the Sumach had been secretly advised to advance into the circle, and to make her appeal to the prisoner's sense of justice before the band had recourse to the last experiment. The woman, nothing loth, consented, for there was some such attraction, in becoming the wife of a noted hunter, among the females of the tribes, as is experienced by the sex in more refined life, when they bestow their hands on the affluent. As the duties of a mother were thought to be paramount to all other considerations, the widow felt none of that embarrassment in preferring her claims, to which even a female fortune-hunter among ourselves might be liable. When she stood forth before the whole party, therefore, the children that she led by the hand fully justified all she did.

'You see me before you, cruel pale-face,' the woman commenced, 'your spirit must tell you my errand. I have found you, I cannot find le Loup Cervier, nor the Panther. I have looked for them in the lake, in the woods, in the clouds. I cannot say where they have gone.'

'No man knows, good Sumach, no man knows,' interposed the captive. 'When the spirit leaves the body it passes into a world beyond our knowledge, and the wisest way for them that are left behind is to hope for the best. No doubt both your warriors have gone to the happy hunting-grounds, and at the proper time you will see 'em ag'in in their improved state. The wife and sister of braves must have looked forward to some such termination of their 'arthly careers.'

'Cruel pale-face, what had my warriors done that you should slay them? They were the best hunters and the boldest young men of their tribe; the Great Spirit intended that they should live until they withered like the branches of the hemlock, and fell of their own weight.'

'Nay, nay, good Sumach,' interrupted the Deerslayer, whose love of truth was too indomitable to listen to such hyperbole with patience, even though it came from the torn breast of a widow.—'Nay, nay, good Sumach, this is a little out-doing red-skin privileges. Young man was neither, any more than you can be called a young woman, and as to the Great Spirit's intending that they should fall otherwise than they did, that's a grievous mistake, inasmuch as what the Great Spirit intends is sartin to come to pass. Then, ag'in, it's plain enough neither of your friends did me any harm. I raised my hand ag'in 'em on account of what they were striving to do, rather than what they did. This is nat'ral law, "to do, lest you should be done by".'

'It is so. Sumach has but one tongue, she can tell but one story. The pale-face struck the Hurons, lest the Hurons should strike him. The Hurons are a just nation, they will forget it. The chiefs will shut their eyes, and pretend not to have seen it. The young men will believe the Panther and the Lynx have gone to far-off hunts, and the Sumach will take her children by the hand, and go into the lodge of the pale-face, and say, "See, these are your children—they are also mine, feed us, and we will live with you".'

'The tarms are onadmissable, woman, and, though I feel for your losses, which must be hard to bear, the tarms cannot be accepted. As to givin' you ven'son, in case we lived near enough together, that would be no great expl'ite, but as for becomin' your husband, and the father of your children, to be honest with you, I feel no callin' that-a-way.'

'Look at this boy, cruel pale-face, he has no father to teach him to kill the deer, or to take scalps. See this girl, what young man will come to look for a wife in a lodge that has no head? There are more among my people in the Canadas, and the Killer of Deer will find as many mouths to feed as his heart can wish for '

'I tell you, woman,' exclaimed Deerslayer, whose imagination was far from seconding the appeal of the widow, and who began to grow restive under the vivid pictures she was drawing, 'all this is nothing to me. People and kindred must take care of their own fatherless, leaving them that have no children to their own loneliness. As for me, I have no offspring, and I want no wife. Now, go away, Sumach, leave me in the hands of your chiefs, for my color, and gifts, and nature itself, cry out against the idea of taking you for a wife.'

It is unnecessary to expatiate on the effect of this down-right refusal of the woman's proposals. If there was anything like tenderness in her bosom,—and no woman was, probably, ever entirely without that feminine quality,—it all disappeared at this plain announcement. Fury, rage, mortified pride, and a volcano of wrath, burst out at one explosion, converting her into a sort of maniac, as it might be at the touch of a magician's wand. Without deigning a reply in words, she made the arches of the forest ring with screams, and then flew forward at her victim, seizing him by the hair, which she appeared resolute to draw out by the roots. It was some time before her grasp could be loosened. Fortunately for the prisoner, her rage was blind, since his total helplessness left him entirely at her mercy, had it been better directed it might have proved fatal before any relief could have been offered. As it was, she did succeed in wrenching out two or three handfuls of hair, before the young men could tear her away from her victim.

The insult that had been offered to the Sumach was deemed an insult to the whole tribe, not so much, however, on account of any respect that was felt for the woman, as on account of the honor of the Huron nation. Sumach, herself, was generally considered to be as acid as the berry from which she derived her name, and now that her great supporters, her husband and brother, were both gone, few cared about concealing their aversion. Nevertheless, it had become a point of honor to punish the pale-face who disdained a Huron woman, and more particularly one who coolly preferred death to relieving the tribe from the support of a widow and her children. The young men showed an impatience to begin to torture, that Rivenoak understood, and as his elder associates manifested no disposition to permit any longer delay, he was compelled to give the signal for the infernal work to proceed.

*'The ugly bear now mudded not the stake, Nor how the cruel mastiffs do him tear,
The stag lay still, unroused from the brake,
The foamy boar feared not the hunter's spear.
All thing was still in desert, bush, and briar.'*

LORD DORSET.

It was one of the common expedients of the savages, on such occasions, to put the nerves of their victims to the severest proofs. On the other hand, it was a matter of Indian pride to betray no yielding to terror or pain, but for the prisoner to provoke his enemies to such acts of violence as would soonest produce death. Many a warrior had been known to bring his own sufferings to a more speedy termination, by taunting reproaches and reviling language, when he found that his physical system was giving way under the agony of sufferings, produced by a hellish ingenuity, that might well eclipse all that has been said of the infernal devices of religious persecution. This happy expedient of taking refuge from the ferocity of his foes in their passions was denied Deerslayer, however, by his peculiar notions of the duty of a white man, and he had stoutly made up his mind to endure everything, in preference to disgracing his color.

No sooner did the young men understand that they were at liberty to commence, than some of the boldest and most forward among them sprang into the arena, tomahawk in hand. Here they prepared to throw that dangerous weapon, the object being to strike the tree as near as possible to the victim's head, without absolutely hitting him. This was so hazardous an experiment, that none but those who were known to be exceedingly expert with the weapon were allowed to enter the lists at all, lest an early death might interfere with the expected entertainment. In the truest hands, it was seldom that the captive escaped injury in these trials, and it often happened that death followed, even when the blow was not premeditated. In the particular case of our hero, Rivenoak and the older warriors were apprehensive that the example of the Panther's fate might prove a motive with some fiery spirit, suddenly to sacrifice his conqueror, when the temptation of effecting it in precisely the same manner, and possibly with the identical weapon with which the warrior had fallen, offered. This circumstance, of itself, rendered the ordeal of the tomahawk doubly critical for the Deerslayer

It would seem, however, that all who now entered what we shall call the lists, were more disposed to exhibit their own dexterity, than to resent the deaths of their comrades. Each prepared himself for the trial, with the feelings of rivalry rather than with the desire for vengeance, and for the first few minutes, the prisoner had little more connection with the result, than grew out of the interest that necessarily attached itself to a living target. The young men were eager, instead of being fierce, and Rivenoak thought he still saw signs of being able to save the life of the captive, when the vanity of the young men had been gratified, always admitting that it was not sacrificed to the delicate experiments that were about to be made

The first youth who presented himself for the trial, was called the Raven, having as yet had no opportunity of obtaining a more warlike sobriquet. He was remarkable for high pretension, rather than for skill or exploits, and those who knew his character thought the captive in imminent danger, when he took his stand, and poised the tomahawk. Nevertheless, the young man was good-natured, and no thought was uppermost in his mind other than the desire to make a better cast, than any of his fellows. Deerslayer got an inkling of this warrior's want of reputation, by the injunctions that he had received from the seniors, who, indeed, would have objected to his appearing in the arena at all, but for an influence derived from his father, an aged warrior of great merit who was then in the lodges of the tribe. Still, our hero maintained an appearance of self-possession. He had made up his mind that his hour was come, and it would have been a mercy, instead of a calamity, to fall by the unsteadiness of the first hand that was raised against him. After a suitable number of flourishes and gesticulations, that promised much more than he could perform, the Raven let the tomahawk quit his hand. The weapon whirled through the air, with the usual evolutions, cut a chip from the sapling to which the prisoner was bound, within a few inches of his cheek, and stuck in a large oak that grew several yards behind him. This was decidedly a bad effort, and a common sneer proclaimed as much, to the great mortification of the young man. On the other hand, there was a general, but suppressed murmur of admiration at the steadiness with which the captive stood the trial. The head was the only part he could move, and this had been purposely left free, that the tormentors might have the amusement, and the tormented endure the shame, of dodging, and otherwise attempting to avoid the blows. Deerslayer disappointed these hopes, by a command of nerve that rendered his whole body as immovable as the tree to which it was bound. Nor did he even adopt the natural and usual expedient of shutting his eyes, the firmest and oldest warrior of the red-men never having more disdainfully denied himself this advantage, under similar circumstances

The Raven had no sooner made his unsuccessful and puerile effort, than he was succeeded by le Daim-Mose, or the Moose, a middle-aged warrior, who was particularly skilful in the use of the tomahawk, and from whose attempt the spectators confidently looked for gratification. This man had none of the good-nature of the Raven, but he would gladly have sacrificed the captive to his hatred of the pale-faces generally, were it not for the greater interest he felt in his own success as one particularly skilful in the use of this weapon. He took his stand quietly, but with an air of confidence, poised his little axe but a single instant, advanced a foot with a quick motion, and threw. Deerslayer saw the keen instrument whirling towards him, and believed all was over, still he was not touched. The tomahawk had actually bound the head of the captive to the tree, by carrying before it some of his hair.

having buried itself deep beneath the soft bark. A general yell expressed the delight of the spectators, and the Moose felt his heart soften a little towards the prisoner, whose steadiness of nerve alone enabled him to give this evidence of his consummate skill

Le Daim-Mose was succeeded by the Bounding Boy, or le Garçon qui Bondi, who came leaping into the circle like a hound, or a goat at play. This was one of those elastic youths whose muscles seemed always in motion, and who either affected, or who from habit was actually unable to move in any other manner, than by showing the antics just mentioned. Nevertheless he was both brave and skilful, and had gained the respect of his people by deeds in war as well as success in the hunts. A far nobler name would long since have fallen to his share, had not a Frenchman of rank inadvertently given him this sobriquet, which he religiously preserved as coming from his great father, who lived beyond the wide salt lake. The Bounding Boy skipped about in front of the captive, menacing him with his tomahawk, now on one side and now on another, and then again in front, in the vain hope of being able to extort some sign of fear by this parade of danger. At length Deerslayer's patience became exhausted by all this mummery, and he spoke for the first time since the trial had actually commenced

'Throw away, Huron!' he cried, 'or your tomahawk will forget its ar'n'd. Why do you keep loping about like a fa'a'n that's showing its dam how well it can skip, when you're a warrior grown yourself, and a warrior grown defies you and all your silly antics? Throw, or the Huron gals will laugh in your face.'

Although not intended to produce such an effect, the last words aroused the 'Bounding' warrior to fury. The same nervous excitability which rendered him so active in his person, made it difficult to repress his feelings, and the words were scarcely past the lips of the speaker than the tomahawk left the hand of the Indian. Nor was it cast without good-will, and a fierce determination to slay. Had the intention been less deadly, the danger might have been greater. The aim was uncertain, and the weapon glanced near the cheek of the captive, slightly cutting the shoulder in its evolutions. This was the first instance in which any other object, than that of terrifying the prisoner, and of displaying skill had been manifested, and the Bounding Boy was immediately led from the arena, and was warmly rebuked for his intemperate haste, which had come so near defeating all the hopes of the band.

To this irritable person succeeded several other young warriors, who not only hurled the tomahawk but who cast the knife, a far more dangerous experiment, with reckless indifference, yet they always manifested a skill that prevented any injury to the captive. Several times Deerslayer was grazed, but in no instance did he receive what might be termed a wound. The unflinching firmness with which he faced his assailants, more especially in the sort of rally with which this trial terminated, excited a profound respect in the spectators, and when the chiefs announced that the prisoner had well withstood the trials of the knife and the tomahawk, there was not a single individual in the band who really felt any hostility towards him, with the exception of Sumach and the Bounding Boy. These two discontented spirits got together, it is true, feeding each other's ire, but, as yet, their malignant feelings were confined very much to themselves, though there existed the danger that the others, ere long, could not fail to be excited by their own efforts into that demoniacal state which usually accompanied all similar scenes among the red-men.

Rivenoak now told his people that the pale-face had proved himself to be a man. He might live with the Delawares, but he had not been made woman with that tribe. He wished to know whether it was the desire of the Hurons to proceed any further. Even the gentlest of the females, however, had received too much satisfaction in the late trials to forego their expectations of a gratifying exhibition, and there was but one voice in the request to proceed. The politic chief, who had some such desire to receive so celebrated a hunter into his tribe as a European minister has to desire a new and available means of taxation, sought every plausible means of arresting the trial in season, for he well knew, if permitted to go far enough to arouse the more ferocious passions of the tormentors, it would be as easy to dam the waters of the great lakes of his own region as to attempt to arrest them in their bloody career. He therefore called four or five of the best marksmen to him, and bid them put the captive to the proof of the rifle, while, at the same time, he cautioned them touching the necessity of their maintaining their own credit, by the closest attention to the manner of exhibiting their skill

When Deerslayer saw the chosen warriors step into the circle, with their arms prepared for service, he felt some such relief as the miserable sufferer, who has long endured the agonies of disease, feels at the certain approach of death. Any trifling variance in the aim of this formidable weapon would prove fatal, since, the head being the target, or rather the point it was desired to graze without injury, an inch or two of difference in the line of projection, must at once determine the question of life or death.

In the torture by the rifle there was none of the latitude permitted that appeared in the case of even Gesler's apple, a hair's-breadth being, in fact, the utmost limits that an expert marksman would allow himself on an occasion like this. Victims were frequently shot through the head by too eager or unskilful hands, and it often occurred that, exasperated by the fortitude and taunts of the prisoner, death was dealt intentionally in a moment of ungovernable irritation. All this Deerslayer well knew, for it was in relating the traditions of such scenes as well as of the battles and victories of their people, that the old men beguiled the long winter evenings in their cabins. He now fully expected the end of his career, and experienced a sort of melancholy pleasure in the idea that he was to fall by a weapon as much beloved as the rifle. A slight interruption, however, took place before the business was allowed to proceed.

Hetty Hutter witnessed all that passed, and the scene at first had pressed upon her feeble mind in a way to paralyze it entirely, but by this time she had rallied, and was growing indignant at the unmerited suffering the Indians were inflicting on her friend. Though timid, and shy as the young of the deer, on so many occasions, this right-feeling girl was always intrepid in the cause of humanity, the lessons of her mother, and the impulses of her own heart,—perhaps we might say the promptings of that unseen and pure spirit that seemed ever to watch over and direct her actions—uniting to keep down the apprehensions of woman, and to impel her to be bold and resolute. She now appeared in the circle, gentle, feminine, even bashful in mien, as usual, but earnest in her words and countenance, speaking like one who knew herself to be sustained by the high authority of God.

'Why do you torment Deerslayer, red-men?' she asked. 'What has he done that you trifle with his life, who has given you the right to be his judges? Suppose one of your knives or tomahawks had hit him, what Indian among you all could cure the wound you would make? Besides, in harming Deerslayer, you injure your own friend, when father and Hurry Harry came after your scalps, he refused to be of the party, and stayed in the canoe by himself. You are tormenting your friend in tormenting this young man!'

The Hurons listened with grave attention, and one among them, who understood English, translated what had been said into their native tongue. As soon as Rivenoak was made acquainted with the purport of her address, he answered it in his own dialect, the interpreter conveying it to the girl in English.

'My daughter is very welcome to speak,' said the stern old orator, using gentle intonations, and smiling as kindly as if addressing a child—'the Hurons are glad to hear her voice, they listen to what she says. The Great Spirit often speaks to men with such tongues. This time her eyes have not been open wide enough to see all that has happened. Deerslayer did not come for our scalps, that is true, why did he not come? Here they are, on our heads, the warlocks are ready to be taken hold of, a bold enemy ought to stretch out his hand to seize them. The Iroquois are too great a nation to punish men that take scalps. What they do themselves, they like to see others do. Let my daughter look around her, and count my warriors. Had I as many hands as four warriors, their fingers would be fewer than my people, when they came into your hunting-grounds. Now, a whole hand is missing. Where are the fingers? Two have been cut off by this pale-face; my Hurons wish to see if he did this by means of a stout heart, or by treachery, like a skulking fox, or like a leaping panther'

'You know yourself, Huron, how one of them fell. I saw it, and you all saw it, too. 'Twas too bloody to look at, but it was not Deerslayer's fault. Your warrior sought his life, and he defended himself. I don't know whether the good book says that it was right, but all men will do that. Come, if you want to know which of you can shoot best, give Deerslayer a rifle, and then you will find how much more expert he is than any of your warriors, yes, than all of them together!'

Could one have looked upon such a scene with indifference, he would have been amused at the gravity with which the savages listened to the translation of this unusual request. No taunt, no smile mingled with their surprise, for Hetty had a character and manner too saintly to subject her infirmity to the mockings of the rude and ferocious. On the contrary, she was answered with respectful attention.

'My daughter does not always talk like a chief at a council-fire,' returned Ravenoak, 'or she would not have said this. Two of my warriors have fallen by the blows of our prisoner, their grave is too small to hold a third. The Hurons do not like to crowd their dead. If there is another spirit about to set out for the far-off world, it must not be the spirit of a Huron, it must be the spirit of a pale-face. Go, daughter, and sit by Sumach, who is in grief, let the Huron warriors show how well they can shoot, let the pale-face show how little he cares for their bullets.'

Hetty's mind was unequal to a sustained discussion, and, accustomed to defer to the directions of her seniors, she did as told, seating herself passively on a log by the side of the Sumach, and averting her face from the painful scene that was occurring within the circle.

The warriors, as soon as this interruption had ceased, resumed their places, and again prepared to exhibit their skill, as there was a double object in view, that of putting the constancy of the captive to the proof, and that of showing how steady were the hands of the marksmen under circumstances of excitement. The distance was small, and, in one sense, safe. But in diminishing the distance taken by the tormentors, the trial to the nerves of the captive was essentially increased. The face of Deerslayer, indeed, was just removed sufficiently from the ends of the guns to escape the effects of the flash, and his steady eye was enabled to look directly into their muzzles, as it might be, in anticipation of the fatal messenger that was to issue from each. The cunning Hurons well knew this fact, and scarce one levelled his piece without first causing it to point as near as possible at the forehead of the prisoner, in the hope that his fortitude would fail him, and that the band would enjoy the triumph of seeing a victim quail under their ingenious cruelty. Nevertheless, each of the competitors was still careful not to injure, the disgrace of striking prematurely being second only to that of failing altogether in attaining the object. Shot after shot was made, all the bullets coming in close proximity to the Deerslayer's head, without touching it. Still no one could detect even the twitching of a muscle on the part of the captive, or the slightest winking of an eye. This indomitable resolution, which so much exceeded every thing of its kind that any present had before witnessed, might be referred to three distinct causes. The first was resignation to his fate, blended with natural steadiness of deportment, for our hero had calmly made up his mind that he must die, and preferred this mode to any other, the second was his great familiarity with this particular weapon, which deprived it of all the terror that is usually connected with the mere form of the danger, and the third was this familiarity carried out in practice, to a degree so nice as to enable the intended victim to tell, within an inch, the precise spot where each bullet must strike, for he calculated its range by looking in at the bore of the piece. So exact was Deerslayer's estimation of the line of fire, that his pride of feeling finally got the better of his resignation, and, when five or six had discharged their bullets into the tree, he could not refrain from expressing his contempt at their want of hand and eye.

'You may call this shooting, Mingos,' he exclaimed, 'but we've squaws among the Delawares, and I've known Dutch gals on the Mohawk, that could outdo your greatest indivors. Ondo these arms of mine, put a rifle in my hands, and I'll pun the thinnest warlock in your party to any tree you can show me, and this at a hundred yards, ay, or at two hundred, if the object can be seen, nineteen shots in twenty, or for that matter, twenty in twenty, if the piece is creditable and trusty!"

A low menacing murmur followed this cool taunt, the ire of the warriors kindled at listening to such a reproach from one who so far disdained their efforts as to refuse even to wink, when a rifle was discharged as near his face as could be done without burning it. Rivenoak perceived that the moment was critical, and still retaining his hope of adopting so noted a hunter into his tribe, the politic old chief interposed in time, probably, to prevent an immediate resort to that portion of the torture which must necessarily have produced death, through extreme bodily suffering, if in no other manner. Moving into the centre of the irritated group, he addressed them with his usual wily logic and plausible manner, at once suppressing the fierce movement that had commenced.

"I see how it is," he said. "We have been like the pale-faces when they fasten their doors at night, out of fear of the red-man. They use so many bars, that the fire comes and burns them before they can get out. We have bound the Deerslayer too tight, the thongs keep his limbs from shaking, and his eyes from shutting. Loosen him, let us see what his own body is really made of."

It is often the case, when we are thwarted in a cherished scheme, that any expedient, however unlikely to succeed, is gladly resorted to, in preference to a total abandonment of the project. So it was with the Hurons. The proposal of the chief found instant favor, and several hands were immediately at work, cutting and tearing the ropes of bark from the body of our hero. In half a minute, Deerslayer stood as free from bonds, as when, an hour before, he had commenced his flight on the side of the mountain. Some little time was necessary that he should recover the use of his limbs, the circulation of the blood having been checked by the tightness of the ligatures, and this was accorded to him by the politic Rivenoak, under the pretence that his body would be more likely to submit to apprehension, if its true tone were restored, though really with a view to give time to the fierce passions which had been awakened in the bosoms of his young men, to subside. This ruse succeeded, and Deerslayer, by rubbing his limbs, stamping his feet, and moving about, soon regained the circulation,—recovering all his physical powers, as effectually as if nothing had occurred to disturb them.

It is seldom men think of death in the pride of their health and strength. So it was with Deerslayer. Having been helplessly bound, and, as he had every reason to suppose, so lately on the very verge of the other world, to find himself so unexpectedly liberated, in possession of his strength, and with a full command of limb, acted on him like a sudden restoration to life, reanimating hopes that he had once absolutely abandoned. From that instant all his plans changed. In this, he simply obeyed a law of nature, for while we have wished to represent our hero as being resigned to his fate, it has been far from our intention to represent him as anxious to die. From the instant that his buoyancy of feeling revived, his thoughts were keenly bent on the various projects that presented themselves as modes of evading the designs of his enemies, and he again became the quick-witted, ingenious, and determined woodsman, alive to all his own powers and resources. The change was so great that his mind resumed its elasticity, and no longer thinking of submission, it dwelt only on the devices of the sort of warfare in which he was engaged.

As soon as Deerslayer was released, the band divided itself in a circle around him, in order to hedge him in, and the desire to break down his spirit grew in them, precisely as they saw proofs of the difficulty there would be in subduing it. The honor of the band was now involved in the issue, and even the sex lost all its sympathy with suffering, in the desire to save the reputation of the tribe. The voices of the girls, soft and melodious as nature had made them, were heard mingling with the menaces of the men, and the wrongs of Sumach suddenly assumed the character of injuries inflicted on every Huron female. Yielding to this rising tumult, the men drew back a little, signifying to the females that they left the captive for a time in their hands, it being a common practice, on such occasions, for the women to endeavor to throw the victim into a rage by their taunts and revilings, and then to turn him suddenly over to the men in a state of mind that was little favorable to resisting the agony of bodily suffering. Nor was this party without the proper instruments for effecting such a purpose. Sumach had a notoriety as a scold, and one or two crones, like the She Bear, had come out with the party, most probably as the conservators of its decency and moral discipline, such things occurring in savage as well as civilized life. It is unnecessary to repeat all that ferocity and ignorance could invent for such a purpose, the only difference between this outburst of feminine anger, and a similar scene among ourselves, consisting in the figures of speech and the epithets, the Huron women calling their prisoner by the names of the lower and least respected animals that were known to themselves.

But Deerslayer's mind was too much occupied to permit him to be disturbed by the abuse of excited hags, and their rage necessarily increasing with his indifference, as his indifference increased with their rage, the furies soon rendered themselves impotent by their own excesses. Perceiving that the attempt was a complete failure, the warriors interfered to put a stop to this scene, and thus so much the more, because preparations were now seriously making for the commencement of the real tortures, or that which would put the fortitude of the sufferer to the test of severe bodily pain. A sudden and unlooked-for announcement, that proceeded from one of the look-outs, a boy of ten or twelve years old, however, put a momentary check to the whole proceedings. As this interruption has a close connection with the denouement of our story, it shall be given in a separate chapter.

*'So deem'st thou—so each mortal deems
Of that which is from that which seems,
But other harvest here
Than that which peasant's scythe demands, Was gathered in by sterner hands,
With bayonet, blade, and spear.'*

SCOTT

It exceeded Deerslayer's power to ascertain what had produced the sudden pause in the movements of his enemies, until the fact was revealed in the due course of events. He perceived that much agitation prevailed among the women in particular, while the warriors rested on their arms, in a sort of dignified expectation. It was plain no alarm was excited, though it was not equally apparent that a friendly occurrence produced the delay. Rivenoak was evidently apprised of all, and by a gesture of his arm he appeared to direct the circle to remain unbroken, and for each person to await the issue in the situation he, or she, then occupied. It required but a minute or two to bring an explanation of this singular and mysterious pause, which was soon terminated by the appearance of Judith, on the exterior of the line of bodies, and her ready admission within its circle.

If Deerslayer was startled by this unexpected arrival, well knowing that the quick-witted girl could claim none of that exemption from the penalties of captivity, that was so cheerfully accorded to her feeble-minded sister, he was equally astonished at the guise in which she came. All her ordinary forest attire, neat and becoming as this usually was, had been laid aside for the brocade, that has been already mentioned, and which had once before wrought so great and magical an effect in her appearance. Nor was this all. Accustomed to see the ladies of the garrison, in the formal, gala attire of the day, and familiar with the more critical niceties of these matters, the girl had managed to complete her dress, in a way to leave nothing strikingly defective in its details, or even to betray an incongruity that would have been detected by one practised in the mysteries of the toilet. Head, feet, arms, hands, bust, and drapery, were all in harmony, as female attire was then deemed attractive and harmonious, and the end she aimed at, that of imposing on the uninstructed senses of the savages, by causing them to believe their guest was a woman of rank and importance, might well have succeeded with those whose habits had taught them to discriminate between persons. Judith, in addition to her rare native beauty, had a singular grace of person, and her mother had imparted enough of her own deportment, to prevent any striking or offensive vulgarity of manner, so that, sooth to say, the gorgeous dress might have been worse bestowed in nearly every particular. Had it been displayed in a capital, a thousand might have worn it, before one could have been found to do more credit to its gay colors, glossy satins, and rich laces, than the beautiful creature whose person it now aided to adorn.

The effect of such an apparition had not been miscalculated. The instant Judith found herself within the circle, she was, in a degree, compensated for the fearful personal risk she ran, by the unequivocal sensation of surprise and admiration produced by her appearance. The grim old warriors uttered their favorite exclamation, 'Hugh!' The younger men were still more sensibly overcome, and even the women were not backward in letting open manifestations of pleasure escape them. It was seldom that these untutored children of the forest had ever seen any white female above the commonest sort, and, as to dress, never before had so much splendor shone before their eyes. The gayest uniforms of both French and English seemed dull, compared with the lustre of the brocade, and while the rare personal beauty of the wearer added to the effect produced by its hues, the attire did not fail to adorn that beauty in a way which surpassed even the hopes of its wearer. Deerslayer himself was astounded, and this quite as much by the brilliant picture the girl presented, as at the indifference to consequences with which she had braved the danger of the step she had taken. Under such circumstances, all waited for the visitor to explain her object, which to most of the spectators seemed as inexplicable as her appearance.

'Which of these warriors is the principal chief?' demanded Judith of Deerslayer, as soon as she found it was expected that she should open the communication, 'my errand is too important to be delivered to any of inferior rank. First explain to the Hurons what I say, then give an answer to the question I have put.'

Deerslayer quietly complied, his auditors greedily listening to the interpretation of the first words that fell from so extraordinary a vision. The demand seemed perfectly in character for one who had every appearance of an exalted rank herself. Rivenoak gave an appropriate reply, by presenting himself before his fair visitor in a way to leave no doubt that he was entitled to all the consideration he claimed.

'I can believe this, Huron,' resumed Judith, enacting her assumed part with a steadiness and dignity that did credit to her powers of imitation, for she strove to impart to her manner the condescending courtesy she had once observed in the wife of a general officer at a similar, though a more amicable scene. 'I can believe you to be the principal person of this party, I see in your countenance the marks of thought and reflection. To you, then, I must make my communication.'

'Let the Flower of the Woods speak,' returned the old chief, courteously, as soon as her address had been translated so that all might understand it. 'If her words are as pleasant as her looks, they will never quit my ears, I shall hear them long after the winter in Canada has killed the flowers, and frozen all the speeches of summer.'

This admiration was grateful to one constituted like Judith, and it contributed to aid her self-possession, quite as much as it fed her vanity. Smiling involuntarily, or in spite of her wish to seem reserved, she proceeded in her plot.

'Now, Huron,' she continued, 'listen to my words. Your eyes tell you that I am no common woman. I will not say I am the queen of this country, she is afar off, in a distant land, but under our gracious monarchs there are many degrees of rank; one of these I fill. What that rank is precisely, it is unnecessary for me to say, since you would not understand it. For that information you must trust your eyes. You see what I am, you must feel that in listening to my words, you listen to one who can be your friend or your enemy, as you treat her.'

This was well uttered, with a due attention to manner and a steadiness of tone that was really surprising, considering all the circumstances of the case. It was well, though simply rendered into the Indian dialect, too, and it was received with a respect and gravity that augured favorably for the girl's success. But Indian thought is not easily traced to its sources. Judith waited with anxiety to hear the answer, filled with hope even while she doubted. Rivenoak was a ready speaker, and he answered as promptly as comported with the notions of Indian decorum, that peculiar people seeming to think a short delay respectful, inasmuch as it manifests that the words already heard have been duly weighed

'My daughter is handsomer than the wild roses of Ontario, her voice is pleasant to the ear as the song of the wren,' answered the cautious and wily chief, who of all the band stood alone in not being fully imposed on by the magnificent and unusual appearance of Judith, but who distrusted even while he wondered 'the humming bird is not much larger than the bee, yet its feathers are as gay as the tail of the peacock. The Great Spirit sometimes puts very bright clothes on very little animals. Still, He covers the moose with coarse hair. These things are beyond the understanding of poor Indians, who can only comprehend what they see and hear. No doubt my daughter has a very large wigwam, somewhere about the lake, the Hurons have not found it, on account of their ignorance.'

'I have told you, chief, that it would be useless to state my rank and residence, inasmuch as you would not comprehend them. You must trust to your eyes for this knowledge, what red-man is there that cannot see? This blanket that I wear is not the blanket of a common squaw, these ornaments are such as the wives and daughters of chiefs only appear in. Now, listen and hear why I have come alone among your people, and hearken to the errand that has brought me here. The Yengeese have young men as well as the Hurons, and plenty of them, too, this you well know.'

'The Yengeese are as plenty as the leaves on the trees! This every Huron knows and feels.'

'I understand you, chief. Had I brought a party with me, it might have caused trouble. My young men and your young men would have looked angrily at each other, especially had my young men seen that pale-face bound for the tortures. He is a great hunter, and is much loved by all the garrisons, far and near. There would have been blows about him, and the trail of the Iroquois back to the Canadas would have been marked with blood.'

'There is so much blood on it now,' returned the chief, gloomily, 'that it blinds our eyes. My young men see that it is all Huron.'

'No doubt, and more Huron blood would be spilt, had I come surrounded with pale-faces. I have heard of Rivenoak, and have thought it would be better to send him back in peace to his village, that he might leave his women and children behind him; if he then wished to come for our scalps, we would meet him. He loves animals made of ivory, and little rifles. See, I have brought some with me to show him. I am his friend. When he has packed up these things among his goods, he will start for his village, before any of my young men can overtake him; and then he will show his people in Canada what riches they can come to seek, now that our great fathers, across the salt lake, have sent each other the war-hatchet. I will lead back with me this great hunter, of whom I have need to keep my house in venison.'

Judith, who was sufficiently familiar with Indian phraseology, endeavored to express her ideas in the sententious manner common to those people, and she succeeded even beyond her own expectations. Deer-slayer did her full justice in the translation, and this so much the more readily, since the girl carefully abstained from uttering any direct untruth, a homage she paid to the young man's known aversion to falsehood, which he deemed a meanness altogether unworthy of a white man's gifts. The offering of the two remaining elephants, and of the pistols already mentioned, one of which was all the worse for the recent accident, produced a lively sensation among the Hurons generally, though Rivenoak received it coldly, notwithstanding the delight with which he had first discovered the probable existence of a creature with two tails. In a word, this cool and sagacious savage was not so easily imposed on as his followers, and with a sentiment of honor, that half the civilized world would have deemed supererogatory, he declined the acceptance of a bribe that he felt no disposition to earn by a compliance with the donor's wishes.

'Let my daughter keep her two-tailed hog to eat when venison is scarce,' he drily answered, 'and the little gun, which has two muzzles. The Hurons will kill deer when they are hungry, and they have long rifles to fight with. This hunter cannot quit my young men now, they wish to know if he is as stout-hearted as he boasts himself to be.'

'That I deny, Huron,' interrupted Deerslayer, with warmth, 'yes, that I downright deny, as ag'in truth and reason. No man has heard me boast, and no man shall, though ye flay me alive, and then roast the quivering flesh, with your own infarnal devices and cruelties! I may be humble, and misfortunate, and your prisoner, but I'm no boaster, by my very gifts.'

'My young pale-face boasts he is no boaster,' returned the crafty chief, 'he must be right. I hear a strange bird singing. It has very rich feathers. No Huron ever before saw such feathers. They will be ashamed to go back to their village, and tell their people that they let their prisoner go on account of the song of this strange bird, and not be able to give the name of the bird. They do not know how to say whether it is a wren or a cat-bird. This would be a great disgrace, my young men would not be allowed to travel in the woods, without taking their mothers with them to tell them the names of the birds.'

'You can ask my name of your prisoner,' returned the girl. 'It is Judith, and there is a great deal of the history of Judith in the pale-face's best book, the Bible. If I am a bird of fine feathers, I have also my name.'

'No,' answered the wily Huron, betraying the artifice he had so long practised, by speaking in English, with tolerable accuracy, 'I not ask prisoner. He tired, he want rest. I ask my daughter, with feeble-mind. She speak truth. Come here, daughter, you answer. Your name, Hetty?'

'Yes, that's what they call me,' returned the girl, 'though it's written Esther, in the Bible.'

'He write him in Bible, too? All write in Bible. No matter—what her name?' 40

'That's Judith, and it's so written in the Bible, though father sometimes called her Jude. That's my sister Judith, Thomas Hutter's daughter—Thomas Hutter, whom you called the Muskrat, though he was no muskrat, but a man, like yourselves—he lived in a house on the water, and that was enough for you!'

A smile of triumph gleamed on the hard-wrinkled countenance of the chief, when he found how completely his appeal to the truth-loving Hetty had succeeded. As for Judith herself, the moment her sister was questioned, she saw that all was lost, for no sign, or even entreaty, could have induced the right-feeling girl to utter a falsehood. To attempt to impose a daughter of the Muskrat on the savages, as a princess or a great lady, she knew would be idle, and she saw her bold and ingenious expedient for liberating the captive fail, through one of the simplest and most natural causes that could be imagined. She turned her eye on Deerslayer, therefore, as if imploring him to interfere, to save them both.

'It will not do, Judith,' said the young man, in answer to this appeal, which he understood, though he saw its uselessness, 'it will not do. 'Twas a bold idee, and fit for a general's lady, but yonder Mingo—' Rivenoak had withdrawn to a little distance, and was out of ear-shot—'but yonder Mingo is an uncommon man, and not to be deceived by any unnat'ral sarcumventions. Things must come afore him in their right order to draw a cloud afore his eyes! 'Twas too much to attempt making him fancy that a queen or a great lady lived in these mountains, and no doubt he thinks the fine clothes you wear are some of the plunder of your own father—or, at least, of him who once passed for your father, as quite likely it was, if all they say is true.'

'At all events, Deerslayer, my presence here will save you for a time. They will hardly attempt torturing you before my face!'

'Why not, Judith? Do you think they will treat a woman of the pale-faces more tenderly than they treat their own? It's true that your sex will most likely save you from the torments, but it will not save your liberty, and may not save your scalp. I wish you hadn't come, my good Judith, it can do no good to me, while it may do great harm to yourself.'

'I can share your fate,' the girl answered, with generous enthusiasm. 'They shall not injure you while I stand by, if in my power to prevent it—besides—'

'Besides what, Judith? What means have you to stop Injin cruelty, or to avert Injin deviltries?'

'None, perhaps, Deerslayer,' answered the girl, with firmness, 'but I can suffer with my friends—die with them if necessary.'

'Ah! Judith—suffer you may, but die you will not until the Lord's time shall come.'

It's little likely that one of your sex and beauty will meet with a harder fate than to become the wife of a chief, if indeed your white inclinations can stoop to match with an Injun 'Twould have been better had you stayed in the ark, or the castle—but what has been done, is done. You was about to say something, when you stopped at "besides"?'

'It might not be safe to mention it here, Deerslayer,' the girl hurriedly answered, moving past him carelessly, that she might speak in a low tone, 'half an hour is all in all to us. None of your friends are idle.'

The hunter replied merely by a grateful look. Then he turned towards his enemies, as if ready again to face the torments. A short consultation had passed among the elders of the band, and by this time they also were prepared with their decision. The merciful purpose of Rivenoak had been much weakened by the artifice of Judith, which, failing of its real object, was likely to produce results the very opposite of those she had anticipated. This was natural, the feeling being aided by the resentment of an Indian, who found how near he had been to becoming the dupe of an inexperienced girl. By this time Judith's real character was fully understood—the widespread reputation of her beauty contributed to the exposure. As for the unusual attire, it was confounded with the profound mystery of the animals with two tails, and, for the moment, lost its influence.

When Rivenoak, therefore, faced the captive again, it was with an altered countenance. He had abandoned the wish of saving him, and was no longer disposed to retard the more serious part of the torture. This change of sentiment was, in effect, communicated to the young men, who were already eagerly engaged in making their preparations for the contemplated scene. Fragments of dried wood were rapidly collected near the sapling—the splinters which it was intended to thrust into the flesh of the victim, previously to lighting, were all collected, and the thongs were already produced that were again to bind him to the tree. All this was done in profound silence, Judith watching every movement with breathless expectation, while Deerslayer himself stood seemingly as unmoved as one of the pines of the hills. When the warriors advanced to bind him, however, the young man glanced at Judith, as if to inquire whether resistance or submission were most advisable. By a significant gesture she counselled the last, and, in a minute, he was once more fastened to the tree, a helpless object of any insult or wrong that might be offered. So eagerly did every one now act, that nothing was said. The fire was immediately lighted in the pile, and the end of all was anxiously expected.

It was not the intention of the Hurons absolutely to destroy the life of their victim by means of fire. They designed merely to put his physical fortitude to the severest proofs it could endure short of that extremity. In the end, they fully intended to carry his scalp with them into their village, but it was their wish first to break down his resolution, and to reduce him to the level of a complaining sufferer. With this view, the pile of brush and branches had been placed at a proper distance, or one at which it was thought the heat would soon become intolerable, though it might not be immediately dangerous. As often happened, however, on these occasions, this distance had been miscalculated, and the flames began to wave their forked tongues in a proximity to the face of the victim that would have proved fatal in another instant, had not Hetty rushed through the crowd, armed with a stick, and scattered the blazing pile in a dozen directions. More than one hand was raised to strike the presumptuous intruder to the earth, but the chiefs prevented the blows, by reminding their irritated followers of the state of her mind. Hetty, herself, was insensible to the risk she ran, but, as soon as she had performed this bold act, she stood looking about her in frowning resentment, as if to rebuke the crowd of attentive savages for their cruelty.

'God bless you, dearest sister, for that brave and ready act!' murmured Judith, herself unnerved so much as to be incapable of exertion, 'Heaven itself has sent you on its holy errand.'

''Twas well-meant, Judith,' rejoined the victim, 'twas excellently meant, and 'twas timely, though it may prove untimely in the end! What is to come to pass must come to pass soon, or 'twill quickly be too late. Had

I drawn in one mouthful of that flame in breathing, the power of man couldn't save my life, and you see that this time they've so bound my forehead as not to leave my head the smallest chance 'Twas well meant, but it might have been more marci-ful to let the flames act their part'

'Cruel, heartless Hurons!' exclaimed the still indignant Hetty, 'would you burn a man and a Christian, as you would burn a log of wood! Do you never read your Bibles? or do you think God will forget such things?'

A gesture from Rivenoak caused the scattered brands to be collected, fresh wood was brought, even the women and children busying themselves eagerly in the gathering of dried sticks. The flame was just kindling a second time, when an Indian female pushed through the circle, advanced to the heap, and with her foot dashed aside the lighted twigs in time to prevent the conflagration. A yell followed this second disappointment, but when the offender turned towards the circle, and presented the countenance of Hist, it was suc-ceeded by a common exclamation of pleasure and surprise. For a minute all thought of pursuing the business in hand was forgotten, and young and old crowded around the girl, in haste, to demand an explanation of her sudden and unlooked-for return. It was at this critical instant that Hist spoke to Judith in a low voice, placed some small object, unseen, in her hand, and then turned to meet the salutations of the Huron girls, with whom she was personally a great favorite. Judith recovered her self-possession and acted promptly. The small, keen-edged knife, that Hist had given to the other, was passed by the latter into the hands of Hetty, as the safest and least-suspected medium of transferring it to Deerslayer. But the feeble intellect of the last defeated the well-grounded hopes of all three. Instead of first cutting loose the hands of the victim, and then concealing the knife in his clothes, in readiness for action at the most available instant, she went to work herself, with earnestness and simplicity, to cut the thongs that bound his head, that he might not again be in danger of inhaling flames. Of course this deliberate procedure was seen, and the hands of Hetty were arrested ere she had more than liberated the upper portion of the captive's body, not including his arms, below the elbows. This discovery at once pointed distrust towards Hist, and, to Judith's surprise, when questioned on the subject, that spirited girl was not disposed to deny her agency in what had passed.

'Why should I not help the Deerslayer?' the girl demanded, in the tones of a firm-minded woman. 'He is the brother of a Delaware chief, my heart is all Delaware.
Come forth, miserable Briarthorn, and wash the Iroquois paint from your face, stand before the Hurons, the crow that you are, you would eat the carrion of your own dead rather than starve. Put him face to face with Deerslayer, chiefs and warriors, I will show you how great a knave you have been keeping in your tribe.'

This bold language, uttered in their own dialect, and with a manner full of confidence, produced a deep sensation among the Hurons. Treachery is always liable to distrust, and though the recreant Briarthorn had endeavored to serve the enemy well, his exertions and assiduities had gained for him little more than toleration.
His wish to obtain Hist for a wife had first induced him to betray her and his own people, but serious rivals to his first project had risen up among his new friends, weakening still more their sympathies with treason. In a word, Briarthorn had been barely permitted to remain in the Huron encampment, where he was as closely and as jealously watched as Hist herself, seldom appearing before the chiefs, and sedulously keeping out of view of Deerslayer, who, until this moment, was ignorant even of his presence. Thus summoned, however, it was impossible to remain in the background. 'Wash the Iroquois paint from his face,' he did not, for when he stood in the centre of the circle, he was so disguised in these new colors, that, at first, the hunter did not recognize him. He assumed an air of defiance, notwithstanding, and haughtily demanded what any could say against 'Briarthorn.'

'Ask yourself that,' continued Hist, with spirit, though her manner grew less concentrated, and there was a slight air of abstraction that became observable to Deerslayer and Judith, if to no others. 'Ask that of your own heart, sneaking woodchuck of the Delawares, come not here with the face of an innocent man. Go look in the spring, see the colors of your enemies on your lying skin, and then come back and boast how you ran from your tribe, and took the blanket of the French for your covering! Paint yourself as bright as the humming-bird, you will still be black as the crow.'

Hist had been so uniformly gentle while living with the Hurons, that they now listened to her language with surprise. As for the delinquent, his blood boiled in his veins, and it was well for the pretty speaker that it was not in his power to execute the revenge he burned to inflict on her, in spite of his pretended love.

'Who wishes Briarthorn?' he sternly asked. 'If this pale-face is tired of life, if afraid of Indian torments, speak, Rivenoak, I will send him after the warriors we have lost.'

'No, chief, no, Rivenoak,' eagerly interrupted Hist. 'The Deerslayer fears nothing, least of all a crow! Unbind him—cut his withes—place him face to face with this cawing bird, then let us see which is tired of life.'

Hist made a forward movement, as if to take a knife from a young man, and perform the office she had mentioned, in person, but an aged warrior interposed, at a sign from Rivenoak. This chief watched all the girl did, with distrust, for, even while speaking in her most boastful language and in the steadiest manner, there was an air of uncertainty and expectation about her, that could not escape so close an observer. She acted well, but two or three of the old men were equally satisfied that it was merely acting. Her proposal to release Deerslayer, therefore, was rejected, and the disappointed Hist found herself driven back from the sapling at the very moment she fancied herself about to be successful. At the same time, the circle, which had got to be crowded and confused, was enlarged, and brought once more into order. Rivenoak now announced the intention of the old men again to proceed, the delay having been continued long enough, and leading to no result.

'Stop, Huron, stay, chiefs!' exclaimed Judith, scarce knowing what she said, or why she interposed, unless to obtain time, 'For God's sake, a single minute longer—'

The words were cut short by another and a still more extraordinary interruption. A young Indian came bounding through the Huron ranks, leaping into the very centre of the circle, in a way to denote the utmost confidence, or a temerity bordering on fool-hardiness. Five or six sentinels were still watching the lake at different and distant points, and it was the first impression of Rivenoak that one of these had come in with tidings of import. Still, the movements of the stranger were so rapid, and his war-dress, which scarcely left him more drapery than an antique statue, had so little distinguishing about it, that, at the first moment, it was impossible to ascertain whether he were friend or foe. Three leaps carried this warrior to the side of Deerslayer, whose withes were cut in the twinkling of an eye, with a quickness and precision that left the prisoner perfect master of his limbs. Not till this was effected, did the stranger bestow a glance on any other object, then he turned and showed the astonished Hurons the noble brow, fine person, and eagle eye of a young warrior, in the paint and panoply of a Delaware. He held a rifle in each hand, the butts of both resting on the earth, while from one dangled its proper pouch and horn. This was Kildeer, which, even as he looked boldly and in defiance on the crowd around him, he suffered to fall back into the hands of its proper owner. The presence of two armed men, though it was in their midst, startled the Hurons. Their rifles were scattered about against the different trees, and their only weapons were their knives and tomahawks. Still, they had too much self-possession to betray fear. It was little likely that so small a force would assail so strong a band, and each man expected some extraordinary proposition to succeed so decisive a step. The stranger did not seem disposed to disappoint them, he prepared to speak.

'Hurons,' he said, 'this earth is very big. The great lakes are big, too, there is room beyond them for the Iroquois, there is room for the Delawares on this side. I am Chingachgook, the son of Uncas, the kinsman of Tamenund. This is my betrothed, that pale-face is my friend. My heart was heavy when I missed him, I followed him to your camp to see that no harm happened to him All the Delaware girls are waiting for Wah, they wonder that she stays away so long Come, let us say farewell, and go on our path'

'Hurons, this is your mortal enemy, the Great Serpent of them you hate!' cried Briarthorn 'If he escape, blood will be in your moccasin prints from this spot to the Canadas I am all Huron!'

As the last words were uttered, the traitor cast his knife at the naked breast of the Delaware A quick movement of the arm on the part of Hist, who stood near, turned aside the blow, the dangerous weapon burying its point in a pine At the next instant, a similar weapon glanced from the hand of the Serpent, and quivered in the recreant's heart A minute had scarcely elapsed from the moment in which Chingachgook bounded into the circle, and that in which Briarthorn fell, like a log, dead in his tracks The rapidity of events prevented the Hurons from acting, but this catastrophe permitted no further delay A common exclamation followed, and the whole party was in motion At this instant, a sound unusual to the woods was heard, and every Huron, male and female, paused to listen, with ears erect and faces filled with expectation The sound was regular and heavy, as if the earth were struck with beetles Objects became visible among the trees of the back-ground, and a body of troops was seen advancing with measured tread They came upon the charge, the scarlet of the king's livery shining among the bright green foliage of the forest

The scene that followed is not easily described It was one in which wild confusion, despair, and frenzied efforts were so blended as to destroy the unity and distinctness of the action A general yell burst from the enclosed Hurons, it was succeeded by the hearty cheers of England

Still, not a musket or rifle was fired, though that steady, measured tramp continued, and the bayonet was seen gleaming in advance of a line that counted nearly sixty men The Hurons were taken at a fearful disadvantage On three sides was the water, while their formidable and trained foes cut them off from flight on the fourth Each warrior rushed for his arms, and then all on the point, man, woman, and child, eagerly sought the covers In this scene of confusion and dismay, however, nothing could surpass the discretion and coolness of Deerslayer His first care was to place Judith and Hist behind trees, and he looked for Hetty, but she had been hurried away in a crowd of Huron women This effected, he threw himself on a flank of the retiring Hurons, who were inclining off towards the southern margin of the point, in the hope of escaping through the water Deerslayer watched his opportunity, and finding two of his recent tormenters in a range, his rifle first broke the silence of the terrific scene The bullet brought down both at one discharge This drew a general fire from the Hurons, and the rifle and war-cry of the Serpent were heard in the clamor Still the trained men returned no answering volley, the whoop and piece of Hurry alone being heard on their side, if we except the short, prompt word of authority, and that heavy, measured, and menacing tread Presently, however, the shrieks, groans, and denunciations that usually accompany the use of the bayonet, followed That terrible and deadly weapon was glutted in vengeance The scene that succeeded was one of those, of which so many have occurred in our own times, in which neither age nor sex forms an exemption to the lot of a savage warfare

AUGUSTUS B. LONGSTREET

1790-1870

THE HORSE-SWAP

DURING the session of the Supreme Court, in the village of —, about three weeks ago, when a number of people were collected in the principal street of the village, I observed a young man riding up and down the street, as I supposed, in a violent passion He galloped this way, then that, and then the other, spurred his horse to one group of citizens, then to another, then dashed off at half speed, as if fleeing from danger, and, suddenly checking his horse, returned first in a pace, then in a trot, and then in a canter. While he was performing these various evolutions, he cursed, swore, whooped, screamed, and tossed himself in every attitude which man could assume on horseback. In short, he cavorted most magnanimously (a term which, in our tongue, expresses all that I have described, and a little more), and seemed to be setting all creation at defiance. As I like to see all that is passing, I determined to take a position a little nearer to him, and to ascertain, if possible, what it was that affected him so sensibly. Accordingly, I approached a crowd before which he had stopped for a moment, and examined it with the strictest scrutiny. But I could see nothing in it that seemed to have anything to do with the cavorter. Every man appeared to be in good humour, and all minding their own business. Not one so much as noticed the principal figure. Still he went on. After a semicolon pause, which my appearance seemed to produce (for he eyed me closely as I approached), he fetched a whoop, and swore that 'he could out-swap any live man, woman, or child that ever walked these hills, or that ever straddled horseflesh since the days of old daddy Adam. Stranger,' said he to me, 'did you ever see the Yellow Blossom from Jasper?'

'No,' said I, 'but I have often heard of him.'

'I'm the boy,' continued he, 'perhaps a leetle, jist a leetle, of the best man at a horse-swap that ever trod shoe-leather.'

I began to feel my situation a little awkward, when I was relieved by a man somewhat advanced in years, who stepped up and began to survey the Yellow Blossom's horse with much apparent interest. This drew the rider's attention, and he turned the conversation from me to the stranger.

'Well, my old coon,' said he, 'do you want to swap hosses?'

'Why, I don't know,' replied the stranger, 'I believe I've got a beast I'd trade with you for that one, if you like him.'

'Well, fetch up your nag, my old cock, you're jist the lark I wanted to get hold of. I am perhaps a leetle, jist a leetle, of the best man at a horse-swap that ever stole cracklins out of his mammy's fat gourd. Where's your hoss?'

'I'll bring him presently, but I want to examine your horse a little.'

'Oh! look at him,' said the Blossom, alighting and hitting him a cut—'look at him! He's the best piece of hossflesh in the thirteen united univarsal worlds. There's no sort o' mistake in little Bullet. He can pick up mules on his feet, and fling 'em behind him as fast as the next man's hoss, I don't care where he comes from. And he can keep at it as long as the sun can shine without resting.'

During this harangue, little Bullet looked as if he understood it all, believed it, and was ready at any moment to verify it. He was a horse of goodly countenance, rather expressive of vigilance than fire, though an unnatural appearance of fierceness was thrown into it by the loss of his ears, which had been cropped pretty close to his head. Nature had done but little for Bullet's head and neck, but he managed, in a great measure, to hide their defects by bowing perpetually. He had obviously suffered severely for corn, but if his ribs and hip bones had not disclosed the fact, he never would have done it, for he was in all respects as cheerful and happy as if he commanded all the corn-cribs and fodder-stacks in Georgia. His height was about twelve hands, but as his shape partook somewhat of that of the giraffe, his haunches stood much lower. They were short, strait, peaked, and concave. Bullet's tail, however, made amends for all his defects. All that the artist could do to beautify it had been done, and all that horse could do to compliment the artist, Bullet did. His tail was nicked in superior style, and exhibited the line of beauty in so many directions, that it could not fail to hit the most fastidious taste in some of them. From the root it dropped into a graceful festoon, then rose in a handsome curve, then resumed its first direction, and then mounted suddenly upward like a cypress knee to a perpendicular of about two and a half inches. The whole had a careless and bewitching inclination to the right. Bullet obviously knew where his beauty lay, and took all occasions to display it to the best advantage. If a stick cracked, or if any one moved suddenly about him, or coughed, or hawked, or spoke a little louder than common, up went Bullet's tail like lightning, and if the going up did not please, the coming down must of necessity, for it was as different from the other movement as was its direction. The first was a bold and rapid flight upward, usually to an angle of forty-five degrees. In this position he kept his interesting appendage until he satisfied himself that nothing in particular was to be done, when he commenced dropping it by half inches, in second beats, then in triple time, then faster and shorter, and faster and shorter still, until it finally died away imperceptibly into its natural position. If I might compare sights to sounds, I should say its settling was more like the note of a locust than anything else in nature.

Either from native sprightliness of disposition, from uncontrollable activity, or from an unconquerable habit of removing flies by the stamping of the feet, Bullet never stood still, but always kept up a gentle fly-scaring movement of his limbs, which was peculiarly interesting.

'I tell you, man,' proceeded the Yellow Blossom, 'he's the best live hoss that ever trod the grit of Georgia. Bob Smart knows the hoss. Come here, Bob, and mount this hoss, and show Bullet's motions.' Here Bullet bristled up, and looked as if he had been hunting for Bob all day long, and had just found him. Bob sprang on his back. 'Boo-oo-oo!' said Bob, with a fluttering noise of the lips, and away went Bullet, as if in a quarter race, with all his beauties spread in handsome style.

'Now fetch him back,' said Blossom. Bullet turned and came in pretty much as he went out.

'Now trot him by.' Bullet reduced his tail to 'customary', sidled to the right and left airily, and exhibited at least three varieties of trot in the short space of fifty yards.

'Make him pace!' Bob commenced twitching the bridle and kicking at the same time. These inconsistent movements obviously (and most naturally) disconcerted Bullet, for it was impossible for him to learn, from them, whether he was to proceed or stand still. He started to trot, and was told that wouldn't do. He attempted a canter, and was checked again. He stopped, and was urged to go on. Bullet now rushed into the wide field of experiment, and struck out a gait of his own, that completely turned the tables upon his rider, and certainly deserved a patent. It seemed to have derived its elements from the jig, the minuet, and the cotillon. If it was not a pace, it certainly had pace in it, and no man would venture to call it anything else, so it passed off to the satisfaction of the owner.

'Walk him!' Bullet was now at home again, and he walked as if money were staked on him.

The stranger, whose name I afterwards learned was Peter Ketch, having examined Bullet to his heart's content, ordered his son Neddy to go and bring up Kit. Neddy soon appeared upon Kit, a well-formed sorrel of the middle size, and in good order. His tout ensemble threw Bullet entirely in the shade, though a glance was sufficient to satisfy any one that Bullet had the decided advantage of him in point of intellect.

'Why, man,' said Blossom, 'do you bring such a hoss as that to trade for Bullet? Oh, I see, you've no notion of trading.'

'Ride him off, Neddy!' said Peter. Kit put off at a handsome lope.

'Trot him back!' Kit came in at a long, sweeping trot, and stopped suddenly at the crowd.

'Well,' said Blossom, 'let me look at him, maybe he'll do to plough.'

'Examine him!' said Peter, taking hold of the bridle close to the mouth, 'he's nothing but a tacky. He an't as pretty a horse as Bullet, I know, but he'll do. Start 'em together for a hundred and fifty mile, and if Kit an't twenty mile ahead of him at the coming out, any man may take Kit for nothing. But he's a monstrous mean horse, gentlemen, any man may see that. He's the scariest horse, too, you ever saw. He won't do to hunt on, no how. Stranger, will you let Neddy have your rifle to shoot off him? Lay the rifle between his ears, Neddy, and shoot at the blaze in that stump. Tell me when his head is high enough.'

Ned fired and hit the blaze, and Kit did not move a hair's breadth.

'Neddy, take a couple of sticks, and beat on that hog'shead at Kit's tail.'

Ned made a tremendous rattling, at which Bullet took fright, broke his bridle, and dashed off in grand style, and would have stopped all further negotiations by going home in disgust, had not a traveller arrested him and brought him back, but Kit did not move

'I tell you, gentlemen,' continued Peter, 'he's the scariest horse you ever saw. He an't as gentle as Bullet, but he won't do any harm if you watch him. Shall I put him in a cart, gig, or wagon for you, stranger? He'll cut the same capers there he does here. He's a monstrous mean horse.'

During all this time Blossom was examining him with the nicest scrutiny. Having examined his frame and limbs, he now looked at his eyes.

'He's got a curious look out of his eyes,' said Blossom.

'Oh yes, sir,' said Peter, 'just as blind as a bat. Blind horses always have clear eyes. Make a motion at his eyes, if you please, sir.'

Blossom did so, and Kit threw up his head rather as if something pricked him under the chin than as if fearing a blow. Blossom repeated the experiment, and Kit jerked back in considerable astonishment.

'Stone blind, you see, gentlemen,' proceeded Peter, 'but he's just as good to travel of a dark night as if he had eyes.'

'Blame my buttons,' said Blossom, 'if I like them eyes.'

'No,' said Peter, 'nor I neither. I'd rather have 'em made of diamonds, but they'll do—if they don't show as much white as Bullet's.'

'Well,' said Blossom, 'make a pass at me.'

'No,' said Peter, 'you made the banter, now make your pass.'

'Well, I'm never afraid to price my hosses. You must give me twenty-five dollars boot.'

'Oh, certainly; say fifty, and my saddle and bridle in. Here, Neddy, my son, take away daddy's horse.'

'Well,' said Blossom, 'I've made my pass, now you make yours.'

'I'm for short talk in a horse-swap, and therefore always tell a gentleman at once what I mean to do. You must give me ten dollars.'

Blossom swore absolutely, roundly, and profanely that he never would give boot.

'Well,' said Peter, 'I didn't care about trading, but you cut such high shins that I thought I'd like to back you out, and

I've done it. Gentlemen, you see I've brought him to a hack.'

'Come, old man,' said Blossom, 'I've been joking with you. I begin to think you do want to trade, therefore, give me five dollars and take Bullet. I'd rather lose ten dollars any time than not make a trade, though I hate to fling away a good hoss.'

'Well,' said Peter, 'I'll be as clever as you are. Just put the five dollars on Bullet's back, and hand him over, it's a trade.'

Blossom swore again, as roundly as before, that he would not give boot, and, said he, 'Bullet wouldn't hold five dollars on his back, no how. But, as I bantered you, if you say an even swap, here's at you.'

'I told you,' said Peter, 'I'd be as clever as you, therefore, here goes two dollars more, just for trade sake. Give me three dollars, and it's a bargain.'

Blossom repeated his former assertion, and here the parties stood for a long time, and the by-standers (for many were now collected) began to taunt both parties. After some time, however, it was pretty unanimously decided that the old man had backed Blossom out.

At length Blossom swore he 'never would be backed out for three dollars after bantering a man', and, accordingly, they closed the trade.

'Now,' said Blossom, as he handed Peter the three dollars, 'I'm a man that, when he makes a bad trade, makes the most of it until he can make a better. I'm for no ruses and after-claps.'

'That's just my way,' said Peter, 'I never goes to law to mend my bargains.'

'Ah, you're the kind of boy I love to trade with. Here's your hoss, old man. Take the saddle and bridle off him, and I'll strip yours, but lift up the blanket easy from Bullet's back, for he's a mighty tender-backed hoss.'

The old man removed the saddle, but the blanket stuck fast. He attempted to raise it, and Bullet bowed himself, switched his tail, danced a little, and gave signs of biting.

'Don't hurt him, old man,' said Blossom, archly, 'take it off easy. I am, perhaps, a leetle of the best man at a horse-swap that ever caught a coon.'

Peter continued to pull at the blanket more and more roughly, and Bullet became more and more cavortish insomuch that, when the blanket came off, he had reached the kicking point in good earnest

The removal of the blanket disclosed a sore on Bullet's back-bone that seemed to have defied all medical skill. It measured six full inches in length and four in breadth, and had as many features as Bullet had motions. My heart sickened at the sight, and I felt that the brute who had been riding him in that situation deserved the halter

The prevailing feeling, however, was that of mirth. The laugh became loud and general at the old man's expense, and rustic witticisms were liberally bestowed upon him and his late purchase. These Blossom continued to provoke by various remarks. He asked the old man 'if he thought Bullet would let five dollars lie on his back.' He declared most seriously that he had owned that horse three months, and had never discovered before that he had a sore back, 'or he never should have thought of trading him,' &c, &c

The old man bore it all with the most philosophic composure. He evinced no astonishment at his late discovery, and made no replies. But his son Neddy had not disciplined his feelings quite so well. His eyes opened wider and wider from the first to the last pull of the blanket, and, when the whole sore burst upon his view, astonishment and fright seemed to contend for the mastery of his countenance. As the blanket disappeared, he stuck his hands in his breeches pockets, heaved a deep sigh, and lapsed into a profound reverie, from which he was only roused by the cuts at his father. He bore them as long as he could, and, when he could contain himself no longer, he began, with a certain wildness of expression which gave a peculiar interest to what he uttered: 'His back's mighty bad off, but dod drot my soul if he's put it to daddy as bad as he thinks he has, for old Kit's both blind and deaf, I'll be dod drot if he eint.'

'The devil he is,' said Blossom.

'Yes, dod drot my soul if he eint. You walk him, and see if he eint. His eyes don't look like it, but he'd just as leve go agin the house with you, or in a ditch, as any how. Now you go try him.' The laugh was now turned on Blossom, and many rushed to test the fidelity of the little boy's report. A few experiments established its truth beyond controversy.

'Neddy,' said the old man, 'you oughtn't to try and make people discontented with their things. Stranger, don't mind what the little boy says. If you can only get Kit rid of them little failings, you'll find him all sorts of a horse. You are a leetle the best man at a horse-swap that ever I got hold of, but don't fool away Kit. Come, Neddy, my son, let's be moving, the stranger seems to be getting snappish.'

PORGY AND THE ARM OF THE LAW<sup>1</sup>

I

The Sheriff in Limbo

EVENTS continued to ripen fast. Porgy's visage grew gloomier with their progress, and a stern expression settled upon his features. He smoked and drank more freely than ever. His conversation grew more and more brief daily. He heard the sergeant without heed, and seldom responded, except by a brief sarcasm, to his prolix exhortations. He was apprised from the city that his danger could not be any longer averted, that there was no longer any barrier between him and the sheriff. Col. Pinckney wrote him an affectionate letter, full of sympathy, but cutting him off from all farther hope of escape. Pinckney did not stop at this. He sought the sheriff, who was a well-known army man, of good nature, something of a humorist, indeed, and with quite a friendly regard for Porgy, whom he had met more than once during the war, and whom he very well knew. The object of Pinckney now was to persuade the sheriff to as much indulgence as possible. To 'do his spiriting gently' To this the latter was naturally inclined. But, on the other hand, there was the impatient creditor, M'Kewn, urging the rapid execution of the proceedings. The law! The law! He claimed the benefit of the law in its utmost rigor, and waited, with intense appetite for the news of the execution of his processes, the sale of the lands of Porgy, and the seizure of the negroes. Pinckney wrote the captain all these particulars. He had tried the inflexible creditor in vain. He was resolved on his pound of flesh, and as much blood as he could draw along with it.

Porgy read the letter to Millhouse. The latter, by a private despatch, summoned Lance Frampton to the council. He came over to Glen-Eberley armed to the teeth, with rifle on his shoulder, sabre at his side, pistols in holster, just as he had gone through the wars. The requisitions of the sergeant had been to this effect. He had expressly enjoined the lieutenant to come in war-fashion. He met him at the entrance, armed in like manner though not on horseback, and with an ominous shaking of the head and the hand, in answer to Frampton's inquiries, he said—

'The enemy is in motion, lieutenant, we've got to stand an assault, maybe a siege, and I know'd you warn't a-guine to stand by and see the cappin bombarded and invaded, without being ready to jine at the first sound of the trumpet. You'll see the cappin's mightily changed in the last week. He's more down in the mouth than I ever seed him. He kain't talk, and when a man kain't talk, that's been so used to it, it's about the worst sign in his sarcumstances. But, don't you say nothing of what you sees. Jest you listen to me, and when I pushes on one p'int, be ready to follow up the push. We must purtect the property from the enemy. Ef they gits the place, thar's not much use for the niggers, and ef they gits the niggers, thar's not much use for the place. The two stands together pretty much like gun and gunpowder. What's the use of the gunpowder if thar's no gun, and what's the use of the gun if thar's no powder? You sees! Now, we must purtect the niggers and plantation against siege and storm. That's the first needcessity, the next is to open the cappin's eyes to the needcessity of marrying the widow. His sarcumstances ain't to be put off any longer. We must, both on us, argufy him into the sense of this needcessity.'

Having, as he thought, sufficiently given the lieutenant his cue, the latter was allowed to enter the dwelling, and to see his old commander. He found Porgy sombre enough, but glad to see him. He put on a cheerful countenance when he beheld the youth, gave him his hand, and, for a little while, seemed to recover this spirits. But Frampton remarked that, though he entered the room, armed cap-a-pie, the captain never seemed to observe it, and that, even while he spoke to him of familiar things, and with a smile upon his face, his mind yet seemed to wander. After a while, he lapsed into moody silence, never once taking the pipe from his mouth in the course of half an hour, even though its fires had gone out. The lieutenant took his place in the household quietly, as if he had never left it. He had his bed there that night. After supper, Tom being warned to be in attendance as an auxiliary, the sergeant opened by degrees upon the subject of embarrassment before them.

'Ef you has no dejection, cappin, I wish you'd read to the lieutenant that 'ere letter of Col Pinckney.'

'Oh! to be sure. You've not heard, Lance, that the Philistines are about to descend upon us. Writs are out, and executions, levies, and arrests, Ca Sa's and Fi Fa's and I suppose ne exeats, and whatever other diabolical inventions of the law can be brought to bear upon a man whom the devil has determined to destroy. I told you of my fears before we got home. I was then better prepared for the disaster than I am now. The respite I have had, the restoration of my negroes, and the help in money afforded me by Mrs. Eveleigh, have helped to spoil me for vicissitudes, and, in getting a new taste of my old mode of life, I am much more reluctant than ever to give it up. But the thing seems inevitable now. This letter of Colonel Pinckney, which I will read to you, will show you how the land lies, and from what quarter, and in what force, the enemy will probably make his approaches.'

And he read the letter

'The case you see, is hopeless The wolves will have their victim. Nothing can be done'

'Well, cappin, I doesn't edzactly see that Here's Lance, and me both, and Tom, all ready to have a fight on it, and beat off the nummy, ef they don't come on us too many at once We three, and you, cappin—'

'Pooh, pooh, sergeant! That's all nonsense There's no fighting to be done in the matter, and no flying, that I can see All that is left to me now, or is likely to be left to me, is my philosophy, and that of my little Frenchman I am trying to school myself to the trial with the best grace in the world, though by the powers, if a good fight would help the matter, I'd be pretty quick to man the fortress, but that's out of the question The notion of the sergeant is simply absurd The case, look whichever way you please, is absolutely hopeless'

'You're clean wrong, jest bekaise you refuses to look the right way Now, I've been seeing, a mighty long while past, that thar was a way of saving all, and blocking the game on the nummy, and that, you see, was jes' by coming down upon the widow Eb'leigh, and storming her premises I show'd you, long ago, how a widow was a sort of post which had been afore taken by the nummy, and so was to be taken ag'in, and where the storming was conducted by a good off'cer, from the line of the army, that the thing mout be done easily. This widow Eb'leigh, now—'

'Hush up, Millhouse No more of that It must not be thought of How will it look for me—I who have been borrowing the widow's money—to propose to pay my debts to her, by making her my wife?'

'And the most xcellentest way for settling a debt that ever was invented on this arth'

'Why, man, I've gone to her as a beggar I owe her six hundred guineas Shall I go to her and offer her payment in a bankrupt husband?'

'But ef she likes you, cappin, won't she jump at it?'

'Ah! but that is all very doubtful'

'A man what's doubtful, I may say, is a'most d——d a'ready Thar must not be no doubt when you're a-guine to storm a fortress Now, I see that this here widow is a'most ready to surrender at the first blow of the bugle I knows it, cappin, I sees it in everything she does for you, and in every look she gives you, and the best thing you kin do is jest to make a trial of the sarcumstances of the case.'

Porgy shook his head.

'Now, don't you be a-shaking of your head as ef thar was nothing in it But jest you hear what I'm guine to ax you — S'pose, now, the thing is jest as I'm a-saying it S'pose she's ready to give in the moment you are ready to make the attack?
Won't you be a most bloody fool—pardon me, cappin, I doesn't mean to be onre-spectful—but I ax, won't you be a bloody fool, not to give her a chance to surrender handsome, and save her feelin's, and save this fine property, and save your niggers, only bekaise you are so mealy-mouthed Won't you feel most mean and vicious, and onhappy, ef so be you keeps hanging off, and she has to come and pop the question to you? I declar', cappin, it seems a most pitiful and cruel thing for you not to help her out a leetle, by jest ax-ing her in time to save her feelin's'

'Ha! ha! ha! Delightful! 'Pon my soul, Millhouse, you put the case in quite a new and striking point of view You think I should speak in time to prevent the widow from addressing me, and so spare her blushes'

'In course, I does! That's jest the thing
—spar' her blushes!'

'But, suppose she were to propose to me, and I were to—refuse her?'

'Lord love you, cappin, and be merciful to your understanding, but you wouldn't be so onkind and outright redickilous, as to do that—and after all that's she's been a-doing for you'

'It would be rather hard-hearted, I confess'

''Twould be most monstrous redickilous! But, cappin, you mus'n't wait for her to do the axing It mout-be she'd come arter awhile, and when she couldn't stan' keepin' in her feelin's any longer, but then it mout-be—it would be—too late, then, to help your sarcumstances Ef the property was to be sold by the sheriff, what would it bring, I want to know, now, when thar's so litle money guine about Not enough, by half, to pay this warmint, M'Kewn. But, ef
'twas only on account of the lady, it's your business to speak quick The man has no right to keep the poor woman a-waiting on him He has no right to keep a-thinking, with pipe in his mouth, while she's a-weeping and pining away a-most to nothin' '

'But I don't see that Mrs Eveleigh shows any such signs of suffering, Millhouse '

'It's all innard, cappin She's got too proud a stomach, to show outside, in her flesh and sperrits, how much she suffers innardly Many's the woman that's looked fat and hearty, while her heart's been a-breaking in her buzzum I don't mean to say that the widow Eb'leigh is so far gone, cappin, 'kaise, you see, she's had exper'ence in heart affairs, being a widow, but she's got her feelin's and sufferin's, cappin, in the heart, that keeps it sore and bleedin' all over, though it's too strong to break She oughtn't to hev' any sufferin's and bleedin's at all, ef so be you kin help her, and I say, and I'm sure on it, that you kin help her, jes' by the same thing that helps you'-self I'll leave it to the lieutenant here, and to Tom, ef they don't 'gree with me, that the widow Eb'leigh has a nateral right to marry you, considerin' your sarcumstances '

Tom nodded his head affirmatively

'You hab for marry 'em, maussa He bin too much good to you, maussa You can't 'scuse 'em—you can't 'fuse [refuse] 'em You hab for do it, den we all t'ree b'long to one anudder, maussa '

Frampton was of opinion that the proceeding would certainly relieve the captain of all his present difficulties, and was for this reason quite advisable

'That's it, cappin! considerin' the sarcumstances! It's the sarcumstances you've got to consider, and I say it again, considerin' them, and the sarcumstances of the widow, she's got a nateral right to marry you '

'But have I any natural right to marry her?'

'In course! Ef she's got a right to you, thar's no help for it, and you must jine your right to her'n You've got no right to refuse to hev' her, seem' it's her needcessity to hev' you, and the true way for an honest man, and a gentleman, and a good sodger, is to put it to her manful, at once, and not keep her a-waiting, and a-longing and a-sor-rowin', till the poor woman gits sick from her needcessity.'

'Really, Millhouse, you make a new case of it You are making it clearly a duty and a charity that I should marry a lady of fortune, and so save myself from the sheriff '

'Thar's the how! Thar's the very thing.'

'Now, Millhouse, if I could only be sure that the excellent lady whom you so freely discuss, labored under any such feelings as you describe—'

'Aix Lance—aix Tom!' responded the sergeant, appealing to each of them in turn.

Lance certainly had seen the very favorable glances, which the widow had cast upon the captain

'Sheep's eyes, they calls 'em, cappin,' quoth the sergeant

Tom gave his opinion with solemnity and confidence

'Miss Eb'leigh hab eyes, enty, for see, maussa? Well, who dat say maussa ain't man 'nough for please any woman? Da's it! I see 'em how he look at maussa He fire up, he mouth 'tan' open and sweet, and when he talk to 'em, it's jest like any bud [bird] dah sing to 'nudder bud, and axing 'em wha' for we kain't buil' nest togedder dis spring'

'Well,' said the more liberal sergeant, 'twould be all mighty great nonsense to talk of building nests in spring, when here we are jest on the edge, as I may say, of winter But what Tom says would be quite right, ef he'd make the nest buildin' together about Christmas I like a marriage, Christmas time, better than any other, and ef the cappin does the right thing, like a man, we'll have a raal blow-out this coming Christmas You've hearn, cappin Me, and the lieutenant, and Tom, all agrees that the widow looks on you with mighty sweet eyes, and I say she's got a nateral right to you, and you've got a nateral right to her, and you must jine your rights, and give us a blow-out this Christmas, and ef the sheriff, or M'Kewn, or any other warmunt, comes sharking about these promises, I've got a nateral right to give him a h—ll of a licking, and I'll hev' my rights, by blazes, whenever I gits a chance!'

We are not prepared to say that the captain was convinced by this argument, which was continued for sometime after this, and was wound up by a stoup of Jamaica, when the parties all retired for the night Millhouse congratulated himself and companions that a favorable impression had been made, but Frampton was doubtful. His sympathies had taught him better how to see into the captain's heart, and to comprehend his mysteries. The sergeant judged only of what should be the effect of arguments, and an eloquence, so potent as his own.

The next morning, at sunrise, found the two subordinates astir. Frampton and Millhouse went forth together in consultation, the latter looking exceedingly ominous, like some great bull-dog on duty, and having a keen-scent in his nostrils of some intruder. At breakfast, the subject of the last night was resumed by the sergeant, but the captain made no response. He expressed no surprise to see Frampton linger away from his young wife. The lieutenant said nothing of the object of his visit, or of the summons which induced it, but quietly assumed the air and attitude of one on duty. The good youth, accustomed to military authority, and trained up in great measure by Porgy, was prepared to obey at every peril. Of law, he had only vague notions. So far as his experience went, civil authority had been only a name—a venerable thing, perhaps—but which men every where plucked by the beard, without fear, and with impunity. He had yet to learn that it could prove more potent now than during the seven years previous, when each man did the thing that was best in his own sight, and when there were no judges in the land, however numerous might be the executioners. He had come to stand up beside, and for, his feudal lord—such was really the sort of relation between the parties—and to break spear for him, and peril life, against all comers. It is possible that Porgy understood the purport of his visit, but he forebore all remark upon it. The youth was simply welcomed, as of old, and, as of old, he went at once on duty. The sergeant soon showed him that the duty was to be a vigilant one, and was quite necessary. The two mounted guard alternately. Certain favorite negroes were selected as scouts and videttes, who watched all the approaches to the plantation. One was chosen to ascend through the scuttle to the housetop, and keep his eyes at once on every point of the compass. And thus matters stood, without any event to excite alarm, until the third day after Frampton's arrival.

On this day, some little after noon, and just when Porgy was beginning to think of dinner, the scouts came in bringing intelligence of the approach, in the direction of Glen-Eberley, of a very stylish looking gentleman, in black habit, driving the vehicle, then in fashionable use for one or two persons, called the 'chaise,' a heavy lumbering sort of gig, with a capacious top to it. This was the sheriff, the well-known, amiable, graceful and accomplished Colonel —, whose solicitude to do an unpleasant duty pleasantly, had prompted him to undertake a task which is now-a-days commonly confided to a deputy. At the gate of the avenue of Glen-Eberley, the sheriff found himself suddenly arrested by a person in military habit. Before he knew where he was, a huge horseman's pistol was clapped to his head, and he was required to give an account of himself. The sheriff was confounded.

'Why, young man,' said he, 'what does all this mean? Why are you armed to the teeth, and why am I arrested with violence on the peaceful highway? Who are you, and what do you take me for?'

'For a person that's after no good, stranger!' was the answer of Lance Frampton. 'We hear that there's some enemies of Captain Porgy after him, who want to seize him and his negroes, and we are jest here to see that they do no such thing!'

'Why, who is there to take his property?'

'Who! I don't know, but they are enemies, and varmnts, sheriffs, and such like tory people!'

Frampton's mode of cataloguing, showed considerable inexperience, by which the sheriff was amused rather than annoyed.

'You do not mean to say, my friend, that you would resist a sheriff in the execution of his lawful duties?'

'Let him only try it here!' was the indignant answer.

'Well, my good friend, my business here is to see Captain Porgy.'

'But you're not the sheriff?'

'Sheriff, indeed! I'm Col —, formerly of the army. I know Captain Porgy well. He'll be glad to see me, I've no doubt.'

'And you're not one of the sheriff's fellows, then?' demanded Frampton, doubtfully.

'Do I look like any one's fellow?' asked the sheriff, laughing.

'I don't know! I'm on duty here to see that no sheriff, or any of his fellows, get into the place, and I'm bound to examine closely. But I'll take you in, where you can see another person that's on duty, and that knows better what's to be done than I do. Get out boy—to the sheriff's driver—'get up behind'.

In a moment, Frampton had changed places with the negro—This done, he took the reins, saying as he drove—

'If you were to drive up this avenue, stranger, except under my charge, you'd be most like to have a bullet through your jacket.'

'The devil! You have then converted Glen-Eberley into a fortified place?'

'Yes, indeed! And we can make a pretty stiff fight against a good troop of sheriffs.'

'Humph! The captain's at home, I suppose.'

'Yes indeed! But it's a chance you won't get a sight of him. It all depends upon Sergeant Millhouse. He's the officer on duty. You must make it all clear to him, that you don't come for any evil, before he'll let you 'light.'

'Indeed!' and, with his secret meditations, the sheriff smiled pleasantly enough, but his smiles were arrested as suddenly as he himself had been before, as, almost in the middle of the avenue, Frampton drew up the horses.

'Here's the sergeant!' said he.

The sheriff, at the same moment, saw approaching, from the head of the horses, a stalwart figure, with pistols in belt, and sabre waving in his left hand. A cap made of the skins of a pair of gray-squirrels, with the tails flapping on both sides, covered his head. His uniform was of strange military mixture, altogether indescribable, but propriety requires that we should describe it as a uniform. His eye was fiercely suspicious, and his mouth was compressed with most rigid determination.

'Who's he?' was the stern demand of the sergeant as the vehicle was stopped, and he presented himself, waving his sabre, in front of the visitor.

'He calls himself Col ——, of the army, says he's not the sheriff, or any of his fellows, and wants to see the captain.'

The sergeant glared at him with eyes of piercing inquiry, and, after a moment's pause, said—

'Take off your hat, stranger, that I may see what sort of a head you've got of your own.'

The sheriff, smilingly civil, complied with the requisition.

'He looks onharmful enough, Lance, but there's no knowing I never haired of any Col —— in the army, I've hearn of a cappid with some sich name, but I never haired that he did anything much. He warn't no great shakes. You say, stranger, that our cappid knows you?'

'Yes!' said the sheriff, meekly, beginning to feel somewhat dubious of his securities.

'Well, hev' you any way to let him hear from you, by any writing or letter. For, as for seeing him afore he hears all about you, that's onpossible!'

The sheriff produced a pencil, tore off a bit of paper, from a letter, wrote his name upon it, and offered it to the sergeant.

'Stuck it on the eend of my sabre,' said the wary soldier, not knowing how such a talisman, taken into his hands, might compromise his relations with the captain or the enemy.

'Now, Lance, git out, and take out the horse, then you carry this paper, jest as it stands, to the cappid, I'll keep guard on this pusson, in the meantime, when you're gone.'

A few moments sufficed for this performance, and Frampton set off, bearing the missive at the point of the sword, and leaving Millhouse, pistol in hand, confronting the visitor. The latter made a movement as if to get out, but the sergeant, with a horrid voice of war, cried out—

'Don't you stir a peg, onless you wants me to blow a winder through your buzzum! Jes' keep quiet whar you air, ef you wants an easy time of it!'

And he followed up the terrible threat by a wilful obtrusion of the huge pistol, jaws wide open, full into the gaping jaws of the doubtful visitor. The sheriff recoiled, as well he might. He was half afraid now to move a limb, although, just then, it occurred to him that the ends of certain legal documents, of considerable size, were peering too conspicuously from a breast pocket, and he feared, if remarked, it would scarcely be possible for him to escape the imputation of being the much-hated officer for the hostile reception of whom these men were in arms. He finally attempted the thing once, but, as he lifted his hand to his bosom, Millhouse mistook it for an attempt to get at his weapons, and he instantly applied his own. Again was the huge muzzle of the pistol clapped to the sheriff's head with an awful injunction—

'Ef you lifts a hand, or stirs a peg, stranger, you swallows a bullet that no white man can chaw. I've been in the army, too long, my friend, to let the nimy git his hand fairly into his buzzum. Jest you try it ef you wants to see how I manages in sich a case. Jest you try it, ef you'd see blazes to shet up both your eyes.'

The sheriff resigned himself submissively to the necessity. The sergeant, clearly, was not a sentinel to be trifled with, and the prisoner, beginning honestly to wish himself well out of the present predicament, was now afraid to relax the stiffened limb, to ease out leg or arm, knee or elbow, lest he should incur the sudden penalty of blow or bullet. He remained thus in a most uneasy state of rest, which was anything but repose, waiting, with anxiety, for the return of the more civil of his two captors.

Coup de Théâtre

WHEN Lance Frampton entered the house with the paper of the sheriff, addressed to Porgy, and which contained only the name of the former, the captain of partisans was preparing himself for dinner, which Tom, the cook, was himself about to place upon the table.

'Where's Pomp, Tom?' demanded the captain.

'Pomp dey somewhere, dey tak' care ob hese'f, I 'speck,' replied Tom, with a significant jerk of the head.

'Somewhere! Taking care of himself! Why, what the d—l is he after, and why don't you call him in to his duty? You should see, Tom, that the scamp does not skulk too frequently. He has too much taste for it, as is, perhaps, the case with all fiddlers. Halloo for the scamp, and see that he is at his post. Take care of himself, indeed! I'll see that he takes care of me.'

'He no guine yer holler dis time, maussa!' answered Tom. 'Nebber you min' maussa, he will come jis when we wants 'em, only jis now, he sca'ce [scarce]!'

'But we want him now!'

'Can't come now, maussa! Pomp in de swamp, safe shet up. Nobody for sh'um [see him]!'

'In the swamp! What the d—l is he after in the swamp?'

But the farther dialogue was arrested by the appearance of Frampton, very much to Tom's relief, since he could not much longer have evaded the direct demands of his master, while Millhouse had enjoined upon him silence. To let the reader into a secret, all the negroes had taken to the swamp, except Tom, from the moment when the sheriff's chaise had been arrested at the entrance of the avenue!

'Well, Lance, in armor stull? What's the matter?'

'We've captured a man here, captain, who calls himself Col —, and says you know him. He sends you this.'

Porgy read the slip.

'Col —, and you've captured him, you say? How?—Why?'

Frampton told his story briefly.

'Why, you see, we're on duty, and we thought he was the sheriff, and so we took him into captivity. The sergeant's standing guard over him, while I brought you the paper.'

'Captured him! And where is he?'

'In the avenue. You can see him through the window, where the sergeant has him under guard.'

Porgy looked out, and burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter.

'Ha! ha! ha! Good, r'faith! excellent! The captor in captivity! Ha! ha! ha! Well, this is promising! The game begins well. We shall have a laugh on our side, at least, whether we lose or not in the long run. Ha! ha! ha!'

The captain made the lieutenant repeat the details—the dialogue—every particular, and the merriment of the captain was renewed. The whole thing struck him amusingly. It appealed to his leading passion for practical jokes. He determined to humor it to the end.

'So, you thought Col — the sheriff did you? Ha! ha! ha! admirable! What a story to tell! But, I will go out to him. I must only put a few extra dishes on the table. Here, Tom!—And now, Lance, step out to the sergeant, tell him to watch his prisoner closely I will come out and see if he is really the colonel, whom I know very well! We must not be imposed upon, Lance! By no means! Ha! ha! ha! The captor in captivity! Very good, by Mercury, very good!"

Lance Frampton disappeared, perfectly satisfied that the captain approved of all his proceedings, a matter of which he had not been quite sure previously When he was gone, Porgy, with Tom's assistance, proceeded to put himself in caparison of war. His uniform was hastily hustled on, his belt girded about his waist, sword slung at his side, pistols stuck in his belt, and in his hand he carried a long rifle This done, he proceeded to arrange certain mysteriously-covered dishes upon the table Tom was also made to equip himself in armor—that is, with a light tomahawk over his shoulder, a huge couteau de chasse in one side of his belt, and a great horseman's pistol in the other Porgy gave him some final directions, and then sallied forth to examine the prisoner

Before he appeared, the sheriff had begun to meditate the propriety of declaring his indignation, in very strong language, at the treatment he received, but, at the approach of Porgy, looking swords, bayonets, and blunderbusses, his purpose changed — Was the captain crazy? Could he really mean to defy the laws? The colonel began to have his doubts He had heard of the mad freaks of which Porgy had been occasionally guilty, he had heard that he was very free in his potations, he saw nothing but savage defiance in the features of Millhouse, and nothing but sober soldier resolution, and dogged adherence to authority, in the aspect of Frampton The gown began to tremble in the presence of the sword. 'I must temporize!' was the unspoken decision of the sheriff, 'I must see how the land lies first! Who knows what desperate actions these mad fellows may not commit'

Porgy came on slowly, as became his size and state As he approached, the sheriff made a movement as if to rise

'Not a step, stranger!' cried the vigilant Millhouse, holding up the yawning pistols 'Wait till the cappin gives the word'

The captain seemed slow to give the word He drew nigh with the air of a man who felt that he might, at any moment, be required to pull the trigger His rifle was held in readiness, his finger near the trigger. He walked up to Millhouse, and looked suspiciously at the vehicle

'Who have you got here, sergeant?'

The sergeant saluted, in military style, flourishing the pistol instead of the sword, as he answered—

'A fellow who calls himself Col ——, but I don't know He mout-be, and mout-be not, the colonel But he says he knows you, and you knows him'

Porgy advanced a pace, and peered suspiciously into the vehicle, still keeping a very deliberate step, and a severe suspicious aspect The sheriff cried out—

'What, Capt Porgy, don't you know me?'

'Bless me, so it is! It is Col —— My dear colonel, I am truly rejoiced to see you, and greatly regret that my fellows should have subjected you to "durance vile" for a single moment It was all a mistake Get out, if you please They took you for some d——d harpy of the law—the sheriff or some one of his vile myrmidons Get out, my dear fellow, and let us hurry in to dinner You are just in pudding-time'

'He evidently does not know that I have been made sheriff,' was the silent whisper of the colonel to himself, as, accepting the invitation, he descended from the vehicle, which Porgy immediately told Frampton to drive up to the house

'We have but one single negro on the place,' said Porgy, 'at sight of you, supposing you the sheriff, every two-legged animal, of dark complexion, took to the swamp You gave them a scare, I assure you But come, I am really glad to see you at Glen-Eberley, and just at this moment'

And he shook hands with the sheriff, with the cordial army shake, which threatened to dislocate a member in order to compel remembrance The sheriff felt a little relieved, even while the usage was so rough They walked toward the house arm in arm

'Let me carry your rifle, captain,' said the sheriff

'My rifle! No, indeed, colonel, no! I never part with it I know not at what moment I may have to use it There is a skunk of a Scotchman in my neighborhood, who may cross my path some day, and, as I tell you, I am in momentary expectation of th-visits of the sheriff, or some of his satellite harpies'

'But you certainly would not draw trigger upon an officer of the law?'

'Would I not?' exclaimed the captain, suddenly stopping in his march, withdrawing his own arm from that of the other, and confronting him with a stern expression 'Would I not?—Will I consent, after fighting the battles of my country for seven years, to be driven from my estates by a d—d civilian—a fellow, probably, who never smelt gunpowder in his life No! indeed! I will die in harness and in possession! They may conquer me—I suppose they will, in time, but I will hold on while I can, do battle to the last, and when they do take possession, they shall walk into it only over my dead body'

'And here's the man to back you, cappin, by the Lord Harry!'

Such was the speech, delivered with stentor-lungs, from the rear, the sergeant at the same moment amusing himself with thrusting back his sabre into the steel sheath, with such an emphasis, as to make it ring again The sheriff was startled from his propriety, for a moment, by the sudden illustration which followed the captain's fierce determination

'They are all mad together,' he again whispered to himself, and it might be observed that his deportment became more conciliatory than ever.

'Come, colonel, let us in, now, and see what dinner we shall find awaiting us A stoup of Jamaica will refresh you after your ride, and me after my scare The very idea of a sheriff makes me thirst, and to be relieved of this idea, I must drink Come! In!'

And the captain seized his guest good-naturedly by the arm, and the two ascended to the piazza, the sergeant thundering with heavy tread behind, his sabre sheath rattling against the steps at every stride, and reminding the sheriff, momentarily, of the military nature of the escort When in the house, he threw off his hat, and Porgy discarded his military cap, the squirrel-skin covering of Millhouse was doffed also, and the three joined in a devout draught of Jamaica But neither of the two latter laid aside his weapons The swords still swinging at their sides, and the pistols at their belts.

Meanwhile, dinner was announced, and the captain of partisans motioned the sheriff to a seat at one end of the table, he preparing to take the place opposite. The sergeant sank into a seat on one side Once seated, the captain unsheathed his sabre, which he laid across the table, the hilt convenient to his grasp The sergeant followed the example, only substituting his lap for the table Lance Frampton came in at this moment, took a place opposite the sergeant, and, seeing what the latter had done with his weapon, made a similar disposition of his own

The sheriff saw these proceedings, which seemed habitual, with increasing surprise 'Certainly,' he again whispered to himself, 'these people are all mad!' The reflection increased his observances, and made him studious to maintain the utmost propriety of demeanor He looked about him, and curiously surveyed all that came within the range of his vision We have not hitherto thought it necessary to mention that, with the borrowed money of Mrs Eveleigh, the captain had succeeded in furnishing his house with some regard equally to comfort and display The want of money in the city when he entered the market, and the number of families who were selling out, had enabled him to procure a complete outfit at small cost He no longer dined upon the floor, carpeted with blanket He had now ample supplies of chairs and tables, there were mirrors against his walls and fine linen upon his table There was no display of plate, it is true, beyond the necessary allowance of spoons, but his china was quite imposing, and would be considered so now His decanters and tumblers were of cut-glass, and the covers to his dishes were of very handsome plating

When the dishes were uncovered, it was with increasing surprise that the sheriff beheld one, within reach of Porgy, containing a pair of highly-polished pistols He attempted something of a jest when he saw them

'Really, captain, you can not design that dish for the digestion of any visitor'

'The digestion must depend upon himself,' was the cool reply, 'but there are parties, who might sometimes intrude upon me, for whose special feeding they are provided.'

'What! the sheriff, eh?' with a faint chuckle 'Exactly! Shall I help you to soup, colonel?'

'If you please '

'Bouillé?'

'Thank you—a little '

'You will find it more manageable than bullet '

'Yes, indeed!'

'Try a little of that Madeira with your soup It improves it wonderfully to my taste Tom!—tasting—'you have not put quite enough salt in your soup?'

'Who say so? Enty I know? Tas'e 'em 'gen, maussa! I 'speck you fin' salt 'nough in 'em next time Heh! Ef I ain't know, by dis time, how for salt de soup, I t'row 'way heap of my life for not'ing '

'Hear the rascal He knows that he doesn't belong to me, or he would never be so impudent How are negroes selling now, colonel? I got a hundred guineas for that fellow '

'You were well paid, captain At his time of life, unless a fellow had some rare qualities, he could scarcely command more than half that money '

'Tom has rare qualities He can cook a good dinner, can make and season soup to perfection, and would have done so today—would certainly never have thrown in too little salt—but that he heard some talk of the sheriff, and in his agitation and the hurry with which he armed himself with his favorite weapons—see the knife and the hatchet—he has been careless with his salt—has probably spilt half of that in the fire which he intended for the soup How does it taste to you, colonel?'

'Right, sir, very good soup, and well seasoned I should say that your cook has salted it sufficiently '

'T'ank you, sah,' quoth Tom. 'I mos' bin 'fear'd I spill some ob de salt, when I yer 'bout dem warmint, de sheriff, but ef you tas'e 'em, da's 'nough Salt mus'n't be too sharp in soup for de good seas'ning '

From the soups they passed to the solids There was a round of beef There was a pair of wild ducks The sheriff began to recover his confidence with his appetite, and to praise Tom's cooking Porgy watched and listened to him with a grim pleasure Occasionally, the sergeant put in, with some of his philosophies, whenever anything particularly provocative had been said, but it may be stated that he was particularly taciturn that day The fact is, the conduct of the captain was somewhat mysterious. The guest was inoffensive—was clearly not the sheriff—yet he saw that Porgy was playing out a game upon him—whether for the purpose of alarming the stranger's fears, or amusing himself, he could not determine, but the doubt kept him fiercely suspicious, and watchful of every look and movement of the guest

The sheriff noted the man's air and manner, and was impressed accordingly The conduct of Lance Frampton, who was singularly quiet, was yet of a sort to fix his attention In this young man he beheld a fixed confidence in his superior, and a readiness to obey orders, which showed that, at a wink, he would be prepared to act, and without any regard to responsibilities After awhile the wine began to circulate, though the sergeant still confined himself to the Jamaica Even when, at the summons of the captain, he emptied his glass of Madeira, he was sure to swallow a good mouthful of the rum after it, as if to prevent any evil consequences from the more aristocratic liquor The dishes were cleared away, and Tom gave the party a rice-pudding, which was voted good on all hands Its removal was followed by the introduction of raisins, ground-nuts (peanuts or pidars), and black walnuts Over the wine and walnuts, the chat grew more and more lively It passed from topic to topic, the town and country, the camp and court, civil life and that of the soldier, but there was one lurking trouble in the mind of the sheriff which invariably brought him back to the peculiar condition in which he found the household

'Really,' said he, 'captain, I find it impossible to realize the assurance that you make me, that you are all armed and equipped here to resist the operations of the law '

'Indeed!' said Porgy, looking grave 'You find it difficult to understand, and why? Is it so strange that I should be unwilling to surrender all my possessions, at the first demand, and without a struggle?'

'But you could scarcely expect to make resistance to the laws of the land The sheriff is armed with a sovereign power for the time. How would you hope to hold out against him?"

"You mean to say that he would overwhelm me with the posse comitatus?"

"Ay, and if need, call out the military!"

"To be sure he may, and certainly there is a power to which my own must succumb. What then? If I am to yield up all the goods of life, why not life also? What is life to me? You know my tastes and habits. You know how I have lived and how I still live. Some men will tell you that I am a glutton, others, that I imbue my appetites equally with my taste and philosophies, all agree that I am, essentially, a good deal of an animal—that I was profligate in youth that I might enjoy life, and that in the good things of this life, I find life itself. I won't deny the charge. Be it so. Am I to survive the good things, and yet cherish the life? Wherefore? What does Shylock say—whom, by-the-way, I take to be a very shrewd and sensible fellow, and a greatly ill-used rascal—

—"You take my life
When you do take the means whereby I live!"

And, when I have perilled my life a thousand times for the benefit of other people's goods, shall I not venture it for the protection of my own?"

"But, my dear captain, there is a material difference between doing a thing with the sanction of the law, and in defiance of it."

"None to me! Don't you see, my dear colonel, that I am prepared to sacrifice my life with my property, and that law can in no way, exact a higher forfeit? But d—n the law! We've had enough of it for the present. Fill up your glass. You will find that Madeira prime. It is from an ancient cellar!"

"Thank you! (Fills.) Well, my dear captain, suffer me to hope for you an escape from the clutches of the law by legitimate means!"

"I'm obliged to you, my dear colonel, but we army men don't care much about the means, so that we effect the escape. I am for stratagem or fight, sap or storm, just as the best policy counsels. Life, after all, is a constant warfare. Rogues are only enemies in lambskins, or ermine. They do not care to cut my throat so long as I have a purse to cut, they will not care to drive me to desperation, so long as it is profitable to them that I should live. I know them! I defy them! I can die without a grunt tomorrow. I have neither wife, nor child, nor mother, nor sister, to deplore my fate, or to profit by my departure. I am, with the exception of these two faithful comrades of mine, utterly alone in the world. They shall live with me while I live. They would die for me tomorrow. Were a man but to lift a finger against me, to assail my life, or my meanest fortunes, they would be into him with bullet and bayonet, and need not a signal from me."

"That's a righteous truth, by the Hokies!" exclaimed the sergeant, with his one fist thundering down upon the table. The lieutenant's eyes brightened keenly, and he looked to the captain, but he said nothing.

"I have no doubt they are true and faithful friends, captain," said the sheriff, "but suppose now, only suppose, I say, the sheriff was suddenly to appear among you, just as I am here now, and were to—"

He was stopped! Stopped in an instant, as by a thunderbolt, by the prompt reply and action of Porgy.

"Suppose the sheriff in you! Ha! suppose the rest for yourself—See!"

And with the wild but determined look and action of a desperate man, he seized both pistols lying in the dish before him, stood up, reached as far over the table as he could, and covered the figure of the amiable but indiscreet sheriff with both muzzles cocking the weapons as he did so. The sheriff involuntarily dodged and threw up his hands. At the same instant, and as soon as the purpose of the superior had been understood by Millhouse and the lieutenant, they were both upon their feet—the sergeant swinging his sabre over the head of the supposed offender, while Frampton, more silent, but quite as decided, while he swung his sword aloft with one hand, grasped with the other the well-powdered shock of the sheriff, in an attitude very like that which we see employed by the ferocious Blue Beard in the opera, when the poor wife is tremblingly crying out for her brother. Here was an unpremeditated coup de théâtre! Two swords crossed in air above the victim,—two pistols, with each broad muzzle almost jammed against his own, every eye savagely fixed upon him, and all parties seeming to await only the farther word of provocation from his lips. Nothing had been more instantaneous. The subordinates were machines, to whom Porgy furnished all the impulse. Their action followed his will, as soon as it was expressed. There was no questioning it, and the amiable sheriff was so much paralyzed by the display, that it was only with much effort that he could cry out—'But, my dear captain, don't suppose me the enemy—the assaulant—the d—d sheriff or any of his myrmidons.'

'By no means, colonel, but you supposed a case in order to see whether, and how, we were prepared for it, and it was essential that you should have a proper demonstration. You have seen, be easy, fill up your glass, my dear sir, and forgive my merry men here for the earnestness with which they performed their parts. They had no reason, indeed, to suppose that I was not serious. You see what chance a bona-fide sheriff would stand, if he aimed at any showing here!'

Porgy had resumed his seat, and restored the pistols to the dish as coolly as the actor, who takes his brandy and water, equal parts, after strangling his wife, stabbing the traitor, and dying famously in the person of Othello. It was not so easy for Millhouse to throw off his tragic aspect. He resumed his seat slowly, never once taking his eyes from the colonel's face, as he did so, and during the whole progress of the feast, he continued to regard him with only half-reconciled senses.

Legal Regimen

THE excellent sheriff no longer felt any call to trespass in experiments upon the legal antipathies of the captain of partisans and his observant follower. He steered wide of all allusions from thenceforth to the officer of the law, and his possible appearance in the precincts. He felt really impressed with the danger of any one who should, with malice prepense, do so, in the evidently diseased condition of mind and mood prevailing at Glen-Eberley. That he should thus forbear, however, was by no means agreeable to his self-esteem or his sense of duty. He was uncomfortable when he thought of his official station, and the sealed documents in his pockets. He had come there to make a levy on land and negroes, without dreaming that he should encounter any opposition. Resistance, with force of arms, was entirely beyond his imaginings, and to depart, having done nothing was at once a lachesse of duty and a personal mortification. More than once he felt like plucking up his drowning courage, and perilling his life upon his manhood—boldly challenging the danger, and facing it with folded arms of defiance, but, on all such occasions, as if Porgy and his followers knew, by instinct, his emotions, there would occur some explosion, or some symptom of explosion, which would remind him vividly of the smouldering volcano upon which he sat. For example, he once made an allusion, deliberately designed, to M'Kewn, and Millhouse flared up, and fumbled his sabre, and gnashed his teeth, even as the Frenchman when he cries, 'Sacre!' through his mustache, or the Spaniard when he growls 'Demonios!' and flourishes his dagger. Frampton showed similar signs of impatience—while Porgy exclaimed aloud, striking his fist down upon the table—

'Don't mention that scoundrel's name in my hearing, colonel! I feel wolfish when I hear of him. Let him but cross my path, let any of his myrmidons but put themselves in my way, and if I do not crop their ears, close to the head, then there's no edge to any weapon in my household.'

'But is he not a neighbor, captain?'

'Neighbor! Well, sir, I suppose you may call him a neighbor, even as the devil is a neighbor, and is said to take free lodgings in every man's dwelling, but such neighborhood does not prevent us from flinging the wretch out of the windows, whenever our good saints give us the necessary succor. Don't speak of such a scoundrel to my ears, or I may do you the injustice to suppose you are his friend.'

The sheriff took the warning, and M'Kewn was dropped, and all subjects were dropped which were likely to stir up the bile and black blood in the bosoms of the host and his companions. The sheriff resigned himself to his fate, and to the policy of doing nothing with as much grace as possible He was not only frightened from the purpose for which he came, but the feeling of good fellowship momentarily grew stronger with the circulation of the wine, and the excellent spirits of the captain The latter, in all respects, except the one, was on his best behavior, and in most amiable temper He never showed himself more really humorous and delightful as a companion in all his life. The sheriff was charmed and listened He was soothed and satisfied His philosophy came into the support of his necessity He reasoned thus, accordingly —

'There is no need to push the matter! Porgy's estate is good, at any moment, for this debt Every day increases the value of both lands and negroes Were I to seize and sell now, the property would be sacrificed It would pay the debt, but leave nothing over to the good fellow, who has been serving his country in a long and honorable warfare D—n the fellow! I like him, and he shall have indulgence as long as I can grant it'

As soon as he had reached this conclusion, and resolved that his visit should no longer have a professional object, the play was easy He yielded himself up to the society in which he found himself He felt the charm of his host's fun and philosophy, and he, too, had good things in his keeping When he had once resolved to sink the sheriff, he gave himself free scope, let himself out, and became, what he was known to be in the army, a really good fellow, of no savage inclinations, fond of a jovial circle, and capable of making himself the life of it The day passed and the party of four had not left the table They had raised their clouds around it, all being smokers except the lieutenant Coffee was served by Tom, in the midst of the cloud When the coffee disappeared, the Jamaica and the Madeira were restored Cards followed, and at twelve o'clock at night, the sheriff rose a loser of some thirty shillings to Sergeant Millhouse, who played through the hands of Frampton, and who became more and more reconciled to the suspicious guest with every shilling which the latter yielded When, next morning, after the colonel's departure,—which took place soon after an early breakfast—he was discoursing of his good qualities, his companionable virtues, and so forth, the captain of partisans laid his hand on his shoulder—

'Ah! Millhouse, but you don't know the man'

'What! he's Col —, ain't he?'

'Yes.'

'And a main good fellow, I say'

'Well enough,—well enough, but—your ear, sergeant'

10 The latter yielded it; the captain stooped as if to whisper—then in deep, solemn accents, as if drawn up from immeasurable depths, he cried out—

'THE COLONEL IS THE SHERIFF!'

The sergeant made but one bounce, and was across the room, his countenance wobegone with surprise amounting to terror His involuntary utterance, occasioned equally by what he had heard, and the tone of voice employed in telling it, was characteristic of his early attention when at church service

'Hark from the tombs! The sheriff, cappin!'

'The sheriff!'

'What! our sheriff, what's a-coming a'ter our goods and chattels'

'The same!'

30 'Oh! ef I'd ha' knowed it!—I'll be a'ter him!—Lance!'

'No! Do nothing of the kind! We've got off, thus far, very well The joke is a good one, upon which I can feed fat with laughter for a month I must ride over and tell the widow How her sides will shake!'

THE SWAMP FOX <sup>1</sup>

40 WE follow where the Swamp Fox guides, His friends and merry men are we,
And when the troop of Tarleton rides,
We burrow in the cypress tree
The turfy hammock is our bed,
Our home is in the red-deer's den,
Our roof, the tree-top overhead,
For we are wild and hunted men.

50 We fly by day and shun its light,
But, prompt to strike the sudden blow, 1
We mount, and start with early night,
And through the forest track our foe

And soon he hears our chargers leap,
 The flashing sabre blinds his eyes,
 And ere he drives away his sleep,
 And rushes from his camp, he dies.

Free bridle-bit, good gallant steed,
 That will not ask a kind caress,
 To swim the Santee at our need,
 When on his heels the foemen press— 20
 The true heart and the ready hand,
 The spirit stubborn to be free,
 The twisted bore, the smiting brand—
 And we are Marion's men, you see.

Now light the fire and cook the meal,
 The last, perhaps, that we shall taste, I hear the Swamp Fox round us steal,
 And that's a sign we move in haste
 He whistles to the scouts, and hark! 30
 You hear his order calm and low.
 Come, wave your torch across the dark,
 And let us see the boys that go

We may not see their forms again, God help 'em, should they find the strife!
 For they are strong and fearless men,
 And make no coward terms for life They'll fight as long as Marion bids,
 And when he speaks the word to shy,
 Then, not till then, they turn their steeds, Through thickening shade and swamp to fly 40

Now stir the fire, and lie at ease—
 The scouts are gone, and on the brush
 I see the Colonel bend his knees,
 To take his slumbers too But hush!
 He's praying, comrades 'tis not strange,
 The man that's fighting day by day

May well, when night comes, take a change,
 And down upon his knees to pray

Break up that hoe-cake, boys, and hand
 The sly and silent jug that's there, 50
 I love not it should idly stand, When Marion's men have need of cheer.
 'Tis seldom that our luck affords A stuff like this we just have quaffed,
 And dry potatoes on our boards
 May always call for such a draught.

Now pile the brush and roll the log:
 Hard pillow, but a soldier's head, That's half the time in brake and bog,
 Must never think of softer bed 60
 The owl is hooting to the night,
 The cooter crawling o'er the bank,
 And in that pond the plashing light, Tells where the alligator sank

What! 'tis the signal! start so soon,
 And through the Santee swamp so deep,
 Without the aid of friendly moon,
 And we, Heaven help us! half asleep!
 But courage, comrades! Marion leads,
 The Swamp Fox takes us out tonight, 70
 So clear your swords, and spur your steeds, There's goodly chance, I think, of fight.

We follow where the Swamp Fox guides,
 We leave the swamp and cypress tree,
 Our spurs are in our coursers' sides,
 And ready for the strife are we
 The Tory camp is now in sight,
 And there he cowers within his den,
 He hears our shout, he dreads the fight,
 He fears, and flies from Marion's men 80

ON THE VALUE AND USES OF POETRY<sup>1</sup>

IN my last lecture I attempted to give some notion of the nature of poetry.<sup>2</sup> In the present I intend to examine its value and uses, to inquire into its effects upon human welfare and happiness, and to consider some of the objections that have been urged against an indulgence in its delights. It is of no little consequence that we should satisfy ourselves of the tendency of a class of compositions which forms so large a part of the literature of all nations and times, so that, if it is found beneficial, we may estimate the degree in which it is worthy of encouragement, if pernicious, that we may bethink ourselves of a remedy. In what I have to say on this head I cannot by any means be certain that my partiality for the art will permit me to treat the subject with that coolness of judgment and freedom from prejudice which might be desirable. I only ask your frank assent to whatever may be true in the apology I shall make for it. It is not for my hands to hold the balance in which it is weighed.

1 This is the second of a series of four lectures given by Bryant in 1825, shortly after quitting Great Barrington for New York. It was first published in Prose Works (N.Y., 1884), I, 14-24.

2 "When we speak of a poem, we do not mean merely a tissue of striking images. The most beautiful poetry is that which takes the strongest hold of the feelings, and, if it is really the most beautiful, then it is poetry in the highest sense. Poetry is constantly resorting to the language of the passions to heighten the effect of her pictures, and, if this be not enough to entitle that language to the appellation of poetical, I am not aware of the meaning of the term. The truth is, that poetry which does not find its way to the heart is scarcely deserving of the name, it may be brilliant and ingenious, but it soon wears the attention. But poetry not only addresses the passions and the imagination, it appeals to the understanding also. Remember that it does not concern itself with abstract reasonings, nor with any course of investigation that fatigues the mind. Nor is it merely didactic, but this does not prevent it from teaching truths which the mind instinctively acknowledges. The elements of moral truth are few and simple, but their combinations with human actions are as innumerable and diversified as the combinations of language. Nor are these of less value because they require no laborious research to discover them. The best riches of the earth are produced on its surface." Bryant, "On the Nature of Poetry," ibid., I, 8-11.

I shall consider the influence of poetry on the welfare and happiness of our race in the three points of view in which I placed it in my last lecture—namely, as it addresses itself to the imagination, to the passions, and to the intelligence. As it respects the imagination, I believe the question may be soon and easily disposed of, for, so far as that faculty merely is excited by poetry without taking into account the effect produced on the passions, its activity is an amusement, an agreeable intellectual exercise—no more. A great deal of poetry, doubtless, has no higher object than this, and excites no stronger emotion than that complacency which proceeds from being agreeably employed. This is something in a world whose inhabitants are perpetually complaining of its labors, fatigues, and miseries. It has, however, a still higher value when regarded as in some sort the support of our innocence, for there is ever something pure and elevated in the creations of poetry. Its spirit is an aspiration after superhuman beauty and majesty, which, if it has no affinity with, has at least some likeness to, virtue. We cannot eradicate the imagination, but we may cultivate and regulate it, we cannot keep it from continual action, but we can give it a salutary direction. Certainly it is a noble occupation to shape the creations of the mind into perfect forms according to those laws which man learns from observing the works of his Maker.

There are exercises of the imagination, it must be confessed, of too gross and sordid a nature to be comprised within the confines of any divine art—revellings of the fancy amid the images of base appetites and petty and ridiculous passions. These are the hidden sins of the heart, that lurk in its darkest recesses, where shame and the opinion of men cannot come to drive them out, and which pollute and debase it the more because they work in secrecy and at leisure. Is it not well, therefore, to substitute something better in the place of these, or, at least, to preoccupy the mind with what may prevent their entrance, and to create imaginative habits that may lead us to regard them with contempt and disgust? Poetry is well fitted for this office. It has no community with degradation, nor with things that degrade. It utters nothing that cannot be spoken without shame. Into the window of his bosom who relishes its pleasures, all the world may freely look. The tastes from which it springs, the sentiments it awakens, the objects on which it dwells with fondness, and which it labors to communicate to mankind, are related to the best and most universal sympathies of our nature

In speaking of the influences of poetry on the happiness of mankind as connected with its effects on the imagination, I have been obliged to anticipate a part of what I had to say in regard to its power over the passions. These two topics, indeed, are closely connected, they may be separated in classification, but it is difficult to speculate upon them separately; for, as I observed in my last lecture, the excitement of the imagination awakens the feelings, and the excitement of the feelings kindles the imagination. It is the dominion of poetry over the feelings and passions of men that gives it its most important bearing upon the virtue and the welfare of society. Everything that affects our sensibilities is a part of our moral education, and the habit of being rightly affected by all the circumstances by which we are surrounded is the perfection of the moral character. The purest of all religions agrees with the soundest philosophy in referring the practice of virtue to the affections. Every good action has its correspondent emotion of the heart given to impel us to our duty, and to reward us for doing it. Now, it is admitted that poetry moves these springs of moral conduct powerfully, but it has sometimes been disputed whether it moves them in a salutary way, or whether it perverts them to evil. This question may be settled by inquiring what kind of sentiments it ordinarily tends to encourage. Has it any direct connection with vice? for, if it has not, the emotions it inspires must be innocent, and innocent emotions are emphatically healthful. Is there any poetry in cruelty? are the vivid descriptions of human and animal suffering it sets before us such as make us to rejoice in that suffering, or even such as leave us unmoved? Is there any poetry in injustice? Is there any poetry in fraud and treachery? The stronger the colors in which the former is painted, the more thoroughly do we detest it; the more forcibly the latter is presented to our minds, the more cordially do we despise it. Has poetry any kindred with covetousness and selfishness? or, rather, are they not a blight, and death itself, to that enthusiasm to which poetry owes its birth? On the other hand, do we not know that poetry delights in inspiring compassion, the parent of all kind offices? Does it not glory in sentiments of fortitude and magnanimity, the fountain of disinterested sacrifices? It cherishes patriotism, the incitement to vigorous toils endured for the welfare of communities. It luxuriates among the natural affections, the springs of all the gentle charities of domestic life. It has so refined and transformed and hallowed the love of the sexes that piety itself has sometimes taken the language of that passion to clothe its most fervent aspirations. It delights to unfold not only the whole human race, but all the creatures of God, in the wide circle of its sympathies. It loves to point man to the beginning and end of his days, and to the short and swift passage between, to linger about the cradle and about the grave, and to lift the veil of another life. All moral lessons which are uninteresting and unimpressive, and, therefore, worthless, it leaves to prose, but all those which touch the heart, and are, therefore, important and effectual, are its own. One passion, indeed, is excited by poetry, about the worth of which moralists differ—the love of glory. I cannot stay to inquire into the moral quality of this passion, but this I will say, that, if it be not a virtue, it is frequently an excellent substitute for one, and becomes the motive of great and generous actions. At all events, a regard for the good opinion of our fellow-creatures is so interwoven with our natures, is of so much value to the order and welfare of society, does so much good and prevents so much evil, that I cannot bring myself to think ill of anything that encourages and directs it. None the less, poetry teaches us, also, lessons of profoundest humility. Reverence for that boundless goodness and infinite power which pervade and uphold all things that exist is one of its elements, and is the source of some of its loftiest meditations and deepest emotions. Much as we all glory in the power that is our own, the mind delights quite as naturally to raise its view to power that is above it, and to lose itself in the contemplation of strength and wisdom without bound. The poet who wrote atheist after his name knew not of what manner of spirit he was. He, too, paid a willing and undissembled homage to the Divinity. He called it Nature, but it was the Great First Cause whom we all worship, whatever its essence, and whatever its name.

One of the great recommendations of poetry in that point of view in which I am now considering it is, that it withdraws us from the despotism of many of those circumstances which mislead the moral judgment. It is dangerous to be absorbed continuously in our own immediate concerns. Self-interest is the most ingenious and persuasive of all the agents that deceive our consciences, while by means of it our unhappy and stubborn prejudices operate in their greatest force. But poetry lifts us to a sphere where self-interest cannot exist, and where the prejudices that perplex our every-day life can hardly enter. It restores us to our unperverted feelings, and leaves us at liberty to compare the issues of life with our unsophisticated notions of good and evil. We are taught to look at them as they are in themselves, and not as they may affect our present convenience, and then we are sent back to the world with our moral perceptions cleared and invigorated.

Among the most remarkable of the influences of poetry is the exhibition of those analogies and correspondences which it beholds between the things of the moral and of the natural world. I refer to its adorning and illustrating each by the other—infusing a moral sentiment into natural objects, and bringing images of visible beauty and majesty to heighten the effect of moral sentiment. Thus it binds into one all the passages of human life and connects all the varieties of human feeling with the works of creation. Any one who will make the experiment for himself will see how exceedingly difficult it is to pervert this process into an excitement of the bad passions of the soul. There are a purity and innocence in the appearances of Nature that make them refuse to be allied to the suggestions of guilty emotion. We discern no sin in her grander operations and vicissitudes, and no lessons of immorality are to be learned from them, as there are from the examples of the world. They cannot be studied without inducing the love, if they fail of giving the habit, of virtue. In so far as poetry directly addresses the understanding, it would be preposterous to apprehend any injurious consequences from it, which in my last lecture I said was by means of those moral truths which the mind instinctively acknowledges, and of which it immediately feels the force. The simplicity and clearness of the truths with which it deals prevent any mistake in regard to their meanings or tendencies. They strike the mind by their own brightness, and win its assent by their manifest and beautiful agreement with the lessons of our own experience. It belongs to more subtle and abstruse speculations than any into which poetry can enter, to unsettle the notions of men respecting right and wrong. Ingenious casuistry and labored sophistry may confuse and puzzle the understanding, and lead it through their own darkness to false conclusions, but poetry abhors their assistance. It may be said, however, that the power which poetry exercises over the mind is liable to abuse. It is so, undoubtedly, like all power. Its influences may be, and unquestionably have been, perverted, but my aim has been to show that they are beneficial in their nature, intrinsically good, and, if so, not to be rejected because accidentally mischievous. To confound the abuses of a thing with the thing itself is to sophisticate. Why do not they who set up this objection to poetry talk in the same manner of the common and universal sources of human enjoyment? When you tell them of the element which diffuses comfort through our habitations, when the earth and the air are frozen, and enables us to support life through the inclemency of the season, do they deny its utility, or endeavor to convince you of your error, by pointing you to dwellings laid waste by conflagrations, or by telling you tales of martyrs roasted at the stake? When you speak of the beneficent influences of the sun, why do they not meet you with the scorched and barren deserts of Africa, with diseases born under his heat, the plague of Europe, and the yellow fever of America? When you are simple enough to rejoice in the kind provision of rains for the refreshment of the earth and the growth of its plants, why do they not silence you with stories of harvest and cattle and human beings swept away by inundations? Well, when we are persuaded to part with our hearth-fires, and to refuse the fruits which sunshine and showers have ripened for our sustenance, let us give up poetry. In the mean time, instead of putting it by with scorn, let us cherish it as we do the other gifts of Heaven

In those works which have met with merited reprehension on account of their pernicious tendencies, it is not of the poetry that the friends of virtue have reason to complain, it is of the foul ingredients mingled with it, it is of the leaven of corruption interspersed with what is in itself pure and innocent. The elements of poetry are the beautiful and noble in the creation and in man's nature, and, so far as anything vicious is mingled with these, the compound is incongruous. Indeed, I am apt to think that those poems which are objectionable on account of their immoral character have won for their authors the reputation of greater powers than they really possessed. The passages of real beauty and excellence which they contain appear the more beautiful and excellent from the contrast they offer to the grossness by which they are surrounded. Those bursts of true feeling, those fine moral touches, those apprehensions of the glory and beauty of the universe, and the language it speaks to the heart of man, delight us there by a certain unexpectedness. Their innocence appears more spotless, their pathos more touching, because such qualities refresh the mind in the midst of its horror and disgust.

The heroic poems of the ancients are said to inspire a sanguinary spirit, the love of war, and an indifference to the miseries of which war is the cause, but I cannot believe that they produce this effect to the extent which many suppose, and, so far as they do produce it, it is from an imperfection in the poetry. Poetry that is unfeeling and indifferent to suffering is no poetry at all. It is but justice, however, to these writers to say that, if they do encourage a fondness for war, it is rather by what they leave undone than what they do. War, like all other situations of danger and of change, calls forth the exertion of admirable intellectual qualities and great virtues, and it is only by dwelling on these, and keeping out of sight the sufferings and sorrows, and all the crimes and evils that follow in its train, that it has its glory in the eyes of men. We do not admire the heroes of Homer because they shed blood and cut throats—any highwayman may do this—but we admire them for the greatness of mind they show in the dreadful scenes in which they are engaged. We reverence that hardy spirit that faces danger without shrinking, and voluntarily exposes the body to pain, for it is a modification of that noble principle which gives birth to all virtue and all greatness—the endurance of present toils and submission to present sacrifices, in order to insure great good for the future. We love, also, to contemplate strong and skilful action of the body, which in the personal combats he describes is prompted and ordered by strong action of the mind, by intense emotion, and clear sagacity. But the purer and gentler spirit of the Father of Verse and the humanizing influences of poetry show themselves strongly in his great works, and set him far in advance of the age in which he wrote. The poet often stops to lament those whom his favorite heroes slew without remorse—old men cut off in the honors of a blameless age, young men in the bloom of their years and the promise of their virtues—and to sympathize with the unavailing and unappeasable sorrow of those to whom they were dear. Nay, it would seem that his mind was ever haunted with a secret sentiment of the emptiness of the very glory he was celebrating, for not only the Odyssey, but the Iliad itself, is full of allusions to the final fate of those who earned renown at the siege of Troy, to their wanderings, their hardships, their domestic calamities, and their violent and unhonored deaths.

I shall close this lecture with an extract from an eloquent writer, who has replied to some other objections that have been raised against poetry in such a manner that I should not feel myself justified in using any other words than his own. 'It is objected to poetry,' he says, 'that it gives wrong views and excites false expectations of life, peoples the mind with shadows and illusions, and builds up imaginations on ruins of wisdom. That there is a wisdom against which poetry wars—the wisdom of the senses, which makes physical comfort the chief good, and wealth the chief interest of life—is not denied, nor can it be denied, the least service which poetry renders to mankind, that it redeems them from the thralldom of this earth-born prudence. But, passing over this topic, it may be observed that the complaint against poetry as abounding in illusion and deception is in the main groundless. In many poems there is more of truth than in many histories and philosophic theories. The fictions of genius are often the vehicles of the sublimest verities, and its flashes often open new regions of thought, and throw new light on the mysteries of our being. In poetry the letter is falsehood, but the spirit is often the profoundest wisdom. And, if truth thus dwells in the boldest fictions of the poet, much more may it be expected in his delineations of life, for the present life, which is the first stage of the immortal mind, abounds in the materials of poetry, and it is the high office of the bard to detect this divine element among the grosser labors and pleasures of our earthly being. The present life is not wholly prosaic, precise, tame, and finite. To the gifted eye it abounds in the poetic. The affections, which spread beyond ourselves and stretch far into futurity, the workings of mighty passions, which seem to arm the soul with an almost superhuman energy, the innocent and irrepressible joy of infancy, the bloom and buoyancy and dazzling hopes of youth, the throbings of the heart when it first wakes to love, and dreams of a happiness too vast for earth, woman, with her beauty and grace and gentleness and freshness of feeling and depth of affection, and her blushes of purity, and the tones and looks which only a mother's heart can inspire—these are all poetical. It is not true that a poet paints a life which does not exist. He only extracts and concentrates, as it were, life's ethereal essence, arrests and condenses its volatile fragrance, brings together its scattered beauties, and prolongs its more refined but evanescent joys, and in this he does well, for it is good to feel that life is not wholly usurped by cares for subsistence and physical gratification, but admits, in measures which may be indefinitely enlarged, sentiments and delights worthy of a higher being. This power of poetry to refine our views of life and happiness is more and more needed as society advances. It is needed to withstand the encroachments of heartless and artificial manners which make civilization so tame and uninteresting. It is needed to counteract the tendency of physical science, which—being now sought, not, as formerly, for intellectual gratification, but for multiplying bodily comforts—requires a new development of imagination, taste, and poetry to preserve men from sinking into an earthly, material, epicurean life.

To him who in the love of Nature holds Communion with her visible forms, she speaks

1 Bryant wrote of his early reading: 'About this time my father brought home, I think from one of his visits to Boston, the Remains of Henry Kirke White, which had been republished in this country. I read the poems with great eagerness, and so often that I had committed several of them to memory, particularly the ode to the Rosemary. The melancholy tone which prevails in them deepened the interest with which I read them, for about that time I had, as young poets are apt to have, a liking for poetry of a querulous caste. I remember reading, at this time, that remarkable poem Blair's "Grave," and dwelling with great satisfaction upon its finer passages. I had the opportunity of comparing it with a poem on a kindred subject, also in blank verse, that of Bishop Porteus on "Death," and of observing how much the verse of the obscure Scottish minister excelled in originality of thought and vigor of expression that of the English prelate. In my father's library I found a small, thin volume of the miscellaneous poems of Southey, to which he had not called my attention, containing some of the finest of Southey's shorter poems. I read it greedily. Cowper's poems had been in my hands from an early age, and I now passed from his shorter poems, which are generally mere rhymed prose, to his "Task," the finer passages of which supplied a form of blank verse that captivated my admiration.' Godwin, A Biography of William Cullen Bryant (N.Y., 1883), I, 37.

'At the present day a writer of poems writes in a language which preceding poets have polished, refined, and filled with forcible, graceful, and musical expressions. He is not only taught by them to overcome the difficulties of rhythmical construction, but he is shown the secrets of the mechanism by which he moves the mind of his reader, he is shown ways of kindling the imagination and of interesting the passions which his own sagacity might never have dis-

A various language, for his gayer hours
 She has a voice of gladness, and a smile And eloquence of beauty, and she glides Into his darker musings, with a mild
 And healing sympathy, that steals away Their sharpness, ere he is aware When thoughts
 Of the last bitter hour come like a blight Over thy spirit, and sad images 10
 Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
 And breathless darkness, and the narrow house, Make thee to shudder, and grow sick at heart,—
 Go forth, under the open sky, and list To Nature's teachings, while from all around—Earth and her waters, and the depths of air—Comes a still voice — Yet a few days, and thee
 The all-beholding sun shall see no more
 In all his course, nor yet in the cold ground, Where thy pale form was laid, with many tears, 20
 Nor in the embrace of ocean, shall exist Thy image Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again,
 And, lost each human trace, surrendering up Thine individual being, shalt thou go To mix for ever with the elements,
 To be a brother to the insensible rock And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain Turns with his share, and treads upon The oak Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mould 30

Yet not to thine eternal resting-place Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish Couch more magnificent Thou shalt lie
 down
 With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
 The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good, Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past, covered, his mind is filled with the beauty of their sentiments, and their enthusiasm is breathed into his soul' Bryant, 'On Originality and Imitation,' Prose Works (N.Y. 1884), I, 39

All in one mighty sepulchre. The hills Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun,—the vales Stretching in pensive quietness between,
 The venerable woods—rivers that move 40
 In majesty, and the complaining brooks That make the meadows green, and, poured round all,
 Old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste,— Are but the solemn decorations all Of the great tomb of man The golden sun,
 The planets, all the infinite host of heaven,
 Are shining on the sad abodes of death, Through the still lapse of ages All that tread
 The globe are but a handful to the tribes That slumber in its bosom —Take the wings 50
 Of morning, pierce the Barcan wilderness, Or lose thyself in the continuous woods Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no
 sound, Save his own dashings—yet the dead are there
 And millions in those solitudes, since first The flight of years began, have laid them
 down
 In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone
 So shalt thou rest, and what if thou withdraw
 In silence from the living, and no friend Take note of thy departure? All that breathe 60
 Will share thy destiny The gay will laugh When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
 Plod on, and each one as before will chase His favorite phantom, yet all these shall leave Their mirth and their employments, and shall come And make their bed with thee As the long train
 Of ages glides away, the sons of men, The youth in life's green spring, and he who goes
 In the full strength of years, matron and maid,
 The speechless babe, and the gray-headed
 man— 70
 Shall one by one be gathered to thy side, By those, who in their turn shall follow them

So live, that when thy summons comes to join The innumerable caravan, which moves To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
 His chamber in the silent halls of death, Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night, Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
 By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave, Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch 80
 About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams

INSCRIPTION FOR THE ENTRANCE TO A WOOD

STRANGER, if thou hast learned a truth which needs No school of long experience, that the
 Is full of guilt and misery, and hast seen Enough of all its sorrows, crimes, and cares,
 To tire thee of it, enter this wild wood And view the haunts of Nature The calm shade
 Shall bring a kindred calm, and the sweet breeze That makes the green leaves dance, shall waft a balm
 To thy sick heart Thou wilt find nothing
 here
 Of all that pained thee in the haunts of men, 10
 And made thee loathe thy life The primal curse
 Fell, it is true, upon the unsinching earth, But not in vengeance God hath yoked to guilt Her pale tormentor, misery Hence, these shades
 Are still the abodes of gladness, the thick roof
 Of green and stirring branches is alive And musical with birds, that sing and sport In wantonness of spirit, while below The squirrel, with raised paws and form erect,
 Chirps merrily Throngs of insects in the shade 20
 Try their thin wings and dance in the warm beam

That waked them into life Even the green trees
 Partake the deep contentment, as they bend
 To the soft winds, the sun from the blue sky
 Looks in and sheds a blessing on the scene.
 Scarce less the cleft-born wild-flower seems to enjoy Existence than the winged plunderer That sucks its sweets The mossy rocks themselves,
 And the old and ponderous trunks of prostrate trees
 That lead from knoll to knoll a causey rude 30
 Or bridge the sunken brook, and their dark roots,
 With all their earth upon them, twisting
 high,
 Breathe fixed tranquillity The rivulet Sends forth glad sounds, and tripping o'er its bed
 Of pebbly sands, or leaping down the rocks, Seems, with continuous laughter, to rejoice
 In its own being Softly tread the marge, Lest from her midway perch thou scare the wren
 That dips her bill in water The cool wind, That stirs the stream in play, shall come to thee, 40
 Like one that loves thee nor will let thee
 pass Ungreeted, and shall give its light embrace

TO A WATERFOWL

WHITHER, midst falling dew, While glow the heavens with the last steps of day,
 Far, through their rosy depths, dost thou pursue Thy solitary way?
 Vainly the fowler's eye Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong,
 As, darkly seen against the crimson sky, Thy figure floats along Seek'st thou the plashy brink Of weedy lake, or marge of river wide, 10 Or where the rocking billows rise and sink On the chafed ocean-side?

There is a Power whose care Teaches thy way along that pathless coast—
The desert and illimitable air—Lone wandering, but not lost.

All day thy wings have fanned,
At that far height, the cold, thin atmosphere,
Yet stoop not, weary, to the welcome land, Though the dark night is near 20

And soon that toil shall end, Soon shalt thou find a summer home, and rest,
And scream among thy fellows, reeds shall bend,
Soon, o'er thy sheltered nest

Thou'rt gone, the abyss of heaven Hath swallowed up thy form, yet, on my heart Deeply has sunk the lesson thou hast given,
And shall not soon depart

He who, from zone to zone, Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight, 30
In the long way that I must tread alone, Will lead my steps aright 1815 1821

SUMMER WIND

It is a sultry day, the sun has drunk
The dew that lay upon the morning grass,
There is no rustling in the lofty elm That canopies my dwelling, and its shade Scarce cools me All is silent, save the faint And interrupted murmur of the bee, Settling on the sick flowers, and then again Instantly on the wing The plants around Feel the too potent fervors the tall maize Rolls up its long green leaves, the clover droops 10
Its tender foliage, and declines its blooms But far in the fierce sunshine tower the hills,
With all their growth of woods, silent and stern,
As if the scorching heat and dazzling light Were but an element they loved Bright clouds, Motionless pillars of the brazen heaven—
Their bases on the mountains—their white tops

Shining in the far ether—fire the air
With a reflected radiance, and make turn The gazer's eye away. For me, I lie 20 Languidly in the shade, where the thick turf,

Yet virgin from the kisses of the sun, Retains some freshness, and I woo the wind
That still delays his coming. Why so slow, Gentle and voluble spirit of the air?
Oh, come and breathe upon the fainting earth

Coolness and life Is it that in his caves
He hears me? See, on yonder woody ridge,
The pine is bending his proud top, and now Among the nearer groves, chestnut and oak Are tossing their green boughs about He comes, 31

Lo, where the grassy meadow runs in waves!
The deep distressful silence of the scene Breaks up with mingling of unnumbered sounds

And universal motion He is come, Shaking a shower of blossoms from the shrubs,

And bearing on their fragrance, and he brings

Music of birds, and rustling of young boughs,

And sound of swaying branches, and the voice

Of distant waterfalls All the green herbs Are stirring in his breath, a thousand flowers, 41

By the road-side and the borders of the brook,

Nod gayly to each other, glossy leaves Are twinkling in the sun, as if the dew Were on them yet, and silver waters break Into small waves and sparkle as he comes.

I BROKE THE SPELL THAT HELD ME LONG

I BROKE the spell that held me long,
The dear, dear witchery of song.
I said, the poet's idle lore Shall waste my prime of years no more,
For Poetry, though heavenly born, Consorts with poverty and scorn

I broke the spell—nor deemed its power Could fetter me another hour.

Ah, thoughtless! how could I forget Its causes were around me yet? 10 For wheresoe'er I looked, the while,
 Was Nature's everlasting smile

Still came and lingered on my sight Of flowers and streams the bloom and light, And glory of the stars and sun,—
 And these and poetry are one They, ere the world had held me long, Recalled me to the love of song

MONUMENT MOUNTAIN

THOU who wouldst see the lovely and the wild Mingled in harmony on Nature's face, Ascend our rocky mountains Let thy foot Fail not with weariness, for on their tops
 The beauty and the majesty of earth, Spread wide beneath, shall make thee to forget
 The steep and toilsome way There, as thou stand'st,
 The haunts of men below thee, and around The mountain-summits, thy expanding
 heart 9
 Shall feel a kindred with that loftier world
 To which thou art translated, and partake The enlargement of thy vision Thou shalt look Upon the green and rolling forest-tops,
 And down into the secrets of the glens,
 And streams that with their bordering thickets strive To hide their windings Thou shalt gaze, at once,
 Here on white villages, and tilth, and herds,
 And swarming roads, and there on solitudes That only hear the torrent, and the wind,
 And eagle's shriek There is a precipice 20
 That seems a fragment of some mighty wall, Built by the hand that fashioned the old world,
 To separate its nations, and thrown down When the flood drowned them To the north, a path Conducts you up the narrow battlement Steep is the western side, shaggy and wild With mossy trees, and pinnacles of flint,
 And many a hanging crag But, to the east, Sheer to the vale go down the bare old cliffs—
 Huge pillars, that in middle heaven upbear

Their weather-beaten capitals, here dark 31 With moss, the growth of centuries, and there
 Of chalky whiteness where the thunderbolt Has splintered them It is a fearful thing To stand upon the beetling verge, and see Where storm and lightning, from that huge gray wall,
 Have tumbled down vast blocks, and at the base Dashed them in fragments, and to lay thine
 ear
 Over the dizzy depth, and hear the sound Of winds, that struggle with the woods below, 40
 Come up like ocean murmurs But the scene
 Is lovely round, a beautiful river there Wanders amid the fresh and fertile meads,
 The paradise he made unto himself, Mining the soil for ages On each side
 The fields swell upward to the hills, beyond,
 Above the hills, in the blue distance, rise
 The mountain-columns with which earth props heaven

There is a tale about these reverend rocks,
 A sad tradition of unhappy love, 50
 And sorrows borne and ended, long ago, When over these fair vales the savage sought His game in the thick woods There was a maid,
 The fairest of the Indian maids, bright-eyed,
 With wealth of raven tresses, a light form,
 And a gay heart About her cabin-door
 The wide old woods resounded with her
 song
 And fairy laughter all the summer day She loved her cousin, such a love was deemed,
 By the morality of those stern tribes, 60 Incestuous, and she struggled hard and long Against her love, and reasoned with her
 heart,
 As simple Indian maiden might. In vain
 Then her eye lost its lustre, and her step Its lightness, and the gray-haired men that passed Her dwelling, wondered that they heard no more

The accustomed song and laugh of her, whose looks Were like the cheerful smile of Spring, they said,
 Upon the Winter of their age She went To weep where no eye saw, and was not found 70
 When all the merry girls were met to dance,
 And all the hunters of the tribe were out; Nor when they gathered from the rustling husk
 The shining ear, nor when, by the river's side,
 They pulled the grape and startled the wild shades
 With sounds of mirth The keen-eyed Indian dames
 Would whisper to each other, as they saw Her wasting form, and say, The girl will die.

One day into the bosom of a friend,
 A playmate of her young and innocent years, 80
 She poured her griefs 'Thou know'st, and thou alone,'
 She said, 'for I have told thee all my love,
 And guilt, and sorrow I am sick of life
 All night I weep in darkness, and the morn Glares on me, as upon a thing accursed, That has no business on the earth. I hate The pastimes and the pleasant toils that once
 I loved, the cheerful voices of my friends Sound in my ear like mockings, and, at night,
 In dreams, my mother, from the land of souls, 90
 Calls me and chides me All that look on me Do seem to know my shame, I cannot bear Their eyes, I cannot from my heart root out
 The love that wrings it so, and I must die '

It was a summer morning, and they went To this old precipice About the cliffs Lay garlands, ears of maize, and shaggy skins
 Of wolf and bear, the offerings of the tribe Here made to the Great Spirit, for they deemed,
 Like worshippers of the elder time, that God 100
 Doth walk on the high places and affect The earth-o'erlooking mountains She had on

The ornaments with which her father loved To deck the beauty of his bright-eyed girl,
 And bade her wear when stranger warriors came To be his guests Here the friends sat them
 down,
 And sang, all day, old songs of love and death,
 And decked the poor wan victim's hair with flowers,
 And prayed that safe and swift might be her way To the calm world of sunshine, where no grief 110
 Makes the heart heavy and the eyelids red Beautiful lay the region of her tribe Below her—waters resting in the embrace Of the wide forest, and maize-planted glades
 Opening amid the leafy wilderness
 She gazed upon it long, and at the sight Of her own village peeping through the trees,
 And her own dwelling, and the cabin roof
 Of him she loved with an unlawful love,
 And came to die for, a warm gush of tears Ran from her eyes But when the sun grew
 low 121
 And the hill shadows long, she threw herself
 From the steep rock and perished There was scooped, Upon the mountain's southern slope, a grave,
 And there they laid her, in the very garb With which the maiden decked herself for death,
 With the same withering wild-flowers in her hair
 And o'er the mould that covered her, the tribe
 Built up simple monument, a cone Of small loose stones Thenceforward all who passed, 130
 Hunter, and dame, and virgin, laid a stone In silence on the pile It stands there yet And Indians from the distant West, who come
 To visit where their fathers' bones are laid, Yet tell the sorrowful tale, and to this day
 The mountain where the hapless maiden died
 Is called the Mountain of the Monument.

MUTATION

THEY talk of short-lived pleasure—be it so—

Pain dies as quickly stern, hard-featured pain

Expires, and lets her weary prisoner go
The fiercest agonies have shortest reign, And after dreams of horror, comes again

The welcome morning with its rays of peace

Oblivion, softly wiping out the stain, Makes the strong secret pangs of shame to cease

Remorse is virtue's root, its fair increase Are fruits of innocence and blessedness Thus joy, o'erborne and bound, doth still release

His young limbs from the chains that round him press

Weep not that the world changes—did it keep

A stable, changeless state, 'twere cause indeed to weep

THE DEATH OF THE FLOWERS

THE melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year,

Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sere

Heaped in the hollows of the grove, the autumn leaves lie dead,

They rustle to the eddying gust, and to the rabbit's tread,

The robin and the wren are flown, and from the shrubs the jay,

And from the wood-top calls the crow through all the gloomy day

Where are the flowers, the fair young flowers, that lately sprang and stood In brighter light and softer airs, a beauteous sisterhood?

Alas! they all are in their graves, the gentle race of flowers

Are lying in their lowly beds, with the fair and good of ours

The rain is falling where they lie, but the cold November rain

Calls not from out the gloomy earth the lovely ones again

The wind-flower and the violet, they perished long ago,
And the brier-rose and the orchis died amid the summer glow,
But on the hills the golden-rod, and the aster in the wood,
And the yellow sun-flower by the brook in autumn beauty stood,
Till fell the frost from the clear cold heaven, as falls the plague on men, And the brightness of their smile was gone, from upland, glade, and glen

And now, when comes the calm mild day, as still such days will come,
To call the squirrel and the bee from out their winter home,
When the sound of dropping nuts is heard, though all the trees are still,
And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the rill,
The south wind searches for the flowers whose fragrance late he bore, And sighs to find them in the wood and by the stream no more

And then I think of one who in her youthful beauty died,
The fair meek blossom that grew up and faded by my side, In the cold moist earth we laid her, when the forests cast the leaf, And we wept that one so lovely should have a life so brief Yet not unmeet it was that one, like that young friend of ours, So gentle and so beautiful, should perish with the flowers

TO THE FRINGED GENTIAN

THOU blossom bright with autumn dew,
And colored with the heaven's own blue,
That openest when the quiet light Succeeds the keen and frosty night

Thou comest not when violets lean O'er wandering brooks and springs unseen, Or columbines, in purple dressed, Nod o'er the ground-bird's hidden nest

Thou waitest late and com'st alone,
When woods are bare and birds are flown,

And frost and shortening days portend 11
The aged year is near his end

Then doth thy sweet and quiet eye Look through its fringes to the sky, Blue—blue—as if that sky let fall
A flower from its cerulean wall

I would that thus, when I shall see The hour of death draw near to me, Hope, blossoming within my heart,
May look to heaven as I depart 20

THE FLOOD OF YEARS

A MIGHTY Hand, from an exhaustless Urn, Pours forth the never-ending Flood of Years,
Among the nations How the rushing waves
Bear all before them! On their foremost edge,
And there alone, is Life The Present there Tosses and foams, and fills the air with roar
Of mingled noises There are they who toil,
And they who strive, and they who feast, and they
Who hurry to and fro The sturdy swain—Woodman and delver with the spade—is
there, 10
And busy artisan beside his bench,
And pallid student with his written roll
A moment on the mounting billow seen, The flood sweeps over them and they are gone
There groups of revellers whose brows are twined
With roses, ride the topmost swell awhile, And as they raise their flowing cups and touch
The clinking brim to brim, are whirled beneath
The waves and disappear I hear the jar Of beaten drums, and thunders that break forth 20
From cannon, where the advancing billow sends
Up to the sight long files of armed men, That hurry to the charge through flame and smoke
The torrent bears them under, whelmed and hid

Slayer and slain, in heaps of bloody foam Down go the steed and rider, the plumed chief Sinks with his followers, the head that wears The imperial diadem goes down beside The felon's with cropped ear and branded cheek 29
A funeral-train—the torrent sweeps away Bearers and bier and mourners By the bed
Of one who dies men gather sorrowing, And women weep aloud, the flood rolls on,
The wail is stifled and the sobbing group Borne under Hark to that shrill, sudden shout,
The cry of an applauding multitude, Swayed by some loud-voiced orator who wields
The living mass as if he were its soul!
The waters choke the shout and all is still Lo! next a kneeling crowd, and one who spreads 40
The hands in prayer—the engulfing wave o'ertakes
And swallows them and him A sculptor
wields
The chisel, and the stricken marble grows To beauty, at his easel, eager-eyed,
A painter stands, and sunshine at his touch Gathers upon his canvas, and life glows,
A poet, as he paces to and fro, Murmurs his sounding lines Awhile they ride
The advancing billow, till its tossing crest Strikes them and flings them under, while their tasks 50
Are yet unfinished See a mother smile
On her young babe that smiles to her again, The torrent wrests it from her arms, she shrieks
And weeps, and midst her tears is carried
down
A beam like that of moonlight turns the spray
To glistening pearls, two lovers, hand in hand,
Rise on the billowy swell and fondly look Into each other's eyes The rushing flood Flings them apart the youth goes down, the maid
With hands outstretched in vain, and streaming eyes, 60
Waits for the next high wave to follow him.
An aged man succeeds, his bending form Sinks slowly Mingling with the sullen
stream

Gleam the white locks, and then are seen no more

Lo! wider grows the stream—a sea-like flood

Saps earth's walled cities, massive palaces Crumble before it, fortresses and towers Dissolve in the swift waters, populous realms

Swept by the torrent see their ancient tribes

Engulfed and lost, their very languages 70 Stuffed, and never to be uttered more.

I pause and turn my eyes, and looking back

Where that tumultuous flood has been, I see

The silent ocean of the Past, a waste Of waters weltering over graves, its shores Strewn with the wreck of fleets where mast and hull

Drop away piecemeal, battlemented walls Frown idly, green with moss, and temples

Unroofed, forsaken by the worshipper There lie memorial stones, whence time has gnawed 80

The graven legends, thrones of kings o'erturned,

The broken altars of forgotten gods,
Foundations of old cities and long streets Where never fall of human foot is heard,
On all the desolate pavement I behold Dim glimmerings of lost jewels, far within The sleeping waters, diamond, sardonyx, Ruby and topaz, pearl and chrysolite, Once glittering at the banquet on fair brows

That long ago were dust, and all around 90 Strewn on the surface of that silent sea Are withering bridal wreaths, and glossy locks

Shorn from dear brows, by loving hands, and scrolls

O'er written, haply with fond words of love And vows of friendship, and fair pages flung Fresh from the printer's engine There they lie

A moment, and then sink away from sight

I look, and the quick tears are in my eyes, For I behold in every one of these A blighted hope, a separate history 100
Of human sorrows, telling of dear ties Suddenly broken, dreams of happiness Dissolved in air, and happy days too brief That sorrowfully ended, and I think

How painfully must the poor heart have beat

In bosoms without number, as the blow Was struck that slew their hope and broke their peace.

Sadly I turn and look before, where yet
The Flood must pass, and I behold a mist Where swarm dissolving forms, the brood of Hope, 110

Divinely fair, that rest on banks of flowers, Or wander among rainbows, fading soon
And reappearing, haply giving place To forms of gnsly aspect such as Fear Shapes from the idle air—where serpents lift

The head to strike, and skeletons stretch forth

The bony arm in menace Further on A belt of darkness seems to bar the way Long, low, and distant, where the Life to come

Touches the Life that is The Flood of Years 120

Rolls toward it near and nearer It must pass

That dismal barrier What is there beyond?
Hear what the wise and good have said

That belt of darkness, still the Years roll on More gently, but with not less mighty sweep

They gather up again and softly bear All the sweet lives that late were overwhelmed

And lost to sight, all that in them was good, Noble, and truly great, and worthy of love— 129

The lives of infants and ingenuous youths, Sages and saintly women who have made Their households happy, all are raised and borne

By that great current in its onward sweep, Wandering and rippling with caressing
waves

Around green islands with the breath Of flowers that never wither So they pass From stage to stage along the shining course

Of that bright river, broadening like a sea.
As its smooth eddies curl along their way They bring old friends together, hands are clasped 140

In joy unspeakable, the mother's arms
Again are folded round the child she loved And lost Old sorrows are forgotten now,

Or but remembered to make sweet the hour That overpays them, wounded hearts that bled

Or broke are healed forever In the room Of this grief-shadowed present, there shall be

A Present in whose reign no grief shall gnaw
The heart, and never shall a tender tie Be broken, in whose reign the eternal Change 150

That waits on growth and action shall proceed

With everlasting Concord hand in hand

THE POET

THOU, who wouldst wear the name
Of poet mid thy brethren of mankind,
And clothe in words of flame Thoughts that shall live within the general mind!

Deem not the framing of a deathless lay
The pastime of a drowsy summer day.

But gather all thy powers,
And wreak them on the verse that thou dost weave,
And in thy lonely hours,
At silent morning or at wakeful eve, 10 While the warm current tingles through thy veins,
Set forth the burning words in fluent strains

No smooth array of phrase, Artfully sought and ordered though it be,
Which the cold rhymers lays Upon his page with languid industry,
Can wake the listless pulse to livelier speed, Or fill with sudden tears the eyes that read

The secret wouldst thou know To touch the heart or fire the blood at will? 20
Let thine own eyes o'erflow, Let thy lips quiver with the passionate thrill,

Seize the great thought, ere yet its power be past,
And bind, in words, the fleet emotion fast

Then, should thy verse appear Halting and harsh, and all unaptly wrought,
Touch the crude line with fear, Save in the moment of impassioned
thought,
Then summon back the original glow, and mend
The strain with rapture that with fire was penned 30

Yet let no empty gust
Of passion find an utterance in thy lay,
A blast that whirls the dust Along the howling street and dies away; But feelings of calm power and mighty
sweep,
Like currents journeying through the windless deep

Seek'st thou, in living lays,
To lumn the beauty of the earth and sky?
Before thine inner gaze
Let all that beauty in clear vision lie, 40 Look on it with exceeding love, and write The words inspired by wonder and delight

Of tempests wouldst thou sing, Or tell of battles—make thyself a part Of the great tumult, cling To the tossed wreck with terror in thy
heart,
Scale, with the assaulting host, the rampart's height,
And strike and struggle in the thickest fight

So shalt thou frame a lay That haply may endure from age to age,
And they who read shall say 51
'What witchery hangs upon this poet's page!
What art is his the written spells to find That sway from mood to mood the willing mind!'

THE CORAL GROVE

DEEP in the wave is a coral grove, Where the purple mullet, and gold-fish rove,
Where the sea-flower spreads its leaves of blue,
That never are wet with falling dew,
But in bright and changeful beauty shine, Far down in the green and glassy brine
The floor is of sand, like the mountain drift,
And the pearl shells spangle the flinty
snow,
From coral rocks the sea plants lift Their boughs, where the tides and billows flow, 10
The water is calm and still below,
For the winds and waves are absent there,
And the sands are bright as the stars that glow
In the motionless fields of upper air
There with its waving blade of green,
The sea-flag streams through the silent water,

And the crimson leaf of the dulse is seen To blush, like a banner bathed in slaughter:
There with a light and easy motion, The fan-coral sweeps through the clear deep sea, 20
And the yellow and scarlet tufts of ocean, Are bending like corn on the upland lea
And life, in rare and beautiful forms, Is sporting amid those bowers of stone, And is safe, when the wrathful spirit of storms,
Has made the top of the wave his own
And when the ship from his fury flies, Where the myriad voices of ocean roar, When the wind-god frowns in the murky
skies,
And demons are waiting the wreck on shore, 30
Then far below in the peaceful sea,
The purple mullet, and gold-fish rove,
Where the waters murmur tranquilly, Through the bending twigs of the coral

FROM ODE FOR THE CELEBRATION OF THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL

IN vain—the trump hath blown—
And now upon that reeking hill Slaughter rides screaming on the vengeful ball,
While with terrific signal shrill,
The vultures, from their bloody eyries flown,

Hang o'er them like a pall Now deeper roll the maddening drums, And the mingling host like the ocean heaves
While from the midst a horrid wailing comes,
And high above the fight the lonely bugle grieves! 10

SERENADE <sup>1</sup>

Look out upon the stars, my love,
And shame them with thine eyes,
On which, than on the lights above,
There hang more destinies Night's beauty is the harmony Of blending shades and light, Then, Lady, up,—look out, and be A sister to the night!—

Sleep not!—thine image wakes for aye, Within my watching breast 10 Sleep not!—from her soft sleep should fly, Who robs all hearts of rest Nay, Lady, from thy slumbers break,
And make this darkness gay, With looks, whose brightness well might make
Of darker nights a day

A HEALTH

I FILL this cup to one made up of loveliness
alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex the seeming paragon,
To whom the better elements and kindly stars have given,
A form so fair, that, like the air, 'tis less of earth than heaven
Her every tone is music's own, like those of morning birds,

And something more than melody dwells ever in her words;
The coinage of her heart are they, and from her lips each flows As one may see the burthened bee forth issue from the rose.

Affections are as thoughts to her, the measures of her hours; Her feelings have the fragrancy, the freshness, of young flowers, 10 And lovely passions, changing oft, so fill her, she appears
The image of themselves by turns,—the idol of past years!

Of her bright face one glance will trace a picture on the brain, And of her voice in echoing hearts a sound must long remain, But memory such as mine of her so very much endears, When death is nigh my latest sigh will not be life's but hers

I filled this cup to one made up of loveliness
alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex the seeming paragon—
Her health! and would on earth there stood some more of such a frame, That life might be all poetry, and weariness a name 20

AVALON

I will open my dark saying upon the Harp DAVID

All thy waves and billows are gone over me I sink in deep mire where there is no standing!

PSALMS.

<sup>1</sup> First published, set to music, in 1823

There be tears of perfect moan Wept for thee in Helicon.

MILTON.

I

DEATH's pale cold orb has turned to an eclipse
My Son of Love!
The worms are feeding on thy lily-lips,
My milk-white Dove!

Pale purple tinges thy soft finger-tips!
 While nectar thy pure soul in glory sips, As Death's cold frost mine own forever nips!
     Where thou art lying
     Beside the beautiful undying
 In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon, 10
 Oh! Avalon! my son! my son!

2

Wake up, oh! Avalon! my son! my son!
 And come from Death!
 Heave off the clod that lies so heavy on Thy breast beneath
 In that cold grave, my more than Precious
     One!

And come to me! for I am here alone—With none to comfort me!—my hopes are gone

    Where thou art lying
     Beside the beautiful undying 20
 In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon,
 Oh! Avalon! my son! my son!

3

Forever more must I, on this damp sod, Renew and keep My Covenant of Sorrows with my God,
 And weep, weep, weep!
 Writhing in pain beneath Death's iron
     rod!

Till I shall go to that Divine Abode— Treading the path that thy dear feet have trod—

    Where thou art lying 30
     Beside the beautiful undying
 In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon,
 Oh! Avalon! my son! my son!

Oh! precious Saviour! gracious heavenly Lord!

Refresh my soul!
 Here, with the healings of thy heavenly Word,

Make my heart whole!
 My little Lambs are scattered now abroad In Death's dark Valley, where they bleat unheard!
 Dear Shepherd! give their Shepherd his

    Where they are lying
     Beside the beautiful undying
 In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon,
 With Avalon! my son! my son!

For thou didst tread with fire-ensandaled

     Star-crowned, forgiven,
 The burning diapason of the stars so sweet,
     To God in Heaven!
 And, walking on the sapphire-paven
     street,

Didst take upon the highest Sill thy seat—Waiting in glory there my soul to meet, 51

Thou wert my Micro-Uranos below—

 A living Lyre of God who charmed me so With thy sweet songs, that I did seem to g—Out of this world where thou art shining

Thou wert my son of Melody alway,

 Whose Divertissements, through Heaven's

While I am weeping where my Lily lies!
Where thou art lying
Beside the beautiful undying
In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon,
Oh! Avalon! my son! my son!

Kindling the high-uplifted stars at even With thy sweet song, The Angels, on the Sapphire Sills of Heaven,
In rapturous throng, Melted to milder meekness, with the Seven Bright Lamps of God to glory given, 171 Leant down to hear thy voice roll up the

Can any thing that Christ has ever said,
Make my heart whole?

Can less than bringing back the early dead, Restore my soul? 180
No! this alone can make my Heavenly bread—

Christ's Bread of Life brought down from Heaven, instead
Of this sad Song, on which my soul has fed,
Where thou art lying
Beside the beautiful undying
In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon,
Oh! Avalon! my son! my son!

Have I not need to weep from Morn till Even,
Far bitterer tears
Than cruel Earth, the unforgiven, 190 Through his long years—Inquisitorial Hell, or strictest Heaven, Wrung from Christ's bleeding heart when riven?
Thus from one grief unto another driven,
Where thou art lying
Beside the beautiful undying
In the Valley of the pausing of the Moon,
Oh! Avalon! my son! my son!

SONNET,—TO ISA SLEEPING

Sleep on, and dream of Heaven awhile!

ROGERS

As graceful as the Babylonian willow Bending, at noontide, over some clear stream
In Palestine, in beauty did she seem Upon the cygnet-down of her soft pillow;
And now her breast heaved like some gentle billow Swayed by the presence of the full round moon—Voluptuous as the summer South at noon—
Her cheeks as rosy as the radiant dawn, When heaven is cloudless! When she breathed, the air Around was perfume! Timid as the fawn, And meeker than the dove, her soft words were 11
Like gentle music heard at night, when all Around is still—until the soul of care Was soothed, as noontime by some waterfall.

FROM HAWTHORNE'S TWICE-TOLD TALES

THE TALE PROPER<sup>1</sup>

THE tale proper, in our opinion, affords unquestionably the fairest field for the exercise of the loftiest talent, which can be afforded by the wide domains of mere prose. Were we bidden to say how the highest genius could be most advantageously employed for the best display of its own powers, we should answer, without hesitation—in the composition of a rhymed poem, not to exceed in length what might be perused in an hour. Within this limit alone can the highest order of true poetry exist. We need only here say, upon this topic, that, in almost all classes of composition, the unity of effect or impression is a point of the greatest importance. It is clear, moreover, that this unity cannot be thoroughly preserved in productions whose perusal cannot be completed at one sitting. We may continue the reading of a prose composition, from the very nature of prose itself, much longer than we can persevere, to any good purpose, in the perusal of a poem. This latter, if truly fulfilling the demands of the poetic sentiment, induces an exaltation of the soul which cannot be long sustained. All high excitements are necessarily transient. Thus a long poem is a paradox. And, without unity of impression, the deepest effects cannot be brought about. Epics were the offspring of an imperfect sense of Art, and their reign is no more. A poem too brief may produce a vivid, but never an intense or enduring impression. Without a certain continuity of effort—without a certain duration or repetition of purpose—the soul is never deeply moved. There must be the dropping of the water upon the rock. De Béranger has wrought brilliant things—pungent and spirit-stirring—but, like all immassive bodies, they lack momentum, and thus fail to satisfy the <sup>1</sup> The selection, to which the title has been given by the editors, is from Poe's review of the second edition of Hawthorne's Twice-Told Tales, which appeared in Graham's Magazine for May 1842. Harrison, ed., The Complete Works of Edgar Allan Poe (N Y, 1902), XI, 106-09.

Poetic Sentiment. They sparkle and excite, but, from want of continuity, fail deeply to impress. Extreme brevity will degenerate into epigrammatism, but the sin of extreme length is even more unpardonable. In medio tutissimus ibis.<sup>2</sup>

Were we called upon, however, to designate that class of composition which, next to such a poem as we have suggested, should best fulfil the demands of high genius—should offer it the most advantageous field of exertion—we should unhesitatingly speak of the prose tale, as Mr Hawthorne has here exemplified it. We allude to the short prose narrative, requiring from a half-hour to one or two hours in its perusal. The ordinary novel is objectionable, from its length, for reasons already stated in substance. As it cannot be read at one sitting, it deprives itself, of course, of the immense force derivable from totality. Worldly interests intervening during the pauses of perusal, modify, annul, or counteract, in a greater or less degree, the impressions of the book. But simple cessation in reading would, of itself, be sufficient to destroy the true unity. In the brief tale, however, the author is enabled to carry out the fulness of his intention, be it what it may. During the hour of perusal the soul of the reader is at the writer's control. There are no external or extrinsic influences—resulting from weariness or interruption.

A skilful literary artist has constructed a tale. If wise, he has not fashioned his thoughts to accommodate his incidents, but having conceived, with deliberate care, a certain unique or single effect to be wrought out, he then invents such incidents—he then combines such events as may best aid him in establishing this preconceived effect. If his very initial sentence tend not to the outbringing of this effect, then he has failed in his first step. In the whole composition there should be no word written, of which the tendency, direct or indirect, is not to the one pre-established design. And by such means, with such care and skill, a picture is at length painted which leaves in the mind of him who contemplates it with a kindred art, a sense of the fullest satisfaction. The idea of the tale has been presented unblemished, because undisturbed, and this is an end unattainable by the novel. Undue brevity is just as exceptionable here as in the poem, but undue length is yet more to be avoided.

We have said that the tale has a point of superiority even over the poem. In fact, while the rhythm of this latter is an essential aid in the development of the poem's highest idea—the idea of the Beautiful—the artificialities of this rhythm are an inseparable bar to the development of all points of thought or expression which have their basis in Truth. But Truth is often, and in very great degree, the aim of the tale. Some of the finest tales are tales of ratiocination. Thus the field of this species of composition, if not in so elevated a region on the mountain of Mind, is a table-land of far vaster extent than the domain of the mere poem. Its products are never so rich, but infinitely more numerous, and more appreciable by the mass of mankind. The writer of the prose tale, in short, may bring to his theme a vast variety of modes or inflections of thought and expression—(the ratiocinative, for example, the sarcastic, or the humorous) which are not only antagonistical to the nature of the poem, but absolutely forbidden by one of its most peculiar and indispensable adjuncts, we allude, of course, to rhythm. It may be added here, par parenthese, that the author who aims at the purely beautiful in a prose tale is laboring at a great disadvantage. For Beauty can be better treated in the poem. Not so with terror, or passion, or horror, or a multitude of such other points. And here it will be seen how full of prejudice are the usual animadversions against those tales of effect, many fine examples of which were found in the earlier numbers of Blackwood. The impressions produced were wrought in a legitimate sphere of action, and constituted a legitimate although sometimes an exaggerated interest. They were relished by every man of genius although there were found many men of genius who condemned them without just ground. The true critic will but demand that the design intended be accomplished, to the fullest extent, by the means most advantageously applicable.

And the will therein leth, which dieth not Who knoweth the mysteries of the will, with its vigor? For God is but a great will pervading all things by nature of its intentness. Man doth not yield himself to the angels, nor unto death utterly, save only through the weakness of his feeble will

JOSEPH GLANVILL.

I CANNOT, for my soul, remember how, when, or even precisely where, I first became acquainted with the lady Ligeia. Long years have since elapsed, and my memory is feeble through much suffering. Or, perhaps, I cannot now bring these points to mind, because, in truth, the character of my beloved, her rare learning, her singular yet placid cast of beauty, and the thrilling and enthralling eloquence of her low musical language, made their way into my heart by paces so steadily and stealthily progressive that they have been unnoticed and unknown. Yet I believe that I met her first and most frequently in some large, old, decaying city near the Rhine. Of her family—I have surely heard her speak. That it is of <sup>1</sup> Poe wrote, 21 Sept. 1839, to P P Cooke: "Touching 'Ligeia' you are right—all right—throughout. The gradual perception of the fact that Ligeia lives again in the person of Rowena is a far loftier and more thrilling idea than the one I have embodied. It offers in my opinion, the widest possible scope to the imagination—it might be rendered even more sublime. And this idea was mine—had I never written before I should have adopted it—but then there is 'Morella.' Do you remember there the gradual conviction on the part of the parent that the spirit of the first Morella tenanted the person of the second? It was necessary, since 'Morella' was written, to modify 'Ligeia.' I was forced to be content with a sudden half-consciousness, on the part of the narrator, that Ligeia stood before him. One point I have not fully carried out—I should have intimated that the will did not perfect its intention—there should have been a relapse—a final one—and Ligeia (who had only succeeded in so much as to convey an idea of the truth to the narrator) should be at length entombed as Rowena—the bodily alterations having gradually faded away. But since 'Morella' is upon record I will suffer 'Ligeia' to remain as it is." Ibid., XVII, 52–53.

Somewhat later, probably in 1846, Poe wrote to Griswold: "You will be surprised to hear me say that, (omitting one or two of my first efforts), I do not consider any one of my stories better than another. There is a vast variety of kinds, and, in degree of value, the kinds vary—but each tale is equally good of its kind. The loftiest kind is that of the highest imagination—and for this reason only 'Ligeia' may be called my best tale." Ibid., XVII, 228.

a remotely ancient date cannot be doubted Ligeia! Ligeia! Buried in studies of a nature more than all else adapted to deaden impressions of the outward world, it is by that sweet word alone—by Ligeia—that I bring before mine eyes in fancy the image of her who is no more And now, while I write, a recollection flashes upon me that I have never known the paternal name of her who was my friend and my betrothed, and who became the partner of my studies, and finally the wife of my bosom. Was it a playful charge on the part of my Ligeia? or was it a test of my strength of affection, that I should institute no inquiries upon this point? or was it rather a caprice of my own —a wildly romantic offering on the shrine of the most passionate devotion? I but in-distinctly recall the fact itself—what wonder that I have utterly forgotten the circumstances which originated or attended it? And, indeed, if ever that spirit which is entitled Romance—if ever she, the wan and the misty-winged Ashtophet of idolatrous Egypt, presided, as they tell, over marriages ill-omened, then most surely she presided over mine

There is one dear topic, however, on which my memory fails me not It is the person of Ligeia In stature she was tall, somewhat slender, and, in her latter days, even emaciated I would in vain attempt to portray the majesty, the quiet ease, of her demeanor, or the incomprehensible lightness and elasticity of her footfall She came and departed as a shadow I was never made aware of her entrance into my closed study save by the dear music of her low sweet voice, as she placed her marble hand upon my shoulder In beauty of face no maiden ever equalled her It was the radiance of an opium-dream—an airy and spirit-lifting vision more wildly divine than the fantasies which hovered about the slumbering souls of the daughters of Delos Yet her features were not of that regular mould which we have been falsely taught to worship in the classical labors of the heathen 'There is no exquisite beauty,' says Bacon, Lord Verulam, speaking truly of all the forms and genera of beauty,
 'without some strangeness in the proportion' Yet, although I saw that the features of Ligeia were not of a classic regularity—although I perceived that her loveliness was indeed 'exquisite,' and felt that there was much of 'strangeness' pervading it, yet I have tried in vain to detect the irregularity and to trace home my own perception of 'the strange.' I examined the contour of the lofty and pale forehead it was faultless—how cold indeed that word when applied to a majesty so divine!—the skin rivalling the purest ivory, the commanding extent and repose, the gentle prominence of the regions above the temples, and then the raven-black, the glossy, the luxuriant and naturally-curling tresses, setting forth the full force of the Homeric epithet, 'hyacinthine!' I looked at the delicate outlines of the nose—and nowhere but in the graceful medallions of the Hebrews had I beheld a similar perfection There were the same luxurious smoothness of surface, the same scarcely perceptible tendency to the aquline, the same harmoniously curved nostrils speaking the free spirit I regarded the sweet mouth Here was indeed the triumph of all things heavenly—the magnificent turn of the short upper lip—the soft, voluptuous slumber of the under—the dim-ples which sported, and the color which spoke—the teeth glancing back, with a brilliancy almost startling, every ray of the holy light which fell upon them in her serene and placid, yet most exultingly radiant of all smiles I scrutinized the formation of the chin and here, too, I found the gentleness of breadth, the softness and the majesty, the fullness and the spirituality, of the Greek—the contour which the god Apollo revealed but in a dream, to Cleomenes, the son of the Athenian And then I peered into the large eyes of Ligeia.

For eyes we have no models in the remotely antique It might have been, too, that in these eyes of my beloved lay the secret to which Lord Verulam alludes They were, I must believe, far larger than the ordinary eyes of our own race They were even fuller than the fullest of the gazelle eyes of the tribe of the valley of Nourjahad Yet it was only at intervals—in moments of intense excitement—that this peculiarity became more than slightly noticeable in Ligeia. And at such moments was her beauty—in my heated fancy thus it appeared perhaps—the beauty of beings either above or apart from the earth, the beauty of the fabulous Hourì of the Turk

The hue of the orbs was the most brilliant of black, and, far over them, hung jetty lashes of great length. The brows, slightly irregular in outline, had the same tint. The 'strangeness,' however, which I found in the eyes, was of a nature distinct from the formation, or the color, or the brilliancy of the features, and must, after all, be referred to the expression. Ah, word of no meaning! behind whose vast latitude of mere sound we intrench our ignorance of so much of the spiritual. The expression of the eyes of Ligeia! How for long hours have I pondered upon it! How have I, through the whole of a midsummer night, struggled to fathom it! What was it—that something more profound than the well of Democritus—which lay far within the pupils of my beloved? What was it? I was possessed with a passion to discover. Those eyes! those large, those shining, those divine orbs! they became to me twin stars of Leda, and I to them devoutest of astrologers.

There is no point, among the many incomprehensible anomalies of the science of mind, more thrillingly exciting than the fact—never, I believe, noticed in the schools—that, in our endeavors to recall to memory something long forgotten, we often find ourselves upon the very verge of remembrance, without being able, in the end, to remember. And thus how frequently, in my intense scrutiny of Ligeia's eyes, have I felt approaching the full knowledge of their expression—felt it approaching, yet not quite be mine, and so at length entirely depart! And (strange, oh strangest mystery of all!) I found, in the commonest objects of the universe, a circle of analogies to that expression. I mean to say that, subsequently to the period when Ligeia's beauty passed into my spirit, there dwelling as in a shrine, I derived, from many existences in the material world, a sentiment such as I felt always aroused within me by her large and luminous orbs. Yet not the more could I define that sentiment, or analyze, or even steadily view it. I recognized it, let me repeat, sometimes in the survey of a rapidly-growing vine—in the contemplation of a moth, a butterfly, a chrysalis, a stream of running water. I have felt it in the ocean, in the falling of a meteor. I have felt it in the glances of unusually aged people. And there are one or two stars in heaven, (one especially, a star of the sixth magnitude, double and changeable, to be found near the large star in Lyra) in a telescopic scrutiny of which I have been made aware of the feeling. I have been filled with it by certain sounds from stringed instruments, and not unfrequently by passages from books. Among innumerable other instances, I well remember something in a volume of Joseph Glanvill, which (perhaps merely from its quaintness—who shall say?) never failed to inspire me with the sentiment: 'And the will therein lieth, which dieth not. Who knoweth the mysteries of the will, with its vigor? For God is but a great will pervading all things by nature of its intentness. Man doth not yield him to the angels, nor unto death utterly, save only through the weakness of his feeble will.'

Length of years and subsequent reflection have enabled me to trace, indeed, some remote connection between this passage in the English moralist and a portion of the character of Ligeia. An intensity in thought, action, or speech, was possibly, in her, a result, or at least an index, of that gigantic volition which, during our long intercourse, failed to give other and more immediate evidence of its existence. Of all the women whom I have ever known, she, the outwardly calm, the ever-placid Ligeia, was the most violently a prey to the tumultuous vultures of stern passion. And of such passion I could form no estimate, save by the miraculous expansion of those eyes which at once so delighted and appalled me—by the almost magical melody, modulation, distinctness and placidity of her very low voice—and by the fierce energy (rendered doubly effective by contrast with her manner of utterance) of the wild words which she habitually uttered.

I have spoken of the learning of Ligeia: it was immense—such as I have never known in woman. In the classical tongues was she deeply proficient, and as far as my own acquaintance extended in regard to the modern dialects of Europe, I have never known her at fault. Indeed upon any theme of the most admired, because simply the most abstruse of the boasted erudition of the academy, have I ever found Ligeia at fault? How singularly, how thrillingly, this one point in the nature of my wife has forced itself, at this late period only, upon my attention! I said her knowledge was such as I have never known in woman—but where breathes the man who has traversed, and successfully, all the wide areas of moral, physical, and mathematical science? I saw not then what I now clearly perceive, that the acquisitions of Ligeia were gigantic, were astounding, yet I was sufficiently aware of her infinite supremacy to resign myself, with a child-like confidence, to her guidance through the chaotic world of metaphysical investigation at which I was most busily occupied during the earlier years of our marriage. With how vast a triumph, with how vivid a delight, with how much of all that is ethereal in hope, did I feel, as she bent over me in studies but little sought—but less known—that delicious vista by slow degrees expanding before me, down whose long, gorgeous, and all untrodden path, I might at length pass onward to the goal of a wisdom too divinely precious not to be forbidden!

How poignant, then, must have been the grief with which, after some years, I beheld my well-grounded expectations take wings to themselves and fly away! Without Ligeia I was but as a child groping benighted. Her presence, her readings alone, rendered vividly luminous the many mysteries of the transcendentalism in which we were immersed. Wanting the radiant lustre of her eyes, letters, lambent and golden, grew duller than Saturnian lead. And now those eyes shone less and less frequently upon the pages over which I pored. Ligeia grew ill. The wild eyes blazed with a too—too glorious effulgence, the pale fingers became of the transparent waxen hue of the grave, and the blue veins upon the lofty forehead swelled and sank impetuously with the tides of the most gentle emotion. I saw that she must die—and I struggled desperately in spirit with the grim Azrael. And the struggles of the passionate wife were, to my astonishment, even more energetic than my own. There had been much in her stern nature to impress me with the belief that, to her, death would have come without its terrors, but not so. Words are impotent to convey any just idea of the fierceness of resistance with which she wrestled with the Shadow. I groaned in anguish at the pitiable spectacle. I would have soothed—I would have reasoned, but, in the intensity of her wild desire for life—for life—but for life—solace and reason were alike the uttermost of folly. Yet not until the last instance, amid the most convulsive writhings of her fierce spirit, was shaken the external placidity of her demeanor. Her voice grew more gentle—grew more low—yet I would not wish to dwell upon the wild meaning of the quietly uttered words. My brain reeled as I hearkened, entranced, to a melody more than mortal—to assumptions and aspirations which mortality had never before known.

That she loved me I should not have doubted, and I might have been easily aware that, in a bosom such as hers, love would have reigned no ordinary passion. But in death only, was I fully impressed with the strength of her affection. For long hours, detaining my hand, would she pour out before me the overflowing of a heart whose more than passionate devotion amounted to idolatry. How had I deserved to be so blessed by such confessions? How had I deserved to be so cursed with the removal of my beloved in the hour of her making them? But upon this subject I cannot bear to dilate. Let me say only, that in Ligeia's more than womanly abandonment to a love, alas! all unmerited, all unworthily bestowed, I at length recognized the principle of her longing with so wildly earnest a desire for the life which was now fleeing so rapidly away. It is this wild longing, it is this eager vehemence of desire for life—but for life, that I have no power to portray, no utterance capable of expressing.

At high noon of the night in which she departed, beckoning me peremptorily to her side, she bade me repeat certain verses composed by herself not many days before I obeyed her. They were these.

Lo! 'tis a gala night

Within the lonesome latter years!
An angel throng, bewinged, bedight

In veils, and drowned in tears, Sit in a theatre, to see

A play of hopes and fears,
While the orchestra breathes fitfully
The music of the spheres

Mimes, in the form of God on high, Mutter and mumble low,

And hither and thither fly—

Mere puppets they, who come and go At bidding of vast formless things That shift the scenery to and fro, Flapping from out their condor wings Invisible Wo!

That motley drama—oh, be sure

It shall not be forgot!
With its Phantom chased for evermore,
By a crowd that seize it not,
Through a circle that ever returneth in To the self-same spot,
And much of Madness, and more of Sin,
And Horror the soul of the plot

But see, amid the mimic rout,

A crawling shape intrude!
A blood-red thing that writhes from out
The scenic solitude!
It writhes!—it writhes!—with mortal pangs
The mimes become its food,
And seraphs sob at vermin fangs
In human gore imbued

Out—out are the lights—out all!

And over each quivering form,
The curtain, a funeral pall,
Comes down with the rush of a storm, While the angels, all pallid and wan, Uprising, unveiling, affirm
That the play is the tragedy, 'Man,'
And its hero, the Conqueror Worm

'O God!' half shrieked Ligeia, leaping to her feet and extending her arms aloft with a spasmodic movement, as I made an end of these lines—'O God! O Divine Father! shall these things be undeviatingly so? shall this Conqueror be not once conquered?
Are we not part and parcel in Thee? Who—who knoweth the mysteries of the will with its vigor? Man doth not yield him to the angels, nor unto death utterly, save only
through the weakness of his feeble will'

And now, as if exhausted with emotion, she suffered her white arms to fall, and returned solemnly to her bed of death And as she breathed her last sighs, there came mingled with them a low murmur from her lips I bent to them my ear and distinguished, again, the concluding words of the passage in Glanvill 'Man doth not yield him to the angels, nor unto death utterly, save only through the weakness of his feeble will'

She died,—and I, crushed into the very dust with sorrow, could no longer endure the lonely desolation of my dwelling in the dim and decaying city by the Rhine I had no lack of what the world calls wealth Ligeia had brought me far more, very far more than ordinarily falls to the lot of mortals After a few months, therefore, of weary and aimless wandering, I purchased, and put in some repair, an abbey, which I shall not name, in one of the wildest and least frequented portions of fair England The gloomy and dreary grandeur of the building, the almost savage aspect of the domain, the many melancholy and time-honored memories connected with both, had much in unison with the feelings of utter abandonment which had driven me into that remote and unsocial region of the country Yet although the external abbey, with its verdant decay hanging about it, suffered but little alteration, I gave way, with a child-like perversity, and perchance with a faint hope of alleviating my sorrows, to a display of more than regal magnificence within For such follies, even in childhood, I had imbibed a taste, and now they came back to me as if in the dotage of grief Alas, I feel how much even of incipient madness might have been discovered in the gorgeous and fantastic draperies, in the solemn carvings of Egypt, in the wild cornices and furniture, in the Bedlam patterns of the carpets of tufted gold! I had become a bounden slave in the trammels of opium, and my labors and my orders had taken a coloring from my dreams But these absurdities I must not pause to detail Let me speak only of that one chamber, ever accursed, whither, in a moment of mental alienation, I led from the altar as my bride—as the successor of the unforgotten Ligeia—the fair-haired and blue-eyed Lady Rowena Trevanion, of Tremaine

There is no individual portion of the architecture and decoration of that bridal chamber which is not now visibly before me Where were the souls of the haughty family of the bride, when, through thirst of gold, they permitted to pass the threshold of an apartment so bedecked, a maiden and a daughter so beloved? I have said that I minutely remember the details of the chamber—yet I am sadly forgetful on topics of deep moment, and here there was no system, no keeping, in the fantastic display, to take hold upon the memory. The room lay in a high turret of the castellated abbey, was pentagonal in shape, and of capacious size. Occupying the whole southern face of the pentagon was the sole window—an immense sheet of unbroken glass from Venice—a single pane, and tinted of a leaden hue, so that the rays of either the sun or moon, passing through it, fell with a ghastly lustre on the objects within. Over the upper portion of this huge window extended the trellise-work of an aged vine, which clambered up the massy walls of the turret. The ceiling, of gloomy-looking oak, was excessively lofty, vaulted, and elaborately fretted with the wildest and most grotesque specimens of a semi-Gothic, semi-Druidical device. From out the most central recess of this melancholy vaulting depended, by a single chain of gold with long links, a huge censer of the same metal, Saracenic in pattern, and with many perforations so contrived that there writhed in and out of them, as if endued with a serpent vitality, a continual succession of parti-colored fires.

Some few ottomans and golden candelabra, of Eastern figure, were in various stations about, and there was the couch, too—the bridal couch—of an Indian model, and low, and sculptured of solid ebony, with a pall-like canopy above. In each of the angles of the chamber stood on end a gigantic sarcophagus of black granite, from the tombs of the kings over against Luxor, with their aged lids full of immemorial sculpture. But in the draping of the apartment lay, alas! the chief fantasy of all. The lofty walls, gigantic in height, even unproportionably so, were hung from summit to foot, in vast folds, with a heavy and massive-looking tapestry—tapestry of a material which was found alike as a carpet on the floor, as a covering for the ottomans and the ebony bed, as a canopy for the bed, and as the gorgeous volutes of the curtains which partially shaded the window. The material was the richest cloth of gold. It was spotted all over, at irregular intervals, with arabesque figures, about a foot in diameter, and wrought upon the cloth in patterns of the most jetty black. But these figures partook of the true character of the arabesque only when regarded from a single point of view. By a contrivance now common, and indeed traceable to a very remote period of antiquity, they were made changeable in aspect. To one entering the room, they bore the appearance of simple monstrosities, but upon a farther advance, this appearance gradually departed, and step by step, as the visitor moved his station in the chamber, he saw himself surrounded by an endless succession of the ghastly forms which belong to the superstition of the Norman, or arise in the guilty slumbers of the monk. The phantasmagoric effect was vastly heightened by the artificial introduction of a strong continual current of wind behind the draperies, giving a hideous and uneasy animation to the whole.

In halls such as these, in a bridal chamber such as this, I passed, with the Lady of Tremaine, the unhallowed hours of the first month of our marriage—passed them with but little disquietude. That my wife dreaded the fierce moodiness of my temper—that she shunned me and loved me but little—I could not help perceiving, but it gave me rather pleasure than otherwise. I loathed her with a hatred belonging more to demon than to man. My memory flew back (oh, with what intensity of regret!) to Ligeia, the beloved, the august, the beautiful, the entombed. I revelled in recollections of her purity, of her wisdom, of her lofty, her ethereal nature, of her passionate, her idolatrous love. Now, then, did my spirit fully and freely burn with more than all the fires of her own. In the excitement of my opium dreams (for I was habitually fettered in the shackles of the drug) I would call aloud upon her name, during the silence of the night, or among the sheltered recesses of the glens by day, as if, through the wild eagerness, the solemn passion, the consuming ardor of my longing for the departed, I could restore her to the pathway she had abandoned—ah, could it be forever?—upon the earth.

About the commencement of the second month of the marriage, the Lady Rowena was attacked with sudden illness, from which her recovery was slow. The fever which consumed her rendered her nights uneasy, and in her perturbed state of half-slumber, she spoke of sounds, and of motions, in and about the chamber of the turret, which I concluded had no origin save in the distemper of her fancy, or perhaps in the phantasmagoric influences of the chamber itself. She became at length convalescent—finally well. Yet but a brief period elapsed, ere a second more violent disorder again threw her upon a bed of suffering; and from this attack her frame, at all times feeble, never altogether recovered. Her illnesses were, after this epoch, of alarming character, and of more alarming recurrence, defying alike the knowledge and the great exertions of her physicians. With the increase of the chronic disease, which had thus apparently taken too sure hold upon her constitution to be eradicated by human means, I could not fail to observe a similar increase in the nervous irritation of her temperament, and in her excitability by trivial causes of fear. She spoke again, and now more frequently and pertinaciously, of the sounds—of the slight sounds—and of the unusual motions among the tapestries, to which she had formerly alluded.

One night, near the closing in of September, she pressed this distressing subject with more than usual emphasis upon my attention. She had just awakened from an unquiet slumber, and I had been watching, with feelings half of anxiety, half of vague terror, the workings of her emaciated countenance. I sat by the side of her ebony bed, upon one of the ottomans of India. She partly arose, and spoke, in an earnest low whisper, of sounds which she then heard, but which I could not hear—of motions which she then saw, but which I could not perceive. The wind was rushing hurriedly behind the tapestries, and I wished to show her (what, let me confess it, I could not all believe) that those almost inarticulate breathings, and those very gentle variations of the figures upon the wall, were but the natural effects of that customary rushing of the wind. But a deadly pallor, overspreading her face, had proved to me that my exertions to reassure her would be fruitless. She appeared to be fainting, and no attendants were within call. I remembered where was deposited a decanter of light wine which had been ordered by her physicians, and hastened across the chamber to procure it. But, as I stepped beneath the light of the censer, two circumstances of a startling nature attracted my attention. I had felt that some palpable although invisible object had passed lightly by my person, and I saw that there lay upon the golden carpet, in the very middle of the rich lustre thrown from the censer, a shadow—a faint, indefinite shadow of angelic aspect—such as might be fancied for the shadow of a shade. But I was wild with the excitement of an immoderate dose of opium, and heeded these things but little, nor spoke of them to Rowena. Having found the wine, I recrossed the chamber, and poured out a gobletful, which I held to the lips of the fainting lady. She had now partially recovered, however, and took the vessel herself, while I sank upon an ottoman near me, with my eyes fastened upon her person. It was then that I became distinctly aware of a gentle footfall upon the carpet, and near the couch, and in a second thereafter, as Rowena was in the act of raising the wine to her lips, I saw, or may have dreamed that I saw, fall within the goblet, as if from some invisible spring in the atmosphere of the room, three or four large drops of a brilliant and ruby-colored fluid. If this I saw—not so Rowena. She swallowed the wine unhesitatingly, and I forbore to speak to her of a circumstance which must after all, I considered, have been but the suggestion of a vivid imagination, rendered morbidly active by the terror of the lady, by the opium, and by the hour.

Yet I cannot conceal it from my own perception that, immediately subsequent to the fall of the ruby-drops, a rapid change for the worse took place in the disorder of my wife; so that, on the third subsequent night, the hands of her menials prepared her for the tomb, and on the fourth, I sat alone, with her shrouded body, in that fantastic chamber which had received her as my bride. Wild visions, opium-engendered, flitted, shadow-like, before me. I gazed with unquiet eye upon the sarcophagi in the angles of the room, upon the varying figures of the drapery, and upon the writhing of the parti-colored fires in the censer overhead. My eyes then fell, as I called to mind the circumstances of a former night, to the spot beneath the glare of the censer where I had seen the faint traces of the shadow. It was there, however, no longer; and breathing with greater freedom, I turned my glances to the pallid and rigid figure upon the bed. Then rushed upon me a thousand memories of Ligeia—and then came back upon my heart, with the turbulent violence of a flood, the whole of that unutterable woe with which I had regarded her thus enshrouded. The night waned, and still, with a bosom full of bitter thoughts of the one only and supremely beloved, I remained gazing upon the body of Rowena

It might have been midnight, or perhaps earlier, or later, for I had taken no note of time, when a sob, low, gentle, but very distinct, startled me from my reverie. I felt that it came from the bed of ebony—the bed of death. I listened in an agony of superstitious terror—but there was no repetition of the sound. I strained my vision to detect any motion in the corpse—but there was not the slightest perceptible. Yet I could not have been deceived. I had heard the noise, however faint, and my soul was awakened within me. I resolutely and perseveringly kept my attention riveted upon the body. Many minutes elapsed before any circumstance occurred tending to throw light upon the mystery. At length it became evident that a slight, a very feeble, and barely noticeable tinge of color had flushed up within the cheeks, and along the sunken small veins of the eyelids. Through a species of unutterable horror and awe, for which the language of mortality has no sufficiently energetic expression, I felt my heart cease to beat, my limbs grow rigid where I sat. Yet a sense of duty finally operated to restore my self-possession. I could no longer doubt that we had been precipitate in our preparations—that Rowena still lived. It was necessary that some immediate exertion be made, yet the turret was altogether apart from the portion of the abbey tenanted by the servants—there were none within call—I had no means of summoning them to my aid without leaving the room for many minutes—and thus I could not venture to do. I therefore struggled alone in my endeavors to call back the spirit still hovering. In a short period it was certain, however, that a relapse had taken place, the color disappeared from both eyelid and cheek, leaving a wanness even more than that of marble, the lips became doubly shrivelled and pinched up in the ghastly expression of death, a repulsive clamminess and coldness overspread rapidly the surface of the body; and all the usual rigorous stiffness immediately supervened. I fell back with a shudder upon the couch from which I had been so startlingly aroused, and again gave myself up to passionate waking visions of Ligeia.

An hour thus elapsed when (could it be possible?) I was a second time aware of some vague sound issuing from the region of the bed. I listened—in extremity of horror. The sound came again—it was a sigh. Rushing to the corpse, I saw—distinctly saw—a tremor upon the lips. In a minute afterwards they relaxed, disclosing a bright line of the pearly teeth. Amazement now struggled in my bosom with the profound awe which had hitherto reigned there alone. I felt that my vision grew dim, that my reason wandered, and it was only by a violent effort that I at length succeeded in nerving myself to the task which duty thus once more had pointed out. There was now a partial glow upon the forehead and upon the cheek and throat, a perceptible warmth pervaded the whole frame, there was even a slight pulsation at the heart. The lady lived, and with redoubled ardor I betook myself to the task of restoration. I chafed and bathed the temples and the hands, and used every exertion which experience, and no little medical reading, could suggest. But in vain. Suddenly, the color fled, the pulsation ceased, the lips resumed the expression of the dead, and, in an instant afterward, the whole body took upon itself the icy chilliness, the livid hue, the intense rigidity, the sunken outline, and all the loathsome peculiarities of that which has been, for many days, a tenant of the tomb.

And again I sunk into visions of Ligeia—and again, (what marvel that I shudder while I write?) again there reached my ears a low sob from the region of the ebony bed. But why shall I minutely detail the unspeakable horrors of that night? Why shall I pause to relate how, time after time, until near the period of the gray dawn, this hideous drama of revivification was repeated, how each terrific relapse was only into a sterner and apparently more irredeemable death, how each agony wore the aspect of a struggle with some invisible foe, and how each struggle was succeeded by I know not what of wild change in the personal appearance of the corpse? Let me hurry to a conclusion.

The greater part of the fearful night had worn away, and she who had been dead, once again stirred—and now more vigorously than hitherto, although arousing from a dissolution more appalling in its utter helplessness than any I had long ceased to struggle or to move, and remained sitting rigidly upon the ottoman, a helpless prey to a whirl of violent emotions, of which extreme awe was perhaps the least terrible, the least consuming. The corpse, I repeat, stirred, and now more vigorously than before. The hues of life flushed up with unwonted energy into the countenance—the limbs relaxed—and, save that the eyelids were yet pressed heavily together, and that the bandages and draperies of the grave still imparted their charnel character to the figure, I might have dreamed that Rowena had indeed shaken off, utterly, the fetters of Death. But if this idea was not, even then, altogether adopted, I could at least doubt no longer, when, arising from the bed, tottering, with feeble steps, with closed eyes, and with the manner of one bewildered in a dream, the thing that was enshrouded advanced boldly and palpably into the middle of the apartment.

I trembled not—I stirred not—for a crowd of unutterable fancies connected with the air, the stature, the demeanor of the figure, rushing hurriedly through my brain, had paralyzed—had chilled me into stone. I stirred not—but gazed upon the apparition. There was a mad disorder in my thoughts—a tumult unappeasable. Could it, indeed, be the living Rowena who confronted me? Could it indeed be Rowena at all—the fair-haired, the blue-eyed Lady Rowena Trevanion of Tremaine? Why, why should I doubt it? The bandage lay heavily about the mouth—but then might it not be the mouth of the breathing Lady of Tremaine? And the cheeks—there were the roses as in her noon of life—yes, these might indeed be the fair cheeks of the living Lady of Tremaine. And the chin, with its dimples, as in health, might it not be hers? but had she then grown taller since her malady? What inexpressible madness seized me with that thought? One bound, and I had reached her feet! Shrinking from my touch, she let fall from her head, un-loosened, the ghastly cerements which had confined it, and there streamed forth, into the rushing atmosphere of the chamber, huge masses of long and dishevelled hair, it was blacker than the raven wings of the midnight! And now slowly opened the eyes of the figure which stood before me. 'Here then, at least,' I shrieked aloud, 'can I never—can I never be mistaken—these are the full, and the black, and the wild eyes—of my lost love—of the lady—of the LADY LIGEIA.'

THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF USHER

Son cœur est un luth suspendu; Sitôt qu'on le touche il resonance<sup>1</sup>

DE BÉRANGER.

DURING the whole of a dull, dark, and soundless day in the autumn of the year, when the clouds hung oppressively low in the heavens, I had been passing alone, on horseback, through a singularly dreary tract of country, and at length found myself, as the shades of the evening drew on, within view of the melancholy House of Usher. I know not how it was—but, with the first glimpse of the building, a sense of insufferable gloom pervaded my spirit. I say insufferable, for the feeling was unrelieved by any of that half-pleasurable, because poetic, sentiment, with which the mind usually receives even the sternest natural images of the desolate or terrible. I looked upon the scene before me—upon the mere house, and the simple landscape features of the domain, upon the bleak walls, upon the vacant eye-like windows, upon a few rank sedges, and upon a few white trunks of decayed trees—with an utter depression of soul which I can compare to no earthly sensation more properly than to the after-dream of the reveller upon opium, the bitter lapse into everyday life, the hideous dropping off of the veil. There was an iciness, a sinking, a sickening of the heart, an unredeemed dreariness of thought which no goading of the imagination could torture into aught of the sublime. What was it—I paused to think—what was it that so unnerved me in the contemplation of the House of Usher? It was a mystery all insoluble, nor could I grapple with the shadowy fancies that crowded upon me as I pondered. I was forced to fall back upon the unsatisfactory conclusion, that while, beyond doubt, there are combinations of very simple natural objects which have the power of thus affecting us, still the analysis of this power lies among considerations beyond our depth. It was possible, I reflected, that a mere different arrangement of the particulars of the scene, of the details of the picture, would be sufficient to modify, or perhaps to annihilate its capacity for sorrowful impression, and, acting upon this idea, I reined my horse to the precipitous brink of a black and lurid tarn that lay in unruffled lustre by the dwelling, and gazed down—but with a shudder even more thrilling than before—upon the remodelled and inverted images of the gray sedge, and the ghastly tree-stems, and the vacant and eye-like windows

Nevertheless, in this mansion of gloom I now proposed to myself a sojourn of some weeks. Its proprietor, Roderick Usher, had been one of my boon companions in boyhood, but many years had elapsed since our last meeting. A letter, however, had lately reached me in a distant part of the country—a letter from him—which, in its wildly importunate nature, had admitted of no other than a personal reply. The MS gave evidence of nervous agitation. The writer spoke of acute bodily illness, of a mental disorder which oppressed him, and of an earnest desire to see me, as his best, and indeed his only personal friend, with a view of attempting, by the cheerfulness of my society, some alleviation of his malady. It was the manner in which all this, and much more, was said—it was the apparent heart that went with his request—which allowed me no room for hesitation, and I accordingly obeyed forthwith what I still considered a very singular summons.

Although, as boys, we had been even intimate associates, yet I really knew little of my friend. His reserve had been always excessive and habitual. I was aware, however, that his very ancient family had been noted, time out of mind, for a peculiar sensibility of temperament, displaying itself, through long ages, in many works of exalted art, and manifested, of late, in repeated deeds of munificent yet unobtrusive charity, as well as in a passionate devotion to the intricacies, perhaps even more than to the orthodox and easily recognizable beauties, of musical science. I had learned, too, the very remarkable fact, that the stem of the Usher race, all time-honored as it was, had put forth, at no period, any enduring branch, in other words, that the entire family lay in the direct line of descent, and had always, with very trifling and very temporary variation, so lain. It was this deficiency, I considered, while running over in thought the perfect keeping of the character of the premises with the accredited character of the people, and while speculating upon the possible influence which the one, in the long lapse of centuries, might have exercised upon the other—it was this deficiency, perhaps, of collateral issue, and the consequent undeviating transmission, from sire to son, of the patrimony with the name, which had, at length, so identified the two as to merge the original title of the estate in the quaint and equivocal appellation of the 'House of Usher'—an appellation which seemed to include, in the minds of the peasantry who used it, both the family and the family mansion.

I have said that the sole effect of my somewhat childish experiment, that of looking down within the tarn, had been to deepen the first singular impression. There can be no doubt that the consciousness of the rapid increase of my superstition—for why should I not so term it?—served mainly to accelerate the increase itself. Such, I have long known, is the paradoxical law of all sentiments having terror as a basis. And it might have been for this reason only, that, when I again uplifted my eyes to the house itself, from its image in the pool, there grew in my mind a strange fancy—a fancy so ridiculous, indeed, that I but mention it to show the vivid force of the sensations which oppressed me. I had so worked upon my imagination as really to believe that about the whole mansion and domain there hung an atmosphere peculiar to themselves and their immediate vicinity—an atmosphere which had no affinity with the air of heaven, but which had reeked up from the decayed trees, and the gray wall, and the silent tarn—a pestilent and mystic vapor, dull, sluggish, faintly discernible, and leaden-hued

Shaking off from my spirit what must have been a dream, I scanned more narrowly the real aspect of the building. Its principal feature seemed to be that of an excessive antiquity. The discoloration of ages had been great. Minute fungi overspread the whole exterior, hanging in a fine tangled web-work from the eaves. Yet all this was apart from any extraordinary dilapidation. No portion of the masonry had fallen; and there appeared to be a wild inconsistency between its still perfect adaptation of parts and the crumbling condition of the individual stones. In this there was much that reminded me of the specious totality of old wood-work which has rotted for long years in some neglected vault, with no disturbance from the breath of the external air. Beyond this indication of extensive decay, however, the fabric gave little token of instability. Perhaps the eye of a scrutinizing observer might have discovered a barely perceptible fissure, which, extending from the roof of the building in front, made its way down the wall in a zigzag direction, until it became lost in the sullen waters of the tarn.

Noticing these things, I rode over a short causeway to the house. A servant in waiting took my horse, and I entered the Gothic archway of the hall. A valet, of stealthy step, thence conducted me, in silence, through many dark and intricate passages in my progress to the studio of his master. Much that I encountered on the way contributed, I know not how, to heighten the vague sentiments of which I have already spoken. While the objects around me—while the carvings of the ceilings, the sombre tapestries of the walls, the ebon blackness of the floors, and the phantasmagoric armorial trophies which rattled as I strode, were but matters to which, or to such as which, I had been accustomed from my infancy—while I hesitated not to acknowledge how familiar was all this—I still wondered to find how unfamiliar were the fancies which ordinary images were stirring up. On one of the staircases, I met the physician of the family. His countenance, I thought, wore a mingled expression of low cunning and perplexity. He accosted me with trepidation and passed on. The valet now threw open a door and ushered me into the presence of his master.

The room in which I found myself was very large and lofty. The windows were long, narrow, and pointed, and at so vast a distance from the black oaken floor as to be altogether inaccessible from within. Feeble gleams of encrimsoned light made their way through the trellised panes, and served to render sufficiently distinct the more prominent objects around, the eye, however, struggled in vain to reach the remoter angles of the chamber, or the recesses of the vaulted and fretted ceiling. Dark draperies hung upon the walls. The general furniture was profuse, comfortless, antique, and tattered. Many books and musical instruments lay scattered about, but failed to give any vitality to the scene. I felt that I breathed an atmosphere of sorrow. An air of stern, deep, and irredeemable gloom hung over and pervaded all.

Upon my entrance, Usher arose from a sofa on which he had been lying at full length, and greeted me with a vivacious warmth which had much in it, I at first thought, of an overdone cordiality—of the constrained effort of the ennuye man of the world. A glance, however, at his countenance, convinced me of his perfect sincerity. We sat down, and for some moments, while he spoke not, I gazed upon him with a feeling half of pity, half of awe. Surely, man had never before so terribly altered, in so brief a period, as had Roderick Usher! It was with difficulty that I could bring myself to admit the identity of the wan being before me with the companion of my early boyhood. Yet the character of his face had been at all times remarkable. A cadaverousness of complexion, an eye large, liquid, and luminous beyond comparison, lips somewhat thin and very pallid, but of a surpassingly beautiful curve, a nose of a delicate Hebrew model, but with a breadth of nostril unusual in similar formations, a finely moulded chin, speaking, in its want of prominence, of a want of moral energy, hair of a more than web-like softness and tenuity, these features, with an inordinate expansion above the regions of the temple, made up altogether a countenance not easily to be forgotten. And now in the mere exaggeration of the prevailing character of these features, and of the expression they were wont to convey, lay so much of change that I doubted to whom I spoke. The now ghastly pallor of the skin, and the now miraculous lustre of the eye, above all things startled and even awed me. The silken hair, too, had been suffered to grow all unheeded, and as, in its wild gossamer texture, it floated rather than fell about the face, I could not, even with effort, connect its Arabesque expression with any idea of simple humanity

In the manner of my friend I was at once struck with an incoherence, an inconsistency, and I soon found this to arise from a series of feeble and futile struggles to overcome an habitual trepidancy, an excessive nervous agitation. For something of this nature I had indeed been prepared, no less by his letter, than by reminiscences of certain boyish traits, and by conclusions deduced from his peculiar physical conformation and temperament. His action was alternately vivacious and sullen. His voice varied rapidly from a tremulous indecision (when the animal spirits seemed utterly in abeyance) to that species of energetic concision—that abrupt, weighty, unhurried, and hollow-sounding enunciation—that leaden, self-balanced and perfectly modulated guttural utterance, which may be observed in the lost drunkard, or the irreclaimable eater of opium, during the periods of his most intense excitement

It was thus that he spoke of the object of my visit, of his earnest desire to see me, and of the solace he expected me to afford him. He entered, at some length, into what he conceived to be the nature of his malady. It was, he said, a constitutional and a family evil, and one for which he despaired to find a remedy—a mere nervous affection, he immediately added, which would undoubtedly soon pass off. It displayed itself in a host of unnatural sensations. Some of these, as he detailed them, interested and bewildered me, although, perhaps, the terms, and the general manner of the narration had their weight. He suffered much from a morbid acuteness of the senses, the most insipid food was alone endurable, he could wear only garments of certain texture, the odors of all flowers were oppressive, his eyes were tortured by even a faint light, and there were but peculiar sounds, and these from stringed instruments, which did not inspire him with horror found him a bounden slave 'I shall perish,' said he, 'I must perish in this deplorable folly. Thus, thus, and not otherwise, shall I be lost. I dread the events of the future, not in themselves, but in their results. I shudder at the thought of any, even the most trivial, incident, which may operate upon this intolerable agitation of soul. I have, indeed, no abhorrence of danger, except in its absolute effect—in terror. In this unnerved—in this pitiable condition, I feel that the period will sooner or later arrive when I must abandon life and reason together, in some struggle with the grim phantasm, FEAR.'

I learned, moreover, at intervals, and through broken and equivocal hints, another singular feature of his mental condition. He was enchained by certain superstitious impressions in regard to the dwelling which he tenanted, and whence, for many years, he had never ventured forth—in regard to an influence whose supposititious force was conveyed in terms too shadowy here to be re-stated—an influence which some peculiarities in the mere form and substance of his family mansion, had, by dint of long sufferance, he said, obtained over his spirit—an effect which the physique of the gray walls and turrets, and of the dim tarn into which they all looked down, had, at length, brought about upon the morale of his existence.

He admitted, however, although with hesitation, that much of the peculiar gloom which thus afflicted him could be traced to a more natural and far more palpable origin—to the severe and long-continued illness, indeed to the evidently approaching dissolution, of a tenderly beloved sister—his sole companion for long years, his last and only relative on earth. 'Her decease,' he said, with a bitterness which I can never forget, 'would leave him (him the hopeless and the frail) the last of the ancient race of the Ushers.' While he spoke, the lady Madeline (for so was she called) passed slowly through a remote portion of the apartment, and, without having noticed my presence, disappeared. I regarded her with an utter astonishment not unmingled with dread, and yet I found it impossible to account for such feelings. A sensation of stupor oppressed me, as my eyes followed her retreating steps. When a door, at length, closed upon her, my glance sought instinctively and eagerly the countenance of the brother, but he had buried his face in his hands, and I could only perceive that a far more than ordinary wanness had overspread the emaciated fingers through which trickled many passionate tears

The disease of the lady Madeline had long baffled the skill of her physicians. A settled apathy, a gradual wasting away of the person, and frequent although transient affections of a partially cataleptical character, were the unusual diagnosis. Hitherto she had steadily borne up against the pressure of her malady, and had not betaken herself finally to bed, but, on the closing in of the evening of my arrival at the house, she succumbed (as her brother told me at night with inexpressible agitation) to the prostrating power of the destroyer, and I learned that the glimpse I had obtained of her person would thus probably be the last I should obtain—that the lady, at least while living, would be seen by me no more.

For several days ensuing, her name was unmentioned by either Usher or myself and during this period I was busied in earnest endeavors to alleviate the melancholy of my friend. We painted and read together, or I listened, as if in a dream, to the wild improvisations of his speaking guitar. And thus, as a closer and still closer intimacy admitted me more unreservedly into the recesses of his spirit, the more bitterly did I perceive the futility of all attempt at cheering a mind from which darkness, as if an inherent positive quality, poured forth upon all objects of the moral and physical universe, in one unceasing radiation of gloom.

I shall ever bear about me a memory of the many solemn hours I thus spent alone with the master of the House of Usher. Yet I should fail in any attempt to convey an idea of the exact character of the studies, or of the occupations, in which he involved me, or led me the way. An excited and highly distempered idealism threw a sulphureous lustre over all. His long improvised dirges will ring forever in my ears. Among other things, I hold painfully in mind a certain singular perversion and amplification of the wild air of the last waltz of Von Weber. From the paintings over which his elaborate fancy brooded, and which grew, touch by touch, into vaguenesses at which I shuddered the more thrillingly, because I shuddered knowing not why;—from these paintings (vivid as their images now are before me) I would in vain endeavor to educe more than a small portion which should lie within the compass of merely written words. By the utter simplicity, by the nakedness of his designs, he arrested and overawed attention. If ever mortal painted an idea, that mortal was Roderick Usher. For me at least, in the circumstances then surrounding me, there arose out of the pure abstractions which the hypochondriac contrived to throw upon his canvas, an intensity of intolerable awe, no shadow of which felt I ever yet in the contemplation of the certainly glowing yet too concrete reveries of Fuseli.

One of the phantasmagoric conceptions of my friend, partaking not so rigidly of the spirit of abstraction, may be shadowed forth, although feebly, in words. A small picture presented the interior of an immensely long and rectangular vault or tunnel, with low walls, smooth, white, and without interruption or device. Certain accessory points of the design served well to convey the idea that this excavation lay at an exceeding depth below the surface of the earth. No outlet was observed in any portion of its vast extent, and no torch, or other artificial source of light was discernible, yet a flood of intense rays rolled throughout, and bathed the whole in a ghastly and inappropriate splendor.

I have just spoken of that morbid condition of the auditory nerve which rendered all music intolerable to the sufferer, with the exception of certain effects of stringed instruments. It was, perhaps, the narrow limits to which he thus confined himself upon the guitar, which gave birth, in great measure, to the fantastic character of his performances. But the fervid facility of his impromptus could not be so accounted for. They must have been, and were, in the notes, as well as in the words of his wild fantasias (for he not unfrequently accompanied himself with rhymed verbal improvisations), the result of that intense mental collectedness and concentration to which I have previously alluded as observable only in particular moments of the highest artificial excitement. The words of one of these rhapsodies I have easily remembered I was, perhaps, the more forcibly impressed with it, as he gave it, because, in the under or mystic current of its meaning, I fancied that I perceived, and for the first time, a full consciousness on the part of Usher, of the tottering of his lofty reason upon her throne. The verses, which were entitled 'The Haunted Palace,'<sup>1</sup> ran very nearly, if not accurately, thus

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted, Once a fair and stately palace—Radiant palace—reared its head In the monarch Thought's dominion, It stood there!
Never seraph spread a pinion Over fabric half so fair!

2

Banners yellow, glorious, golden,
On its roof did float and flow (This—all this—was in the olden Time long ago)
And every gentle air that dallied,
In that sweet day,
Along the ramparts plumed and pallid,
A winged odor went away

3

Wanderers in that happy valley, Through two luminous windows, saw Spirits moving musically
To a lute's well-tuned law, Round about a throne where, sitting, Porphyrogene!
In state his glory well befitting,
The ruler of the realm was seen.

4

And all with pearl and ruby glowing Was the fair palace door, Through which came flowing, flowing, flowing
And sparkling evermore, A troop of Echoes, whose sweet duty Was but to sing,
In voices of surpassing beauty,
The wit and wisdom of their king.

5

But evil things, in robes of sorrow, Assailed the monarch's high estate; (Ah, let us mourn!—for never morrow Shall dawn upon him, desolate!)
And round about his home the glory That blushed and bloomed Is but a dim-remembered story Of the old time entombed

6

And travellers, now, within that valley, Through the red-litten windows see Vast forms that move fantastically
To a discordant melody, While, like a ghastly rapid river,
Through the pale door
A hideous throng rush out forever,
And laugh—but smile no more

I well remember that suggestions arising from this ballad, led us into a train of thought wherein there became manifest an opinion of Usher's which I mention not so much on account of its novelty, (for other men<sup>2</sup> have thought thus), as on account of the pertinacity with which he maintained it. This opinion, in its general form, was that of the sentence of all vegetable things. But, in his disordered fancy, the idea had assumed a more daring character, and trespassed, under certain conditions, upon the kingdom of inorganization. I lack words to express the full extent, or the earnest abandonment of his persuasion. The belief, however, was connected (as I have previously hinted) with the gray stones of the home of his forefathers. The conditions of the sentence had been here, he imagined, fulfilled in the method of collocation of these stones—in the order of their arrangement, as well as in that of the many fungi which overspread them, and of the decayed trees which stood around—above all, in the long undisturbed endurance of this arrangement, and in its reduplication in the still waters of the tarn. Its evidence—the evidence of the sentence—was to be seen, he said, (and I here started as he spoke), in the gradual yet certain condensation of an atmosphere of their own about the waters and the walls. The result was discoverable, he added, in that silent, yet importunate and terrible influence which for centuries had moulded the destinies of his family, and which made him what I now saw him—what he was. Such opinions need no comment, and I will make none

Our books—the books which, for years, had formed no small portion of the mental existence of the invalid—were, as might be supposed, in strict keeping with this character of phantasm. We pored together over such works as the Ververt et Chartreuse of Gresset; the Belphegor of Machiavelli, the Heaven and Hell of Swedenborg, the Subterranean Voyage of Nicholas Klumm by Holberg; the Chiromancy of Robert Flud, of Jean D'Indaginé, and of De la Chambre, the Journey into the Blue Distance of Tieck, and the City of the Sun of Campanella. One favorite volume was a small octavo edition of the Directorium Inquisitorum, by the Dominican Eymeric de Gironne, and there were passages in Pomponius Mela, about the old African Satyrs and Ægipans, over which Usher would sit dreaming for hours. His chief delight, however, was found in the perusal of an exceedingly rare and curious book in quarto Gothic—the manual of a forgotten church—the Vigiliæ Mortuorum Secundum Chorū Ecclesiæ Maguntinæ

I could not help thinking of the wild ritual of this work, and of its probable influence upon the hypochondriac, when, one evening, having informed me abruptly that the lady Madeline was no more, he stated his intention of preserving her corpse for a fortnight, (previously to its final interment), in one of the numerous vaults within the main walls of the building. The worldly reason, however, assigned for this singular proceeding, was one which I did not feel at liberty to dispute. The brother had been led to his resolution (so he told me) by consideration of the unusual character of the malady of the deceased, of certain obtrusive and eager inquiries on the part of her medical men, and of the remote and exposed situation of the burial-ground of the family. I will not deny that when I called to mind the sinister countenance of the person whom I met upon the staircase, on the day of my arrival at the house, I had no desire to oppose what I regarded as at best but a harmless, and by no means an unnatural, precaution

At the request of Usher, I personally aided him in the arrangements for the temporary entombment. The body having been encoffined, we two alone bore it to its rest. The vault in which we placed it (and which had been so long unopened that our torches, half smothered in its oppressive atmosphere, gave us little opportunity for investigation) was small, damp, and entirely without means of admission for light, lying, at great depth, immediately beneath that portion of the building in which was my own sleeping apartment. It had been used, apparently, in remote feudal times, for the worst purposes of a donjon-keep, and, in later days, as a place of deposit for powder, or some other highly combustible substance, as a portion of its floor, and the whole interior of a long archway through which we reached it, were carefully sheathed with copper. The door, of massive iron, had been, also, similarly protected. Its immense weight caused an unusually sharp grating sound, as it moved upon its hinges.

Having deposited our mournful burden upon tressels within this region of horror, we partially turned aside the yet unscrewed lid of the coffin, and looked upon the face of the tenant. A striking similitude between the brother and sister now first arrested my attention, and Usher, divining, perhaps, my thoughts, murmured out some few words from which I learned that the deceased and himself had been twins, and that sympathies of a scarcely intelligible nature had always existed between them. Our glances, however, rested not long upon the dead—for we could not regard her unawed. The disease which had thus entombed the lady in the maturity of youth, had left, as usual in all maladies of a strictly cataleptical character, the mockery of a faint blush upon the bosom and the face, and that suspiciously lingering smile upon the lip which is so terrible in death. We replaced and screwed down the lid, and, having secured the door of iron, made our way, with toil, into the scarcely less gloomy apartments of the upper portion of the house.

And now, some days of bitter grief having elapsed, an observable change came over the features of the mental disorder of my friend. His ordinary manner had vanished. His ordinary occupations were neglected or forgotten. He roamed from chamber to chamber with hurried, unequal, and objectless step. The pallor of his countenance had assumed, if possible, a more ghastly hue—but the luminousness of his eye had utterly gone out. The once occasional huskiness of his tone was heard no more, and a tremulous quaver, as if of extreme terror, habitually characterized his utterance. There were times, indeed, when I thought his unceasingly agitated mind was laboring with some oppressive secret, to divulge which he struggled for the necessary courage. At times, again, I was obliged to resolve all into the mere inexplicable vagaries of madness, for I beheld him gazing upon vacancy for long hours, in an attitude of the profoundest attention, as if listening to some imaginary sound. It was no wonder that his condition terrified—that it infected me. I felt creeping upon me, by slow yet certain degrees, the wild influences of his own fantastic yet impressive superstitions.

It was, especially, upon retiring to bed late in the night of the seventh or eighth day after the placing of the lady Madeline within the donjon, that I experienced the full power of such feelings. Sleep came not near my couch, while the hours waned and waned away. I struggled to reason off the nervousness which had dominion over me. I endeavored to believe that much, if not all of what I felt, was due to the bewildering influence of the gloomy furniture of the room—of the dark and tattered draperies, which, tortured into motion by the breath of a rising tempest, swayed fitfully to and fro upon the walls, and rustled uneasily about the decorations of the bed. But my efforts were fruitless. An irrepressible tremor gradually pervaded my frame, and, at length, there sat upon my very heart an incubus of utterly causeless alarm. Shaking this off with a gasp and a struggle, I uplifted myself upon the pillows, and, peering earnestly within the intense darkness of the chamber, hearkened—I know not why, except that an instinctive spirit prompted me—to certain low and indefinite sounds which came, through the pauses of the storm, at long intervals, I knew not whence. Overpowered by an intense sentiment of horror, unaccountable yet unendurable, I threw on my clothes with haste (for I felt that I should sleep no more during the night), and endeavored to arouse myself from the pitiable condition into which I had fallen, by pacing rapidly to and fro through the apartment.

I had taken but few turns in this manner, when a light step on an adjoining staircase arrested my attention. I presently recognized it as that of Usher. In an instant afterward he rapped, with a gentle touch, at my door, and entered, bearing a lamp. His countenance was, as usual, cadaverously wan—but, moreover, there was a species of mad hilarity in his eyes—an evidently restrained hysteria in his whole demeanor. His air appalled me—but anything was preferable to the solitude which I had so long endured, and I even welcomed his presence as a relief.

‘And you have not seen it?’ he said abruptly, after having stared about him for some moments in silence—‘you have not then seen it?’—but, stay! you shall.’ Thus speaking, and having carefully shaded his lamp, he hurried to one of the casements, and threw it freely open to the storm.

The impetuous fury of the entering gust nearly lifted us from our feet. It was, indeed, a tempestuous yet sternly beautiful night, and one wildly singular in its terror and its beauty. A whirlwind had apparently collected its force in our vicinity, for there were frequent and violent alterations in the direction of the wind, and the exceeding density of the clouds (which hung so low as to press upon the turrets of the house) did not prevent our perceiving the life-like velocity with which they flew careering from all points against each other, without passing away into the distance. I say that even their exceeding density did not prevent our perceiving this, yet we had no glimpse of the moon or stars, nor was there any flashing forth of the lightning. But the under surfaces of the huge masses of agitated vapor, as well as all terrestrial objects immediately around us, were glowing in the unnatural light of a faintly luminous and distinctly visible gaseous exhalation which hung about and enshrouded the mansion.

‘You must not—you shall not behold this!’ said I, shudderingly, to Usher, as I led him, with a gentle violence, from the window to a seat. ‘These appearances, which bewilder you, are merely electrical phenomena not uncommon—or it may be that they have their ghastly origin in the rank miasma of the tarn. Let us close this casement, the air is chilling and dangerous to your frame. Here is one of your favorite romances I will read, and you shall listen,—and so we will pass away this terrible night together.’

The antique volume which I had taken up was the Mad Trist of Sir Launcelot Canning, but I had called it a favorite of Usher’s more in sad jest than in earnest, for, in truth, there is little in its uncouth and unimaginative prolixity which could have had interest for the lofty and spiritual ideality of my friend. It was, however, the only book immediately at hand, and I indulged a vague hope that the excitement which now agitated the hypochondriac might find relief (for the history of mental disorder is full of similar anomalies) even in the extremeness of the folly which I should read. Could I have judged, indeed, by the wild overstrained air of vivacity with which he hearkened, or apparently hearkened, to the words of the tale, I might well have congratulated myself upon the success of my design.

I had arrived at that well-known portion of the story where Ethelred, the hero of the Trist, having sought in vain for peaceable admission into the dwelling of the hermit, proceeds to make good an entrance by force. Here, it will be remembered, the words of the narrative run thus:

‘And Ethelred, who was by nature of a doughty heart, and who was now mighty withal, on account of the powerfulness of the wine which he had drunken, waited no longer to hold parley with the hermit, who, in sooth, was of an obstinate and malicious turn, but, feeling the rain upon his shoulders, and fearing the rising of the tempest, uplifted his mace outright, and, with blows, made quickly room in the plankings of the door for his gauntleted hand, and now pulling therewith sturdily, he so cracked, and ripped, and tore all asunder, that the noise of the dry and hollow-sounding wood alarumed and reverberated throughout the forest.’

At the termination of this sentence I started, and for a moment, paused, for it appeared to me (although I at once concluded that my excited fancy had deceived me)—it appeared to me that, from some very remote portion of the mansion, there came, indistinctly, to my ears, what might have been, in its exact similarity of character, the echo (but a stifled and dull one certainly) of the very cracking and ripping sound which Sir Launcelot had so particularly described. It was, beyond doubt, the coincidence alone which had arrested my attention, for, amid the rattling of the sashes of the casements, and the ordinary commingled noises of the still increasing storm, the sound, in itself, had nothing, surely, which should have interested or disturbed me. I continued the story.

‘But the good champion Ethelred, now entering within the door, was sore enraged and amazed to perceive no signal of the malicious hermit, but, in the stead thereof, a dragon of a scaly and prodigious demeanor, and of a fiery tongue, which sat in guard before a palace of gold, with a floor of silver, and upon the wall there hung a shield of shining brass with this legend enwritten—

Who entereth herem, a conqueror hath bin, Who slayeth the dragon, the shield he shall win,

And Ethelred uplifted his mace, and struck upon the head of the dragon, which fell before him, and gave up his pesty breath, with a shriek so horrid and harsh, and withal so piercing, that Ethelred had fain to close his ears with his hands against the dreadful noise of it, the like whereof was never before heard.’

Here again I paused abruptly, and now with a feeling of wild amazement—for there could be no doubt whatever that, in this instance, I did actually hear (although from what direction it proceeded I found it impossible to say) a low and apparently distant, but harsh, protracted, and most unusual screaming or grating sound—the exact counterpart of what my fancy had already conjured up for the dragon’s unnatural shriek as described by the romancer.

Oppressed, as I certainly was, upon the occurrence of the second and most extraordinary coincidence, by a thousand conflicting sensations, in which wonder and extreme terror were predominant, I still retained sufficient presence of mind to avoid exciting, by any observation, the sensitive nervousness of my companion. I was by no means certain that he had noticed the sounds in question, although, assuredly, a strange alteration had, during the last few minutes, taken place in his demeanor. From a position fronting my own, he had gradually brought round his chair, so as to sit with his face to the door of the chamber, and thus I could but partially perceive his features, although I saw that his lips trembled as if he were murmuring inaudibly. His head had dropped upon his breast—yet I knew that he was not asleep, from the wide and rigid opening of the eye as I caught a glance of it in profile. The motion of his body, too, was at variance with this idea—for he rocked from side to side with a gentle yet constant and uniform sway. Having rapidly taken notice of all this, I resumed the narrative of Sir Launcelot, which thus proceeded:

‘And now, the champion, having escaped from the terrible fury of the dragon, bethinking himself of the brazen shield, and of the breaking up of the enchantment which was upon it, removed the carcass from out of the way before him, and approached valorously over the silver pavement of the castle to where the shield was upon the wall, which in sooth tarried not for his full coming, but fell down at his feet upon the silver floor, with a mighty great and terrible ringing sound.’

No sooner had these syllables passed my lips, than—as if a shield of brass had indeed, at the moment, fallen heavily upon a floor of silver—I became aware of a distinct, hollow, metallic and clangorous yet apparently muffled reverberation. Completely unnerved, I leaped to my feet, but the measured rocking movement of Usher was undisturbed. I rushed to the chair in which he sat. His eyes were bent fixedly before him, and throughout his whole countenance there reigned a stony rigidity. But as I placed my hand upon his shoulder, there came a strong shudder over his whole person, a sickly smile quivered about his lips; and I saw that he spoke in a low, hurried, and gibbering murmur, as if unconscious of my presence. Bending closely over him, I at length drank in the hideous import of his words.

‘Not hear it?—yes, I hear it, and have heard it. Long—long—long—many minutes, many hours, many days, have I heard it—yet I dared not—oh, pity me, miserable wretch that I am!—I dared not—I dared not speak! We have put her living in the tomb!’ Said I not that my senses were acute? I now tell you that I heard her first feeble movements in the hollow coffin. I heard them—many, many days ago—yet I dared not—I dared not speak! And now—to-night—Ethelred—ha! ha!—the breaking of the hermit’s door, and the death-cry of the dragon, and the clangor of the shield!—say, rather, the rending of her coffin, and the grating of the iron hinges of her prison, and her struggles within the coppered archway of the vault! Oh whither shall I fly? Will she not be here anon? Is she not hurrying to upbraid me for my haste? Have I not heard her footstep on the stair? Do I not distinguish that heavy and horrible beating of her heart? MADMAN! here he sprang furiously to his feet, and shrieked out his syllables, as if in the effort he were giving up his soul—‘Madman! I tell you that she now stands without the door!’

As if in the superhuman energy of his utterance there had been found the potency of a spell, the huge antique panels to which the speaker pointed, threw slowly back, upon the instant, their ponderous and ebony jaws. It was the work of the rushing gust—but then without those doors there DID stand the lofty and enshrouded figure of the lady Madeline of Usher. There was blood upon her white robes, and the evidence of some bitter struggle upon every portion of her emaciated frame. For a moment she remained trembling and reeling to and fro upon the threshold—then, with a low moaning cry, fell heavily inward upon the person of her brother, and in her violent and now final death-agonies, bore him to the floor a corpse, and a victim to the terrors he had anticipated.

From that chamber, and from that mansion, I fled aghast. The storm was still abroad in all its wrath as I found myself crossing the old causeway Suddenly there shot along the path a wild light, and I turned to see whence a gleam so unusual could have issued, for the vast house and its shadows were alone behind me. The radiance was that of the full, setting, and blood-red moon which now shone vividly through that once barely-discernible fissure of which I have before spoken as extending from the roof of the building, in a zigzag direction, to the base While I gazed, this fissure rapidly widened—there came a fierce breath of the whirlwind—the entire orb of the satellite burst at once upon my sight—my brain reeled as I saw the mighty walls rushing asunder—there was a long tumultuous shouting sound like the voice of a thousand waters—and the deep and dank tarn at my feet closed sullenly and silently over the fragments of the HOUSE OF USHER c 1839 1840

THE CASK OF AMONTILLADO

THE thousand injuries of Fortunato I had borne as I best could, but when he ventured upon insult I vowed revenge You, who so well know the nature of my soul, will not suppose, however, that I gave utterance to a threat At length I would be avenged, this was a point definitely settled—but the very definitiveness with which it was resolved precluded the idea of risk. I must not only punish but punish with impunity A wrong is unredressed when retribution overtakes its redresser It is equally unredressed when the avenger fails to make himself felt as such to him who has done the wrong

It must be understood that neither by word nor deed had I given Fortunato cause to doubt my good will I continued, as was my wont, to smile in his face, and he did not perceive that my smile now was at the thought of his immolation.

He had a weak point—this Fortunato—although in other regards he was a man to be respected and even feared. He prided himself on his connoisseurship in wine Few Italians have the true virtuoso spirit. For the most part their enthusiasm is adopted to suit the time and opportunity, to practise imposture upon the British and Austrian millionaires In painting and gem-a quack, but in the matter of old wines he was sincere In this respect I did not differ from him materially,—I was skilful in the Italian vintages myself, and bought largely whenever I could.

It was about dusk, one evening during the supreme madness of the carnival season, that I encountered my friend He accosted me with excessive warmth, for he had been drinking much The man wore motley He had on a tight-fitting parti-striped dress, and his head was surmounted by the conical cap and bells I was so pleased to see him that I thought I should never have done wringing his hand

I said to him—‘My dear Fortunato, you are luckily met How remarkably well you are looking to-day But I have received a pipe of what passes for Amontillado, and I have my doubts ’

‘How?’ said he ‘Amontillado? A pipe? Impossible! And in the middle of the carnival!’

‘I have my doubts,’ I replied, ‘and I was silly enough to pay the full Amontillado price without consulting you in the matter You were not to be found, and I was fearful of losing a bargain ’

‘Amontillado!’

‘I have my doubts ’

‘Amontillado!’

‘And I must satisfy them ’

‘Amontillado!’

‘As you are engaged, I am on my way to Luchresi If any one has a critical turn it is he He will tell me—’

‘Luchresi cannot tell Amontillado from Sherry ’

‘And yet some fools will have it that his taste is a match for your own.’

‘Come, let us go ’

‘Whither?’

‘To your vaults ’

‘My friend, no, I will not impose upon your good nature I perceive you have an engagement Luchresi—’

‘I have no engagement;—come.’

‘My friend, no It is not the engagement, but the severe cold with which I perceive you are afflicted The vaults are insufferably damp They are encrusted with nitre ’

‘Let us go, nevertheless The cold is merely nothing Amontillado! You have been imposed upon And as for Luchresi, he cannot distinguish Sherry from Amon-tillado'

Thus speaking, Fortunato possessed himself of my arm, and putting on a mask of black silk and drawing a roquelaire<sup>1</sup> closely about my person, I suffered him to hurry me to my palazzo.

There were no attendants at home, they had absconded to make merry in honor of the time I had told them that I should not return until the morning, and had given them explicit orders not to stir from the house. These orders were sufficient, I well knew, to insure their immediate disappearance, one and all, as soon as my back was turned.

I took from their sconces two flambeaux, and giving one to Fortunato, bowed him through several suites of rooms to the archway that led into the vaults. I passed down a long and winding staircase, requesting him to be cautious as he followed. We came at length to the foot of the descent, and stood together upon the damp ground of the catacombs of the Montresors.

The gait of my friend was unsteady, and the bells upon his cap jingled as he strode.

'The pipe,' he said.

'It is farther on,' said I, 'but observe the white web-work which gleams from these cavern walls.'

He turned towards me, and looked into my eyes with two filmy orbs that distilled the rheum of intoxication.

'Nitre?' he asked, at length.

'Nitre,' I replied. 'How long have you had that cough?'

'Ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!'

My poor friend found it impossible to reply for many minutes.

'It is nothing,' he said, at last.

'Come,' I said, with decision, 'we will go back, your health is precious. You are rich, respected, admired, beloved, you are happy, as once I was. You are a man to be missed. For me it is no matter. We will go back, you will be ill, and I cannot be responsible. Besides, there is Luchresi—'

'Enough,' he said, 'the cough is a mere nothing, it will not kill me. I shall not die of a cough.'

'True—true,' I replied, 'and, indeed, I had no intention of alarming you unnecessarily—but you should use all proper caution. A draught of this Medoc will defend us from the damps.'

Here I knocked off the neck of a bottle which I drew from a long row of its fellows that lay upon the mould.

'Drink,' I said, presenting him the wine.

He raised it to his lips with a leer. He paused and nodded to me familiarly, while his bells jingled.

'I drink,' he said, 'to the buried that repose around us.'

'And I to your long life.'

He again took my arm, and we proceeded.

'These vaults,' he said, 'are extensive.'

'The Montresors,' I replied, 'were a great and numerous family.'

'I forget your arms.'

'A huge human foot d'or, in a field azure, the foot crushes a serpent rampant whose fangs are imbedded in the heel.'

'And the motto?'

'Nemo me impune lacessit.'

'Good!' he said.

The wine sparkled in his eyes and the bells jingled. My own fancy grew warm with the Medoc. We had passed through long walls of piled skeletons, with casks and puncheons intermingling, into the inmost recesses of the catacombs. I paused again, and this time I made bold to seize Fortunato by an arm above the elbow.

'The nitre!' I said, 'see, it increases. It hangs like moss upon the vaults. We are below the river's bed. The drops of moisture trickle among the bones. Come, we will go back ere it is too late. Your cough—'

'It is nothing,' he said, 'let us go on. But first, another draught of the Medoc.'

I broke and reached him a flagon of De Grève. He emptied it at a breath. His eyes flashed with a fierce light. He laughed and threw the bottle upwards with a gesticulation I did not understand.

I looked at him in surprise. He repeated the movement—a grotesque one.

'You do not comprehend?' he said.

'Not I,' I replied.

'Then you are not of the brotherhood?'

'How?'

'You are not of the masons?'

'Yes, yes,' I said, 'yes, yes.'

'You? Impossible! A mason?'

1 A cloak worn in the seventeenth century.

2 'No one can harm me with impunity.'

'A mason,' I replied

'A sign,' he said, 'a sign'

'It is this,' I answered, producing from beneath the folds of my roquelaire a trowel.

'You jest,' he exclaimed, recoiling a few paces 'But let us proceed to the Amontillado'

'Be it so,' I said, replacing the tool beneath the cloak and again offering him my arm. He leaned upon it heavily. We continued our route in search of the Amontillado. We passed through a range of low arches, descended, passed on, and descending again, arrived at a deep crypt, in which the foulness of the air caused our flambeaux rather to glow than flame.

At the most remote end of the crypt there appeared another less spacious. Its walls had been lined with human remains, piled to the vault overhead, in the fashion of the great catacombs of Paris. Three sides of this interior crypt were still ornamented in this manner. From the fourth side the bones had been thrown down, and lay promiscuously upon the earth, forming at one point a mound of some size. Within the wall thus exposed by the displacing of the bones, we perceived a still interior crypt or recess, in depth about four feet, in width three, in height six or seven. It seemed to have been constructed for no especial use within itself, but formed merely the interval between two of the colossal supports of the roof of the catacombs, and was backed by one of their circumscribing walls of solid granite.

It was in vain that Fortunato, uplifting his dull torch, endeavored to pry into the depth of the recess. Its termination the feeble light did not enable us to see.

'Proceed,' I said, 'herein is the Amontillado. As for Luchresi—'

'He is an ignoramus,' interrupted my friend, as he stepped unsteadily forward, while I followed immediately at his heels. In an instant he had reached the extremity of the niche, and finding his progress arrested by the rock, stood stupidly bewildered. A moment more and I had fettered him to the granite. In its surface were two iron staples, distant from each other about two feet, horizontally. From one of these depended a short chain, from the other a padlock. Throwing the links about his waist, it was but the work of a few seconds to secure it. He was too much astounded to resist. Withdrawing the key I stepped back from the recess.

'Pass your hand,' I said, 'over the wall, you cannot help feeling the nitre. Indeed, it is very damp. Once more let me implore you to return. No? Then I must positively leave you. But I must first render you all the little attentions in my power.'

'The Amontillado!' ejaculated my friend, not yet recovered from his astonishment.

'True,' I replied, 'the Amontillado.'

As I said these words I busied myself among the pile of bones of which I have before spoken. Throwing them aside, I soon uncovered a quantity of building stone and mortar. With these materials and with the aid of my trowel, I began vigorously to wall up the entrance of the niche.

I had scarcely laid the first tier of the masonry when I discovered that the intoxication of Fortunato had in a great measure worn off. The earliest indication I had of this was a low moaning cry from the depth of the recess. It was not the cry of a drunken man. There was then a long and obstinate silence. I laid the second tier, and the third, and the fourth, and then I heard the furious vibrations of the chain. The noise lasted for several minutes, during which, that I might hearken to it with the more satisfaction, I ceased my labors and sat down upon the bones. When at last the clanking subsided, I resumed the trowel, and finished without interruption the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh tier. The wall was now nearly upon a level with my breast. I again paused, and holding the flambeaux over the mason-work, threw a few feeble rays upon the figure within.

A succession of loud and shrill screams, bursting suddenly from the throat of the chained form, seemed to thrust me violently back. For a brief moment I hesitated, I trembled. Unsheathing my rapier, I began to grope with it about the recess, but the thought of an instant reassured me. I placed my hand upon the solid fabric of the catacombs, and felt satisfied. I reapproached the wall, I replied to the yells of him who clamored. I re-echoed, I aided, I surpassed them in volume and in strength. I did this, and the clamor grew still.

It was now midnight, and my task was drawing to a close. I had completed the eighth, the ninth and the tenth tier I had finished a portion of the last and the eleventh, there remained but a single stone to be fitted and plastered in I struggled with its weight; I placed it partially in its destined position But now there came from out the niche a low laugh that erected the hairs upon my head It was succeeded by a sad voice, which I had difficulty in recognizing as that of the noble Fortunato The voice said—

'Ha! ha! ha!—he! he! he!—a very good joke, indeed—an excellent jest We will have many a rich laugh about it at the palazzo—he! he! he!—over our wine—he! he! he!'

'The Amontillado!' I said

'He! he! he!—he! he! he!—yes, the Amontillado But is it not getting late? Will not they be awaiting us at the palazzo, the Lady Fortunato and the rest? Let us be gone'

'Yes,' I said, 'let us be gone'

'For the love of God, Montresor!'

'Yes,' I said, 'for the love of God!'

But to these words I hearkened in vain for a reply I grew impatient I called aloud—

'Fortunato!'

No answer I called again—

'Fortunato!'

No answer still I thrust a torch through the remaining aperture and let it fall within There came forth in return only a jingling of the bells My heart grew sick, it was the dampness of the catacombs that made it so I hastened to make an end of my labor I forced the last stone into its position, I plastered it up Against the new masonry I re-erected the old rampart of bones For the half of a century no mortal has disturbed them In pace requiescat!

THE PURLOINED LETTER

Nil sapientiae odiosius acumine nimio<sup>1</sup>

SENECA

At Paris, just after dark one gusty evening in the autumn of 18—, I was enjoying the twofold luxury of meditation and a meerschschaum, in company with my friend

C Auguste Dupin, in his little back library, or book-closet, au troisième, No 33, Rue Dunôt, Faubourg St. Germain For one hour at least we had maintained a profound silence; while each, to any casual observer, might have seemed intently and exclusively occupied with the curling eddies of smoke that oppressed the atmosphere of the chamber For myself, however, I was mentally discussing certain topics which had formed matter for conversation between us at an earlier period of the evening; I mean the affair of the Rue Morgue, and the mystery attending the murder of Marie Rogêt I looked upon it, therefore, as something of a coincidence, when the door of our apartment was thrown open and admitted our old acquaintance, Monsieur G—, the Prefect of the Parisian police

We gave him a hearty welcome, for there was nearly half as much of the entertaining as of the contemptible about the man, and we had not seen him for several years We had been sitting in the dark, and Dupin now arose for the purpose of lighting a lamp, but sat down again, without doing so, upon G's saying that he had called to consult us, or rather to ask the opinion of my friend, about some official business which had occasioned a great deal of trouble

'If it is any point requiring reflection,' observed Dupin, as he forebore to enkindle the wick, 'we shall examine it to better purpose in the dark'

'That is another of your odd notions,' said the Prefect, who had a fashion of calling every thing 'odd' that was beyond his comprehension, and thus lived amid an absolute legion of 'oddities'

'Very true,' said Dupin, as he supplied his visitor with a pipe, and rolled towards him a comfortable chair.

'And what is the difficulty now?' I asked. 'Nothing more in the assassination way, I hope?'

'Oh no; nothing of that nature. The fact is, the business is very simple indeed, and I make no doubt that we can manage it sufficiently well ourselves; but then I thought Dupin would like to hear the details of it, because it is so excessively odd'

'Simple and odd,' said Dupin

'Why, yes; and not exactly that, either The fact is, we have all been a good deal puzzled because the affair is so simple, and yet baffles us altogether'

'Perhaps it is the very simplicity of the thing which puts you at fault,' said my friend

'What nonsense you do talk!' replied the Prefect, laughing heartily

'Perhaps the mystery is a little too plain,' said Dupin.

'Oh, good heavens! who ever heard of such an idea?'

'A little too self-evident'

'Hal' ha! ha!—ha! ha! ha!—ho! ho! ho!'—roared our visitor, profoundly amused, 'oh, Dupin, you will be the death of me yet!'

'And what, after all, is the matter on hand?' I asked

'Why, I will tell you,' replied the Prefect, as he gave a long, steady, and contemplative puff, and settled himself in his chair 'I will tell you in a few words, but, before I begin, let me caution you that this is an affair demanding the greatest secrecy, and that I should most probably lose the position I now hold, were it known that I confided it to any one'

'Proceed,' said I

'Or not,' said Dupin

'Well, then, I have received personal information, from a very high quarter, that a certain document of the last importance has been purloined from the royal apartments The individual who purloined it is known, this beyond a doubt, he was seen to take it It is known, also, that it still remains in his possession'

'How is this known?' asked Dupin

'It is clearly inferred,' replied the Prefect, 'from the nature of the document, and from the non-appearance of certain results which would at once arise from its passing out of the robber's possession,—that is to say, from his employing it as he must design in the end to employ it'

'Be a little more explicit,' I said

'Well, I may venture so far as to say that the paper gives its holder a certain power in a certain quarter where such power is immensely valuable' The Prefect was fond of the cant of diplomacy.

'Still I do not quite understand,' said Dupin

'No? Well, the disclosure of the document to a third person who shall be nameless would bring in question the honor of a personage of most exalted station, and this fact gives the holder of the document an ascendancy over the illustrious personage whose honor and peace are so jeopardized'

'But this ascendancy,' I interposed, 'would depend upon the robber's knowledge of the loser's knowledge of the robber. Who would dare—'

'The thief,' said G—, 'is the Minister D—, who dares all things, those unbecoming as well as those becoming a man The method of the theft was not less ingenious than bold The document in question—a letter, to be frank—had been received by the personage robbed while alone in the royal boudoir During its perusal she was suddenly interrupted by the entrance of the other exalted personage from whom especially it was her wish to conceal it. After a hurried and vain endeavor to thrust it in a drawer, she was forced to place it, open as it was, upon a table. The address, however, was uppermost, and, the contents thus unexposed, the letter escaped notice. At this juncture enters the Minister D— His lynx eye immediately perceives the paper, recognizes the handwriting of the address, observes the confusion of the personage addressed, and fathoms her secret After some business transactions, hurried through in his ordinary manner, he produces a letter somewhat similar to the one in question, opens it, pretends to read it, and then places it in close juxtaposition to the other Again he converses, for some fifteen minutes, upon the public affairs At length, in taking leave, he takes also from the table the letter to which he had no claim It's rightful owner saw, but, of course, dared not call attention to the act, in the presence of the third personage who stood at her elbow The Minister decamped, leaving his own letter—one of no importance—upon the table'

'Here, then,' said Dupin to me, 'you have precisely what you demand to make the ascendancy complete—the robber's knowledge of the loser's knowledge of the robber'

'Yes,' replied the Prefect, 'and the power thus attained has, for some months past, been wielded, for political purposes, to a very dangerous extent. The personage robbed is more thoroughly convinced.

every day, of the necessity of reclaiming her letter. But this, of course, cannot be done openly. In fine, driven to despair, she has committed the matter to me.'

'Than whom,' said Dupin, amid a perfect whirlwind of smoke, 'no more sagacious agent could, I suppose, be desired, or even imagined.'

'You flatter me,' replied the Prefect, 'but it is possible that some such opinion may have been entertained.'

'It is clear,' said I, 'as you observe, that the letter is still in possession of the Minister, since it is this possession, and not any employment of the letter, which bestows the power. With the employment the power departs.'

'True,' said G—, 'and upon this conviction I proceeded. My first care was to make thorough search of the Minister's hotel, and here my chief embarrassment lay in the necessity of searching without his knowledge. Beyond all things, I have been warned of the danger which would result from giving him reason to suspect our design.'

'But,' said I, 'you are quite au fait in these investigations. The Parisian police have done this thing often before.'

'Oh yes, and for this reason I did not despair. The habits of the Minister gave me, too, a great advantage. He is frequently absent from home all night. His servants are by no means numerous. They sleep at a distance from their master's apartment, and, being chiefly Neapolitans, are readily made drunk. I have keys, as you know, with which I can open any chamber or cabinet in Paris. For three months a night has not passed, during the greater part of which I have not been engaged, personally, in ransacking the D— Hôtel. My honor is interested, and, to mention a great secret, the reward is enormous. So I did not abandon the search until I had become fully satisfied that the thief is a more astute man than myself. I fancy that I have investigated every nook and corner of the premises in which it is possible that the paper can be concealed.'

'But is it not possible,' I suggested, 'that although the letter may be in the possession of the Minister, as it unquestionably is, he may have concealed it elsewhere than upon his own premises?'

'This is barely possible,' said Dupin.

'The present peculiar condition of affairs at court, and especially of those intrigues in which D— is known to be involved, would render the instant availability of the document—its susceptibility of being produced at a moment's notice—a point of nearly equal importance with its possession.'

'Its susceptibility of being produced?'

said I

'That is to say, of being destroyed,' said Dupin

'True,' I observed, 'the paper is clearly then upon the premises. As for its being upon the person of the Minister, we may consider that as out of the question.'

'Entirely,' said the Prefect. 'He has been twice waylaid, as if by footpads, and his person rigorously searched under my own inspection.'

'You might have spared yourself this trouble,' said Dupin. 'D—, I presume, is not altogether a fool, and, if not, must have anticipated these waylayings, as a matter of course.'

'Not altogether a fool,' said G—, 'but then he's a poet, which I take to be only one remove from a fool.'

'True,' said Dupin, after a long and thoughtful whiff from his meerschaum, 'although I have been guilty of certain doggerel myself.'

'Suppose you detail,' said I, 'the particulars of your search.'

'Why the fact is, we took our time, and we searched every where. I have had long experience in these affairs. I took the entire building, room by room, devoting the nights of a whole week to each. We examined, first, the furniture of each apartment. We opened every possible drawer, and I presume you know that, to a properly trained police agent, such a thing as a secret drawer is impossible. Any man is a dolt who permits a "secret" drawer to escape him in a search of this kind. The thing is so plain. There is a certain amount of bulk—of space—to be accounted for in every cabinet. Then we have accurate rules. The fiftieth part of a line could not escape us. After the cabinets we took the chairs. The cushions we probed with the fine long needles you have seen me employ. From the tables we removed the tops.'

'Why so?'

'Sometimes the top of a table, or other similarly arranged piece of furniture, is removed by the person wishing to conceal an article, then the leg is excavated, the article deposited within the cavity, and the top replaced. The bottoms and tops of bed-posts are employed in the same way.'

'But could not the cavity be detected by sounding?' I asked.

'By no means, if, when the article is deposited, a sufficient wadding of cotton be placed around it. Besides, in our case, we were obliged to proceed without noise.'

'But you could not have removed—you could not have taken to pieces all articles of furniture in which it would have been possible to make a deposit in the manner you mention. A letter may be compressed into a thin spiral roll, not differing much in shape or bulk from a large knitting-needle, and in this form it might be inserted into the rung of a chair, for example. You did not take to pieces all the chairs?'

'Certainly not, but we did better—we examined the rungs of every chair in the hotel, and, indeed, the jointings of every description of furniture, by the aid of a most powerful microscope. Had there been any traces of recent disturbance we should not have failed to detect it instantly. A single grain of gimlet-dust, for example, would have been as obvious as an apple. Any disorder in the glueing—any unusual gaping in the joints—would have sufficed to insure detection.'

'I presume you looked to the mirrors, between the boards and the plates, and you probed the beds and the bed-clothes, as well as the curtains and carpets.'

'That of course, and when we had absolutely completed every particle of the furniture in this way, then we examined the house itself. We divided its entire surface into compartments, which we numbered, so that none might be missed, then we scrutinized each individual square inch throughout the premises, including the two houses immediately adjoining, with the microscope, as before.'

'The two houses adjoining!' I exclaimed, 'you must have had a great deal of trouble.'

'We had, but the reward offered is prodigious.'

'You include the grounds about the houses?'

'All the grounds are paved with brick. They gave us comparatively little trouble. We examined the moss between the bricks, and found it undisturbed.'

'You looked among D—'s papers, of course, and into the books of the library?'

'Certainly, we opened every package and parcel, we not only opened every book, but we turned over every leaf in each volume, not contenting ourselves with a mere shake, according to the fashion of some of our police officers. We also measured the thickness of every book-cover, with the most accurate admeasurement, and applied to each the most jealous scrutiny of the microscope. Had any of the bindings been recently meddled with, it would have been utterly impossible that the fact should have escaped observation. Some five or six volumes, just from the hands of the binder, we carefully probed, longitudinally, with the needles.'

'You explored the floors beneath the carpets?'

'Beyond doubt. We removed every carpet, and examined the boards with the microscope.'

'And the paper on the walls?'

'Yes.'

'You looked into the cellars?'

'We did.'

'Then,' I said, 'you have been making a miscalculation, and the letter is not upon the premises, as you suppose.'

'I fear you are right there,' said the Prefect. 'And now, Dupin, what would you advise me to do?'

'To make a thorough re-search of the premises.'

'That is absolutely needless,' replied G—. 'I am not more sure that I breathe than I am that the letter is not at the Hôtel.'

'I have no better advice to give you,' said Dupin. 'You have, of course, an accurate description of the letter?'

'Oh yes!'—And here the Prefect, producing a memorandum-book, proceeded to read aloud a minute account of the internal, and especially of the external appearance of the missing document. Soon after finishing the perusal of this description, he took his departure, more entirely depressed in spirits than I had ever known the good gentleman before.

In about a month afterwards he paid us another visit, and found us occupied very nearly as before. He took a pipe and a chair and entered into some ordinary conversation. At length I said,—

‘Well, but G—, what of the purloined letter? I presume you have at last made up your mind that there is no such thing as overreaching the Minister?’

‘Confound him, say I—yes, I made the re-examination, however, as Dupin suggested—but it was all labor lost, as I knew it would be.’

‘How much was the reward offered, did you say?’ asked Dupin.

‘Why, a very great deal—a very liberal reward—I don’t like to say how much, precisely, but one thing I will say, that I wouldn’t mind giving my individual cheque for fifty thousand francs to any one who could obtain me that letter. The fact is, it is becoming of more and more importance every day, and the reward has been lately doubled. If it were trebled, however, I could do no more than I have done.’

‘Why, yes,’ said Dupin, drawlingly, between the whiffs of his meerschaum, ‘I really—think, G—, you have not exerted yourself—to the utmost in this matter. You might—do a little more, I think, eh?’

‘How?—in what way?’

‘Why—puff, puff—you might—puff, puff—employ counsel in the matter, eh?’—puff, puff, puff. Do you remember the story they tell of Abernethy?’

‘No, hang Abernethy!’

‘To be sure! hang him and welcome. But, once upon a time, a certain rich miser conceived the design of sponging upon this Abernethy for a medical opinion. Getting up, for this purpose, an ordinary conversation in a private company, he insinuated his case to his physician, as that of an imaginary individual.

“‘We will suppose,” said the miser, “that his symptoms are such and such, now, doctor, what would you have directed him to take?”’

“‘Take!’ said Abernethy, “why, take advice, to be sure.”’

‘But,’ said the Prefect, a little discomposed, ‘I am perfectly willing to take advice, and to pay for it. I would really give fifty thousand francs to any one who would aid me in the matter.’

‘In that case,’ replied Dupin, opening a drawer, and producing a cheque-book, ‘you may as well fill me up a cheque for the amount mentioned. When you have signed it, I will hand you the letter.’

I was astounded. The Prefect appeared absolutely thunder-stricken. For some minutes he remained speechless and motionless, looking incredulously at my friend with open mouth, and eyes that seemed starting from their sockets, then, apparently recovering himself in some measure, he seized a pen, and after several pauses and vacant stares, finally filled up and signed a cheque for fifty thousand francs, and handed it across the table to Dupin. The latter examined it carefully and deposited it in his pocket-book, then, unlocking an escritoire, took thence a letter and gave it to the Prefect. This functionary grasped it in a perfect agony of joy, opened it with a trembling hand, cast a rapid glance at its contents, and then, scrambling and struggling to the door, rushed at length unceremoniously from the room and from the house, without having uttered a syllable since Dupin had requested him to fill up the cheque.

When he had gone, my friend entered into some explanations.

‘The Parisian police,’ he said, ‘are exceedingly able in their way. They are persevering, ingenious, cunning, and thoroughly versed in the knowledge which their duties seem chiefly to demand. Thus, when G— detailed to us his mode of searching the premises at the Hôtel D—, I felt entire confidence in his having made a satisfactory investigation—so far as his labors extended.’

‘So far as his labors extended?’ said I.

‘Yes,’ said Dupin. ‘The measures adopted were not only the best of their kind, but carried out to absolute perfection. Had the letter been deposited within the range of their search, these fellows would, beyond a question, have found it.’

I merely laughed—but he seemed quite serious in all that he said.

‘The measures, then,’ he continued, ‘were good in their kind, and well executed, their defect lay in their being inapplicable to the case, and to the man. A certain set of highly ingenious resources are, with the Prefect, a sort of Procrustean bed, to which he forcibly adapts his designs. But he perpetually errs by being too deep or too shallow, for the matter in hand, and many a schoolboy is a better reasoner than he I knew one about eight years of age, whose success at guessing in the game of "even and odd" attracted universal admiration. This game is simple, and is played with marbles. One player holds in his hand a number of these toys, and demands of another whether that number is even or odd. If the guess is right, the guesser wins one, if wrong, he loses one. The boy to whom I allude won all the marbles of the school. Of course he had some principle of guessing, and thus lay in mere observation and admeasurement of the astuteness of his opponents. For example, an arrant simpleton is his opponent, and, holding up his closed hand, asks, "are they even or odd?" Our schoolboy replies, "odd," and loses, but upon the second trial he wins, for he then says to himself, "the simpleton had them even upon the first trial, and his amount of cunning is just sufficient to make him have them odd upon the second, I will therefore guess odd,"—he guesses odd, and wins. Now, with a simpleton a degree above the first, he would have reasoned thus: "This fellow finds that in the first instance I guessed odd, and, in the second, he will propose to himself upon the first impulse, a simple variation from even to odd, as did the first simpleton, but then a second thought will suggest that this is too simple a variation, and finally he will decide upon putting it even as before. I will therefore guess even,"—he guesses even, and wins. Now this mode of reasoning in the schoolboy, whom his fellows termed "lucky,"—what, in its last analysis, is it?

'It is merely,' I said, 'an identification of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent.'

'It is,' said Dupin, 'and, upon inquiring of the boy by what means he effected the thorough identification in which his success consisted, I received answer as follows: "When I wish to find out how wise, or how stupid, or how good, or how wicked is any one, or what are his thoughts at the moment, I fashion the expression of my face, as accurately as possible, in accordance with the expression of his, and then wait to see what thoughts or sentiments arise in my mind or heart, as if to match or correspond with the expression." This response of the schoolboy lies at the bottom of all the spurious profundity which has been attributed to Rochefoucauld, to La Bougive, to Machiavelli, and to Campanella.'

'And the identification,' I said, 'of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent, depends, if I understand you aright, upon the accuracy with which the opponent's intellect is admeasured.'

'For its practical value it depends upon this,' replied Dupin, 'and the Prefect and his cohort fail so frequently, first, by default of this identification, and, secondly, by ill-admeasurement, or rather through non-admeasurement of the intellect with which they are engaged. They consider only their own ideas of ingenuity, and, in searching for anything hidden, advert only to the modes in which they would have hidden it. They are right in this much—that their own ingenuity is a faithful representative of that of the mass, but when the cunning of the individual felon is diverse in character from their own, the felon foils them, of course. This always happens when it is above their own, and very usually when it is below. They have no variation of principle in their investigations, at best, when urged by some unusual emergency—by some extraordinary reward—they extend or exaggerate their old modes of practice, without touching their principles. What, for example, in this case of D—, has been done to vary the principle of action? What is all this boring, and probing, and sounding, and scrutinizing with the microscope, and dividing the surface of the building into registered square inches—what is it all but an exaggeration of the application of the one principle or set of principles of search, which are based upon the one set of notions regarding human ingenuity, to which the Prefect, in the long routine of his duty, has been accustomed? Do you not see he has taken it for granted that all men proceed to conceal a letter—not exactly in a gimlet-hole bored in a chair-leg—but, at least, in some out-of-the-way hole or corner suggested by the same tenor of thought which would urge a man to secrete a letter in a gimlet-hole bored in a chair-leg? And do you not see also, that such recherches nooks for concealment are adapted only for ordinary occasions, and would be adopted only by ordinary intellects, for, in all cases of concealment, a disposal of the article concealed—a disposal of it in this recherche manner—is, in the very first instance, presumable and presumed, and thus its discovery depends, not at all upon the acumen, but altogether upon the mere care, patience, and determination of the seekers, and where the case is of importance—or, what amounts to the same thing in the political eyes, when the reward is of magnitude,—the qualities in question have never been known to fail? You will now understand what I meant in suggesting that, had the purloined letter been hidden any where within the limits of the Prefect's examination—in other words, had the principle of its concealment been comprehended within the principles of the Prefect—its discovery would have been a matter altogether beyond question. This functionary, however, has been thoroughly mystified, and the remote source of his defeat lies in the supposition that the Minister is a fool, because he has acquired renown as a poet. All fools are poets, this the Prefect feels, and he is merely guilty of a non distributio medii<sup>1</sup> in thence inferring that all poets are fools.

'But is this really the poet?' I asked. 'There are two brothers, I know, and both have attained reputation in letters. The Minister I believe has written learnedly on the Differential Calculus. He is a mathematician, and no poet.'

'You are mistaken, I know him well, he is both. As poet and mathematician, he would reason well, as mere mathematician, he could not have reasoned at all, and thus would have been at the mercy of the Prefect.'

'You surprise me,' I said, 'by these opinions, which have been contradicted by the voice of the world. You do not mean to set at naught the well-digested idea of centuries. The mathematical reason has long been regarded as the reason par excellence'.

'Il y a à parler,' replied Dupin, quoting from Chamfort, "que toute idée publique, toute convention reçue, est une sottise, car elle a convenu au plus grand nombre."<sup>2</sup> The mathematicians, I grant you, have done their best to promulgate the popular error to which you allude, and which is none the less an error for its promulgation as truth. With an art worthy a better cause, for example, they have insinuated the term "analysis" into application to algebra. The French are the originators of this particular deception, but if a term is of any importance—if words derive any value from applicability—then "analysis" conveys "algebra" about as much as, in Latin, "ambitus" implies "ambition," "religio" "religion," or "homines honesti" a set of honorable men.

'You have a quarrel on hand, I see,' said I, 'with some of the algebraists of Paris, but proceed.'

'I dispute the availability, and thus the value, of that reason which is cultivated in any especial form other than the abstractly logical. I dispute, in particular, the reason educated by mathematical study. The mathematics are the science of form and quantity, mathematical reasoning is merely logic applied to observation upon form and quantity. The great error lies in supposing that even the truths of what is called pure algebra, are abstract or general truths. And this error is so egregious that I am confounded at the universality with which it has been received. Mathematical axioms are not axioms of general truth. What is true of relation—of form and quantity—is often grossly false in regard to morals, for example. In this latter science it is very usually untrue that the aggregated parts are equal to the whole. In chemistry also the axiom fails. In the consideration of motive it fails, for two motives, each of a given value, have not, necessarily, a value when united, equal to the sum of their values apart. There are numerous other mathematical truths which are only truths within the limits of relation. But the mathematician argues, from his finite truths, through habit, as if they were of an absolutely general applicability—as the world indeed imagines them to be. Bryant, in his very learned "Mythology," mentions an analogous source of error, when he says that "although the Pagan fables are not believed, yet we forget ourselves continually, and make inferences from them as existing realities." With the algebraists, however, who are Pagans themselves, the "Pagan fables" are believed, and the inferences are made, not so much through lapse of memory, as through an unaccountable adding of the brains. In short, I never yet encountered the mere mathematician who could be trusted out of equal roots, or one who did not clandestinely hold it as a point of his faith that  $x^2 + px$  was absolutely and unconditionally equal to  $q$ . Say to one of these gentlemen, by way of experiment, if you please, that you believe occasions may occur where  $x^2 + px$  is not altogether equal to  $q$ , and, having made him understand what you mean, get out of his reach as speedily as convenient, for, beyond doubt, he will endeavor to knock you down.

'I mean to say,' continued Dupin, while I merely laughed at his last observations, 'that if the Minister had been no more than a mathematician, the Prefect would have been under no necessity of giving me this check. I knew him, however, as both mathematician and poet, and my measures were adapted to his capacity, with reference to the circumstances by which he was surrounded. I knew him as a courtier, too, and as a bold intriguer. Such a man, I considered, could not fail to be aware of the ordinary policial modes of action. He could not have failed to anticipate—and events have proved that he did not fail to anticipate—the waylayings to which he was subjected. He must have foreseen, I reflected, the secret investigations of his premises. His frequent absences from home at night, which were hailed by the Prefect as certain aids to his success, I regarded only as ruses, to afford opportunity for thorough search to the police, and thus the sooner to impress them with the conviction to which G—, in fact, did finally arrive—the conviction that the letter was not upon the premises. I felt, also, that the whole train of thought, which I was at some pains in detailing to you just now, concerning the invariable principle of policial action in searches for articles concealed—I felt that this whole train of thought would necessarily pass through the mind of the Minister. It would imperatively lead him to despise all the ordinary nooks of concealment. He could not, I reflected, be so weak as not to see that the most intricate and remote recess of his hotel would be as open as his commonest closets to the eyes, to the probes, to the gimlets, and to the microscopes of the Prefect. I saw, in fine, that he would be driven, as a matter of course, to simplicity, if not deliberately induced to it as a matter of choice. You will remember, perhaps, how desperately the Prefect laughed when I suggested, upon our first interview, that it was just possible this mystery troubled him so much on account of its being so very self-evident.'

'Yes,' said I, 'I remember his merriment well. I really thought he would have fallen into convulsions.'

'The material world,' continued Dupin, 'abounds with the very strict analogies to the immaterial, and thus some color of truth has been given to the rhetorical dogma, that metaphor, or simile, may be made to strengthen an argument, as well as to embellish a description. The principle of the vis inertiae, for example, seems to be identical in physics and metaphysics. It is not more true in the former, that a large body is with more difficulty set in motion than a smaller one, and that its subsequent momentum is commensurate with this difficulty, than it is, in the latter, that intellects of the vaster capacity, while more forcible, more constant, and more eventful in their movements than those of inferior grade, are yet the less readily moved, and more embarrassed and full of hesitation in the first few steps of their progress. Again have you ever noticed which of the street signs, over the shop doors, are the most attractive of attention?'

'I have never given the matter a thought,' I said.

'There is a game of puzzles,' he resumed, 'which is played upon a map. One party playing requires another to find a given word—the name of town, river, state or empire—any word, in short, upon the motley and perplexed surface of the chart. A novice in the game generally seeks to embarrass his opponents by giving them the most minutely lettered names, but the adept selects such words as stretch, in large characters, from one end of the chart to the other. These, like the over-largely lettered signs and placards of the street, escape observation by dint of being excessively obvious, and here the physical oversight is precisely analogous with the moral inapprehension by which the intellect suffers to pass unnoticed those considerations which are too obtrusively and too palpably self-evident. But this is a point, it appears somewhat above or beneath the understanding of the Prefect. He never once thought it probable, or possible, that the Minister had deposited the letter immediately beneath the nose of the whole world, by way of best preventing any portion of that world from perceiving it

'But the more I reflected upon the daring, dashing, and discriminating ingenuity of D—, upon the fact that the document must always have been at hand, if he intended to use it to good purpose, and upon the decisive evidence, obtained by the Prefect, that it was not hidden within the limits of that dignitary's ordinary search—the more satisfied I became that, to conceal this letter, the Minister had resorted to the comprehensive and sagacious expedient of not attempting to conceal it at all

'Full of these ideas, I prepared myself with a pair of green spectacles, and called one fine morning, quite by accident, at the Ministerial hotel I found D— at home, yawning, lounging, and dawdling, as usual, and pretending to be in the last extremity of ennui. He is, perhaps, the most really energetic human being now alive—but that is only when nobody sees him

'To be even with him, I complained of my weak eyes, and lamented the necessity of the spectacles, under cover of which I cautiously and thoroughly surveyed the apartment, while seemingly intent only upon the conversation of my host

'I paid especial attention to a large writing-table near which he sat, and upon which lay confusedly some miscellaneous letters and other papers, with one or two musical instruments and a few books. Here, however, after a long and very deliberate scrutiny, I saw nothing to excite particular suspicion

'At length my eyes, in going the circuit of the room, fell upon a trumpery filigree card-rack of pasteboard, that hung dangling by a dirty blue ribbon, from a little brass knob just beneath the middle of the mantel-piece. In this rack, which had three or four compartments, were five or six visiting cards and a solitary letter. This last was much soiled and crumpled. It was torn nearly in two, across the middle—as if a design, in the first instance, to tear it entirely up as worthless, had been altered, or stayed, in the second. It had a large black seal, bearing the D— cipher very conspicuously, and was addressed, in a diminutive female hand, to D—, the Minister, himself. It was thrust carelessly, and even, as it seemed, contemptuously, into one of the upper divisions of the rack.

'No sooner had I glanced at this letter, than I concluded it to be that of which I was in search. To be sure, it was, to all appearance, radically different from the one of which the Prefect had read us so minute a description. Here the seal was large and black, with the D— cipher; there it was small and red, with the ducal arms of the S— family. Here, the address, to the Minister, was diminutive and feminine, there the superscription, to a certain royal personage, was markedly bold and decided, the size alone formed a point of correspondence. But, then, the radicalness of these differences, which was excessive, the dirt, the soiled and torn condition of the paper, so inconsistent with the true methodical habits of D—, and so suggestive of a design to delude the beholder into an idea of the worthlessness of the document,—these things, together with the hyperobtrusive situation of this document, full in the view of every visitor, and thus exactly in accordance with the conclusions to which I had previously arrived, these things, I say, were strongly corroborative of suspicion, in one who came with the intention to suspect

'I protracted my visit as long as possible, and, while I maintained a most animated discussion with the Minister, on a topic which I knew well had never failed to interest and excite him, I kept my attention really riveted upon the letter. In this examination, I committed to memory its external appearance and arrangement in the rack, and also fell, at length, upon a discovery which set at rest whatever trivial doubt I might have entertained. In scrutinizing the edges of the paper, I observed them to be more chafed than seemed necessary. They presented the broken appearance which is manifested when a stiff paper, having been once folded and pressed with a folder, is refolded in a reversed direction, in the same creases or edges which had formed the original fold. This discovery was sufficient. It was clear to me that the letter had been turned, as a glove, inside out, re-directed, and re-sealed I bade the Minister good morning, and took my departure at once, leaving a gold snuff-box upon the table

'The next morning I called for the snuff-box, when we resumed, quite eagerly, the conversation of the preceding day. While thus engaged, however, a loud report, as if of a pistol, was heard immediately beneath the windows of the hotel, and was succeeded by a series of fearful screams, and the shoutings of a mob D— rushed to a casement, threw it open, and looked out. In the meantime, I stepped to the card-rack, took the letter, put it in my pocket, and replaced it by a fac-simile (so far as regards externals), which I had carefully prepared at my lodgings, imitating the D— cipher, very readily, by means of a seal formed of bread

'The disturbance in the street had been occasioned by the frantic behavior of a man with a musket. He had fired it among a crowd of women and children. It proved, however, to have been without ball, and the fellow was suffered to go his way as a lunatic or a drunkard. When he had gone, D— came from the window, whither I had followed him immediately upon securing the object in view. Soon afterwards I bade him farewell. The pretended lunatic was a man in my own pay.'

'But what purpose had you,' I asked, 'in replacing the letter by a fac-simile? Would it not have been better, at the first visit, to have seized it openly, and departed?'

'D—,' replied Dupin, 'is a desperate man, and a man of nerve. His hotel, too, is not without attendants devoted to his interests. Had I made the wild attempt you suggest, I might never have left the Ministerial presence alive. The good people of Paris might have heard of me no more. But I had an object apart from these considerations. You know my political prepossessions. In this matter, I act as a partisan of the lady concerned. For eighteen months the Minister has had her in his power. She has now him in hers—since, being unaware that the letter is not in his possession, he will proceed with his exactions as if it was. Thus will he inevitably commit himself, at once, to his political destruction. His downfall, too, will not be more precipitate than awkward. It is all very well to talk about the facilis descensus Averni,<sup>1</sup> but in all kinds of climbing, as Catalani said of singing, it is far more easy to get up than to come down. In the present instance I have no sympathy—at least no pity—for him who descends. He is that monstrum horrendum,<sup>2</sup> an unprincipled man of genius. I confess, however, that I should like very well to know the precise character of his thoughts, when, being defied by her whom the Prefect terms "a certain personage," he is reduced to opening the letter which I left for him in the card-rack.'

'How? did you put any thing particular in it?'

'Why—it did not seem altogether right to leave the interior blank—that would have been insulting D—, at Vienna once, did me an evil turn, which I told him, quite good-humoredly, that I should remember. So, as I knew he would feel some curiosity in regard to the identity of the person who had outwitted him, I thought it a pity not to give him a clue. He is well acquainted with my MS, and I just copied into the middle of the blank sheet the words—

'—Un dessein si funeste, S'il n'est digne d'Atrée, est digne de Thyeste.'

They are to be found in Crébillon's "Atrée"'

THE TELL-TALE HEART

TRUE!—nervous—very, very dreadfully nervous I had been and am, but why will you say that I am mad? The disease had sharpened my senses—not destroyed—not dulled them. Above all was the sense of hearing acute. I heard all things in the heaven and in the earth. I heard many things in hell. How, then, am I mad? Hearken! and observe how healthily—how calmly I can tell you the whole story.

It is impossible to say how first the idea entered my brain, but once conceived, it haunted me day and night. Object there was none. Passion there was none. I loved

1 'Easy descent to Hades'

2 'Horrible monster'

3 'So deadly a scheme, if it is not worthy of Atræus is at least of Thyestes' the old man He had never wronged me He had never given me insult For his gold I had no desire I think it was his eye! yes, it was this! He had the eye of a vulture—a pale blue eye, with a film over it Whenever it fell upon me, my blood ran cold, and so by degrees—very gradually—I made up my mind to take the life of the old man, and thus rid myself of the eye for ever.

Now this is the point You fancy me mad 10
Madmen know nothing But you should have seen me You should have seen how wisely I proceeded—with what caution—with what foresight—with what dissimulation I went to work! I was never kinder to the old man than during the whole week before I killed him And every night, about midnight, I turned the latch of his door and opened it—oh so gently! And then, when I had made an opening sufficient for my head, I put in a dark lantern, all closed, closed, so that no light shone out, and then I thrust in my head Oh, you would have laughed to see how cunningly I thrust it in! I moved it slowly—very, very slowly, so that I might not disturb the old man's sleep It took me an hour to place my whole head within the opening so far that I could see him as he lay upon his bed Ha!—would a madman have been so wise as this? And then, when my head was well in the room, I undid the lantern cautiously—oh, so cautiously—cautiously (for the hinges creaked)—I undid it just so much that a single thin ray fell upon the vulture eye And this I did for seven long nights—every night just at midnight—but I found the eye always closed, and so it was impossible to do the work, for it was not the old man who vexed me, but his Evil Eye And every morning, when the day broke, I went boldly into the chamber, and spoke courageously to him, calling him by name in a hearty tone, and inquiring how he had passed the night So you see he would have been a very profound old man, indeed, to suspect that every night, just at twelve, I looked in upon him while he slept

Upon the eighth night I was more than usually cautious in opening the door A watch's minute hand moves more quickly than did mine Never before that night, had I felt the extent of my own powers—of my sagacity I could scarcely contain my feelings of triumph To think that there I was, opening the door, little by little, and he not even to dream of my secret deeds or thoughts I fairly chuckled at the idea, and perhaps he heard me, for he moved on the bed suddenly, as if startled Now you may think that I drew back—but no His room was as black as pitch with the thick darkness (for the shutters were close fastened, through fear of robbers), and so I knew that he could not see the opening of the door, and I kept pushing it on steadily, steadily

I had my head in, and was about to open the lantern, when my thumb slipped upon the tin fastening, and the old man sprang up in the bed, crying out—'Who's there?'

I kept quite still and said nothing For a whole hour I did not move a muscle, and in the meantime I did not hear him lie down He was still sitting up in the bed, listening,—just as I have done, night after night, hearkening to the death watches in the wall

Presently I heard a slight groan, and I knew it was the groan of mortal terror It was not a groan of pain or of grief—oh, no!—it was the low stifled sound that arises from the bottom of the soul when overcharged with awe I knew the sound well Many a night, just at midnight, when all the world slept, it has welled up from my own bosom, deepening, with its dreadful echo, the terrors that distracted me I say I knew it well I knew what the old man felt, and pitied him, although I chuckled at heart I knew that he had been lying awake ever since the first slight noise, when he had turned in the bed His fears had been ever since growing upon him He had been trying to fancy them causeless, but could not He had been saying to himself—'It is nothing but the wind in the chimney—it is only a mouse crossing the floor,' or 'it is merely a cricket which has made a single chirp' Yes, he had been trying to comfort himself with these suppositions but he had found all in vain All in vain, because Death, in approaching him had stalked with his black shadow before him, and enveloped the victim And it was the mournful influence of the unperceived shadow that caused him to feel—although he neither saw nor heard—to feel the presence of my head within the room

When I had waited a long time, very patiently, without hearing him lie down, I resolved to open a little—a very, very little crevice in the lantern. So I opened it—you cannot imagine how stealthily, stealthily—until, at length, a single dim ray, like the thread of the spider, shot from out the crevice and fell full upon the vulture eye.

It was open—wide, wide open—and I grew furious as I gazed upon it. I saw it with perfect distinctness—all a dull blue, with a hideous veil over it that chilled the very marrow in my bones, but I could see nothing else of the old man's face or person for I had directed the ray as if by instinct, precisely upon the damned spot.

And now have I not told you that what you mistake for madness is but over acuteness of the senses?—now, I say, there came to my ears a low, dull, quick sound, such as a watch makes when enveloped in cotton. I knew that sound well, too. It was the beating of the old man's heart. It increased my fury, as the beating of a drum stimulates the soldier into courage.

But even yet I refrained and kept still. I scarcely breathed. I held the lantern motionless. I tried how steadily I could maintain the ray upon the eye. Meantime the hellish tattoo of the heart increased. It grew quicker and quicker, and louder and louder every instant. The old man's terror must have been extreme! It grew louder, I say, louder every moment!—do you mark me well? I have told you that I am nervous; so I am. And now at the dead hour of the night, amid the dreadful silence of that old house, so strange a noise as this excited me to uncontrollable terror. Yet, for some minutes longer I refrained and stood still. But the beating grew louder, louder! I thought the heart must burst. And now a new anxiety seized me—the sound would be heard by a neighbor! The old man's hour had come! With a loud yell, I threw open the lantern and leaped into the room. He shrieked once—once only. In an instant I dragged him to the floor, and pulled the heavy bed over him. I then smiled gaily, to find the deed so far done. But, for many minutes, the heart beat on with a muffled sound. This, however, did not vex me; it would not be heard through the wall. At length it ceased. The old man was dead. I removed the bed and examined the corpse. Yes, he was stone, stone dead. I placed my hand upon the heart and held it there many minutes. There was no pulsation. He was stone dead. His eye would trouble me no more.

If still you think me mad, you will think so no longer when I describe the wise precautions I took for the concealment of the body. The night waned, and I worked hastily, but in silence. First of all I dismembered the corpse. I cut off the head and the arms and the legs.

I then took up three planks from the flooring of the chamber, and deposited all between the scantlings. I then replaced the boards so cleverly, so cunningly, that no human eye—not even his—could have detected any thing wrong. There was nothing to wash out—no stain of any kind—no blood-spot whatever. I had been too wary for that. A tub had caught all—ha! ha!

When I had made an end of these labors, it was four o'clock—still dark as midnight. As the bell sounded the hour, there came a knocking at the street door. I went down to open it with a light heart,—for what had I now to fear? There entered three men, who introduced themselves, with perfect suavity, as officers of the police. A shriek had been heard by a neighbor during the night, suspicion of foul play had been aroused, information had been lodged at the police office, and they (the officers) had been deputed to search the premises.

I smiled,—for what had I to fear? I bade the gentlemen welcome. The shriek, I said, was my own in a dream. The old man, I mentioned, was absent in the country. I took my visitors all over the house. I bade them search—search well. I led them, at length, to his chamber. I showed them his treasures, secure, undisturbed. In the enthusiasm of my confidence, I brought chairs into the room, and desired them here to rest from their fatigues, while I myself, in the wild audacity of my perfect triumph, placed my own seat upon the very spot beneath which reposed the corpse of the victim.

The officers were satisfied. My manner had convinced them. I was singularly at ease. They sat, and while I answered cheerily, they chatted of familiar things. But, ere long, I felt myself getting pale and wished them gone. My head ached, and I fancied a ringing in my ears; but still they sat and still chatted. The ringing became more distinct.

—it continued and became more distinct I talked more freely to get rid of the feeling. but it continued and gained definitiveness—until, at length, I found that the noise was not within my ears

No doubt I now grew very pale,—but I talked more fluently, and with a heightened voice Yet the sound increased—and what could I do? It was a low, dull, quick sound—much such a sound as a watch makes when enveloped in cotton I gasped for breath—and yet the officers heard it not I talked more quickly—more vehemently, but the noise steadily increased I arose and argued about trifles, in a high key and with violent gesticulations, but the noise steadily increased Why would they not be gone? I paced the floor to and fro with heavy strides, as if excited to fury by the observations of the men—but the noise steadily increased Oh God! what could I do? I foamed—I raved—I swore! I swung the chair upon which I had been sitting, and grated it upon the boards, but the noise arose over all and continually increased It grew louder—louder—louder! And still the men chatted pleasantly, and smiled Was it possible they heard not? Almighty God!—no, no! They heard!—they suspected!—they knew!—they were making a mockery of my horror!—this I thought, and this I think But anything was better than this agony! Anything was more tolerable than this derision! I could bear those hypocritical smiles no longer! I felt that I must scream or die!—and now—again!—hark! louder! louder! louder! louder! louder!

'Villains!' I shrieked, 'dissemble no more! I admit the deed!—tear up the planks!—here, here!—it is the beating of his hideous heart!'

LETTER TO B—<sup>1</sup>

It has been said that a good critique on a poem may be written by one who is no poet himself This, according to your idea and mine of poetry, I feel to be false—the less poetical the critic, the less just the critique, and the converse On this account, and

because there are but few B—s in the world, I would be as much ashamed of the world's good opinion as proud of your own Another than yourself might here observe, 'Shakspeare is in possession of the world's good opinion, and yet Shakspeare is the greatest of poets It appears then that the world judge correctly, why should you be ashamed of their favorable judgment?' The difficulty lies in the interpretation of the word 'judgment' or 'opinion' The opinion is the world's, truly, but it may be called theirs as a man would call a book his, having bought it, he did not write the book, but it is his, they did not originate the opinion, but it is theirs A fool, for example, thinks Shakspeare a great poet—yet the fool has never read Shakspeare. But the fool's neighbor, who is a step higher on the Andes of the mund, whose head (that is to say, his more exalted thought) is too far above the fool to be seen or understood, but whose feet (by which I mean his every-day actions) are sufficiently near to be discerned, and by means of which that superiority is ascertained, which but for them would never have been discovered—this neighbor asserts that Shakspeare is a great poet—the fool believes him, and it is henceforward his opinion This neighbor's own opinion has, in like manner, been adopted from one above him, and so, ascendingly, to a few gifted individuals who kneel around the summit, beholding, face to face, the master spirit who stands upon the pinnacle

You are aware of the great barrier in the path of an American writer He is read, if at all, in preference to the combined and established wit of the world I say established, for it is with literature as with law or empire—an established name is an estate in tenure, or a throne in possession Besides, one might suppose that books, like their authors, improve by travel—their having crossed the sea is, with us, so great a distinction. Our antiquaries abandon time for distance, our very fops glance from the binding to the bottom of the title-page, where the mystic characters which spell London, Paris, or Genoa, are precisely so many letters of recommendation

I mentioned just now a vulgar error as regards criticism. I think the notion that no poet can form a correct estimate of his own writings is another I remarked before, that in proportion to the poetical talent, would be the justice of a critique upon poetry. Therefore, a bad poet would, I grant, make a false critique, and his self-love would infallibly bias his little judgment in his favor, but a poet, who is indeed a poet, could not, I think, fail of making a just critique. What-ever should be deducted on the score of self-love, might be replaced on account of his intimate acquaintance with the subject, in short, we have more instances of false criticism than of just, where one's own writings are the test, simply because we have more bad poets than good. There are of course many objections to what I say: Milton is a great example of the contrary; but his opinion with respect to the Paradise Regained is by no means fairly ascertained. By what trivial circumstances men are often led to assert what they do not really believe! Perhaps an inadvertent word has descended to posterity. But, in fact, the Paradise Regained is little, if at all, inferior to the Paradise Lost, and is only supposed so to be, because men do not like epics, whatever they may say to the contrary, and reading those of Milton in their natural order, are too much wearied with the first to derive any pleasure from the second.

I dare say Milton preferred Comus to either—if so—justly.

As I am speaking of poetry, it will not be amiss to touch slightly upon the most singular heresy in its modern history—the heresy of what is called very foolishly, the Lake School. Some years ago I might have been induced, by an occasion like the present, to attempt a formal refutation of their doctrine, at present it would be a work of supererogation. The wise must bow to the wisdom of such men as Coleridge and Southey, but being wise, have laughed at poetical theories so prosaically exemplified.

Aristotle, with singular assurance, has declared poetry the most philosophical of all writing, but it required a Wordsworth to pronounce it the most metaphysical. He seems to think that the end of poetry is, or should be, instruction—yet it is a truism that the end of our existence is happiness; if so, the end of every separate part of our existence—every thing connected with our existence should be still happiness. Therefore the end of instruction should be happiness, and happiness is another name for pleasure,—therefore the end of instruction should be pleasure: yet we see the above mentioned opinion implies precisely the reverse.

To proceed ceteris paribus,<sup>1</sup> he who pleases, is of more importance to his fellow men than he who instructs, since utility is happiness, and pleasure is the end already obtained which instruction is merely the means of obtaining.

I see no reason, then, why our metaphysical poets should plume themselves so much on the utility of their works, unless indeed they refer to instruction with eternity in view, in which case, sincere respect for their piety would not allow me to express my contempt for their judgment, contempt which it would be difficult to conceal, since their writings are professedly to be understood by the few, and it is the many who stand in need of salvation. In such case I should no doubt be tempted to think of the devil in Melmoth, who labors indefatigably through three octavo volumes, to accomplish the destruction of one or two souls, while any common devil would have demolished one or two thousand.

Against the subtleties which would make poetry a study—not a passion—it becomes the metaphysician to reason—but the poet to protest. Yet Wordsworth and Coleridge are men in years, the one imbued in contemplation from his childhood, the other a giant in intellect and learning. The diffidence, then, with which I venture to dispute their authority, would be overwhelming, did I not feel, from the bottom of my heart, that learning has little to do with the imagination—intellect with the passions—or age with poetry.

‘Trifles, like straws, upon the surface flow, He who would search for pearls must dive below,’

are lines which have done much mischief. As regards the greater truths, men oftener err by seeking them at the bottom than at the top, the depth lies in the huge abysses where wisdom is sought—not in the palatable palaces where she is found. The ancients were not always right in hiding the goddess in a well: witness the light which Bacon has thrown upon philosophy, witness the principles of our divine faith—that moral mechanism by which the simplicity of a child may overbalance the wisdom of a man

We see an instance of Coleridge's liability to err, in his Biographia Literaria—professedly his literary life and opinions, but, in fact, a treatise de omni scibili et quibusdam aliis.<sup>1</sup> He goes wrong by reason of his very profundity, and of his error we have a natural type in the contemplation of a star. He who regards it directly and intensely sees, it is true, the star, but it is the star without a ray—while he who surveys it less inquisitively is conscious of all for which the star is useful to us below—its brilliancy and its beauty

As to Wordsworth, I have no faith in him. That he had, in youth, the feelings of a poet I believe—for there are glimpses of extreme delicacy in his writings—(and delicacy is the poet's own kingdom—his El Dorado)—but they have the appearance of a better day recollected, and glimpses, at best, are little evidence of present poetic fire—we know that a few straggling flowers spring up daily in the crevices of the glacier

He was to blame in wearing away his youth in contemplation with the end of poetizing in his manhood. With the increase of his judgment the light which should make it apparent has faded away. His judgment consequently is too correct. This may not be understood,—but the old Goths of Germany would have understood it, who used to debate matters of importance to their State twice, once when drunk, and once when sober—sober that they might not be deficient in formality—drunk lest they should be destitute of vigor

The long wordy discussions by which he tries to reason us into admiration of his poetry, speak very little in his favor: they are full of such assertions as this—(I have opened one of his volumes at random) 'Of genius the only proof is the act of doing well what is worthy to be done, and what was never done before'—indeed! then it follows that in doing what is unworthy to be done, or what has been done before, no genius can be evinced, yet the picking of pockets is an unworthy act, pockets having been picked time immemorial, and Barrington, the pickpocket, in point of genius, would have thought hard of a comparison with William Wordsworth, the poet.

Again—in estimating the merit of certain poems, whether they be Ossian's or M' Pherson's, can surely be of little consequence, yet, in order to prove their worthlessness, Mr W. has expended many pages in the controversy Tantæne animus?<sup>2</sup> Can great minds descend to such absurdity? But worse still that he may bear down every argument in favor of these poems, he triumphantly drags forward a passage, in his abomination of which he expects the reader to sympathize. It is the beginning of the epic poem Temora 'The blue waves of Ullun roll in light, the green hills are covered with day, trees shake their dusky heads in the breeze' And this—this gorgeous, yet simple imagery, where all is alive and panting with immortality—this, William Wordsworth, the author of Peter Bell, has selected for his contempt. We shall see what better he, in his own person, has to offer

Imprimis

A few sad tears does Betty shed, She pats the pony where or when She knows not happy Betty Foy!
O, Johnny! never mind the Doctor!'

Secondly

'The dew was falling fast, the—stars began to blink
I heard a voice, it said—drink, pretty creature, drink,
And, looking o'er the hedge, be—fore me I espied
A snow-white mountain lamb, with a—maiden at its side
No other sheep were near, the lamb was all alone,
And by a slender cord was—tether'd to a

Now we have no doubt this is all true, we will believe it, indeed, we will, Mr W. Is it sympathy for the sheep you wish to excite? I love a sheep from the bottom of my heart

But there are occasions, dear B—, there are occasions when even Wordsworth is reasonable. Even Stamboul, it is said, shall have an end, and the most unlucky blunders must come to a conclusion. Here is an extract from his preface—

‘Those who have been accustomed to the phraseology of modern writers, if they persist in reading this book to a conclusion (impossible!) will, no doubt, have to struggle with feelings of awkwardness, (ha! ha! ha!) they will look round for poetry (ha! ha! ha!) and will be induced to inquire by what species of courtesy these attempts have been permitted to assume that title.’ Ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha!

Yet let not Mr W despair, he has given immortality to a wagon, and the bee Sophocles has transmitted to eternity a sore toe, and dignified a tragedy with a chorus of turkeys

Of Coleridge I cannot speak but with reverence. His towering intellect! his gigantic power! He is one more evidence of the fact ‘que la plupart des sectes ont raison dans une bonne partie de ce qu’elles avancent, mais non pas en ce qu’elles nient’<sup>1</sup> He has imprisoned his own conceptions by the barrier he has erected against those of others. It is lamentable to think that such a mind should be buried in metaphysics, and, like the Nyctanthes, waste its perfume upon the night alone. In reading his poetry I tremble—like one who stands upon a volcano, conscious, from the very darkness bursting from the crater, of the fire and the light that are weltering below

What is Poetry?—Poetry! that Proteus-like idea, with as many appellations as the nine-titled Corcyra! Give me, I demanded of a scholar some time ago, give me a definition of poetry ‘Tres volontiers,’ and he proceeded to his library, brought me a Dr Johnson, and overwhelmed me with a definition. Shade of the immortal Shakspeare! I imagined to myself the scowl of your spiritual eye upon the profanity of that scurrilous Ursa Major. Think of poetry, dear B—, think of poetry, and then think of—Dr Samuel Johnson! Think of all that is airy and fairy-like, and then of all that is hideous and unwieldy, think of his huge bulk, the Elephant! and then—and then think of the Tempest—the Midsummer Night’s Dream—Prospero—Oberon—and Titania!

A poem, in my opinion, is opposed to a work of science by having, for its immediate object, pleasure, not truth; to romance, by having for its object an indefinite instead of a definite pleasure, being a poem only so far as this object is attained, romance presenting perceptible images with definite, poetry with indefinite sensations, to which end music is an essential, since the comprehension of sweet sound is our most indefinite conception. Music, when combined with a pleasurable idea, is poetry, music without the idea is simply music, the idea without the music is prose from its very definitiveness

What was meant by the invective against him who had no music in his soul?

To sum up this long rigmorole, I have, dear B—, what you no doubt perceive, for the metaphysical poets, as poets, the most sovereign contempt. That they have followers proves nothing—

No Indian prince has to his palace More followers than a thief to the gallows

THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMPOSITION<sup>2</sup>

CHARLES DICKENS, in a note now lying before me, alluding to an examination I once made of the mechanism of Barnaby Rudge, says—‘By the way, are you aware that Godwin wrote his Caleb Williams backwards? He first involved his hero in a web of difficulties, forming the second volume, and then, for the first, cast about him for some mode of accounting for what had been done.’

I cannot think this the precise mode of procedure on the part of Godwin—and indeed what he himself acknowledges, is not altogether in accordance with Mr Dickens’ idea—but the author of Caleb Williams was too good an artist not to perceive the advantage derivable from at least a somewhat similar process. Nothing is more clear than that every plot, worth the name, must be elaborated to its dénouement before anything be attempted with the pen. It is only with the dénouement constantly in view that we can give a plot its indispensable air of consequence, or causation, by making the incidents, and especially the tone at all points, tend to the development of the intention.

There is a radical error, I think, in the usual mode of constructing a story. Either history affords a thesis—or one is suggested by an incident of the day—or, at best, the author sets himself to work in the combination of striking events to form merely the basis of his narrative—designing, generally, to fill in with description, dialogue, or authorial comment, whatever crevices of fact, or action, may, from page to page, render themselves apparent.

I prefer commencing with the consideration of an effect. Keeping originality always in view—for he is false to himself who ventures to dispense with so obvious and so easily attainable a source of interest—I say to myself, in the first place, 'Of the innumerable effects, or impressions, of which the heart, the intellect, or (more generally) the soul is susceptible, what one shall I, on the present occasion, select?' Having chosen a novel, first, and secondly a vivid effect, I consider whether it can be best wrought by incident or tone—whether by ordinary incidents and peculiar tone, or the converse, or by peculiarity both of incident and tone—afterward looking about me (or rather within) for such combinations of event, or tone, as shall best aid me in the construction of the effect.

I have often thought how interesting a magazine paper might be written by any author who would—that is to say who could—detail, step by step, the processes by which any one of his compositions attained its ultimate point of completion. Why such a paper has never been given to the world, I am much at a loss to say—but, perhaps, the authorial vanity has had more to do with the omission than any one other cause. Most writers—poets in especial—prefer having it understood that they compose by a species of fine frenzy—an ecstatic intuition—and would positively shudder at letting the public take a peep behind the scenes, at the elaborate and vacillating crudities of thought—at the true purposes seized only at the last moment—at the innumerable glimpses of idea that arrived not at the maturity of full view—at the fully matured fancies discarded in despair as unmanageable—at the cautious selections and rejections—at the painful erasures and interpolations—in a word, at the wheels and pinions—the tackle for scene-shifting—the step-ladders and demon-traps—the cock's feathers, the red paint and the black patches, which, in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred, constitute the properties of the literary histrion.

I am aware, on the other hand, that the case is by no means common, in which an author is at all in condition to retrace the steps by which his conclusions have been attained. In general, suggestions, having arisen pell-mell, are pursued and forgotten in a similar manner.

For my own part, I have neither sympathy with the repugnance alluded to, nor, at any time the least difficulty in recalling to mind the progressive steps of any of my compositions, and, since the interest of an analysis, or reconstruction, such as I have considered a desideratum, is quite independent of any real or fancied interest in the thing analyzed, it will not be regarded as a breach of decorum on my part to show the modus operandi by which some one of my own works was put together. I select 'The Raven,' as most generally known. It is my design to render it manifest that no one point in its composition is referrible either to accident or intuition—that the work proceeded, step by step, to its completion with the precision and rigid consequence of a mathematical problem.

Let us dismiss, as irrelevant to the poem, per se, the circumstance—or say the necessity—which, in the first place, gave rise to the intention of composing a poem that should suit at once the popular and the critical taste.

We commence, then, with this intention.

The initial consideration was that of extent. If any literary work is too long to be read at one sitting, we must be content to dispense with the immensely important effect derivable from unity of impression—for, if two sittings be required, the affairs of the world interfere, and every thing like totality is at once destroyed. But since, ceteris paribus, no poet can afford to dispense with any thing that may advance his design, it but remains to be seen whether there is, in extent, any advantage to counterbalance the loss of unity which attends it. Here I say no, at once. What we term a long poem is, in fact, merely a succession of brief ones—that is to say, of brief poetical effects. It is needless to demonstrate that a poem is such, only inasmuch as it intensely excites, by elevating, the soul, and all intense excitements are, through a psychal necessity, brief. For this reason, at least one half of the Paradise Lost is essentially prose—a succession of poetical excitements interspersed, inevitably, with corresponding depressions—the whole being deprived, through the extremeness of its length, of the vastly important artistic element, totality, or unity, of effect.

It appears evident, then, that there is a distinct limit, as regards length, to all works of literary art—the limit of a single sitting—and that, although in certain classes of prose composition, such as Robinson Crusoe (demanding no unity), this limit may be advantageously overpassed, it can never properly be overpassed in a poem. Within this limit, the extent of a poem may be made to bear mathematical relation to its merit—in other words, to the excitement or elevation—again in other words, to the degree of the true poetical effect which it is capable of inducing, for it is clear that the brevity must be in direct ratio of the intensity of the intended effect—this, with one proviso—that a certain degree of duration is absolutely requisite for the production of any effect at all.

Holding in view these considerations, as well as that degree of excitement which I deemed not above the popular, while not below the critical, taste, I reached at once what I conceived the proper length for my intended poem—a length of about one hundred lines. It is, in fact, a hundred and eight.

My next thought concerned the choice of an impression, or effect, to be conveyed and here I may as well observe that, throughout the construction, I kept steadily in view the design of rendering the work universally appreciable. I should be carried too far out of my immediate topic were I to demonstrate a point upon which I have repeatedly insisted, and which, with the poetical, stands not in the slightest need of demonstration—the point, I mean, that Beauty is the sole legitimate province of the poem. A few words, however, in elucidation of my real meaning, which some of my friends have evinced a disposition to misrepresent. That pleasure which is at once the most intense, the most elevating, and the most pure, is, I believe, found in the contemplation of the beautiful. When, indeed, men speak of Beauty, they mean, precisely, not a quality, as is supposed, but an effect—they refer, in short, just to that intense and pure elevation of soul—not of intellect, or of heart—upon which I have commented, and which is experienced in consequence of contemplating ‘the beautiful.’ Now I designate Beauty as the province of the poem, merely because it is an obvious rule of Art that effects should be made to spring from direct causes—that objects should be attained through means best adapted for their attainment—no one as yet having been weak enough to deny that the peculiar elevation alluded to is most readily attained in the poem. Now the object Truth, or the satisfaction of the intellect, and the object Passion, or the excitement of the heart, are, although attainable, to a certain extent, in poetry, far more readily attainable in prose. Truth, in fact, demands a precision, and Passion a homeliness (the truly passionate will comprehend me) which are absolutely antagonistic to that Beauty which, I maintain, is the excitement, or pleasurable elevation, of the soul. It by no means follows from any thing here said, that passion, or even truth, may not be introduced, and even profitably introduced, into a poem—for they may serve in elucidation, or aid the general effect, as do discords in music, by contrast—but the true artist will always contrive, first, to tone them into proper subservience to the predominant aim, and, secondly, to enveil them, as far as possible, in that Beauty which is the atmosphere and the essence of the poem.

Regarding, then, Beauty as my province, my next question referred to the tone of its highest manifestation—and all experience has shown that this tone is one of sadness. Beauty of whatever kind, in its supreme development, invariably excites the sensitive soul to tears. Melancholy is thus the most legitimate of all the poetical tones.

The length, the province, and the tone, being thus determined, I betook myself to ordinary induction, with the view of obtaining some artistic piquancy which might serve me as a key-note in the construction of the poem—some pivot upon which the whole structure might turn. In carefully thinking over all the usual artistic effects—or more properly points, in the theatrical sense—I did not fail to perceive immediately that no one had been so universally employed as that of the refrain. The universality of its employment sufficed to assure me of its intrinsic value, and spared me the necessity of submitting it to analysis. I considered it, however, with regard to its susceptibility of improvement, and soon saw it to be in a primitive condition. As commonly used, the refrain, or burden, not only is limited to lyric verse, but depends for its impression upon the force of monotone—both in sound and thought. The pleasure is deduced solely from the sense of identity—of repetition. I resolved to diversify, and so heighten, the effect, by adhering, in general, to the monotone of sound, while I continually varied that of thought that is to say, I determined to produce continuously novel effects, by the variation of the application of the refrain—the refrain itself remaining, for the most part, unvaried.

These points being settled, I next betought me of the nature of my refrain. Since its application was to be repeatedly varied, it was clear that the refrain itself must be brief, for there would have been an insurmountable difficulty in frequent variations of application in any sentence of length. In proportion to the brevity of the sentence, would, of course, be the facility of the variation. This led me at once to a single word as the best refrain.

The question now arose as to the character of the word. Having made up my mind to a refrain, the division of the poem into stanzas was, of course, a corollary. The refrain forming the close of each stanza. That such a close, to have force, must be sonorous and susceptible of protracted emphasis, admitted no doubt. and these considerations inevitably led me to the long o as the most sonorous vowel, in connection with r as the most producible consonant.

The sound of the refrain being thus determined, it became necessary to select a word embodying this sound, and at the same time in the fullest possible keeping with that melancholy which I had predetermined as the tone of the poem. In such a search it would have been absolutely impossible to overlook the word 'Nevermore.' In fact, it was the very first which presented itself.

The next desideratum was a pretext for the continuous use of the one word 'nevermore.' In observing the difficulty which I at once found in inventing a sufficiently plausible reason for its continuous repetition, I did not fail to perceive that this difficulty arose solely from the pre-assumption that the word was to be so continuously or monotonously spoken by a human being—I did not fail to perceive, in short, that the difficulty lay in the reconciliation of this monotony with the exercise of reason on the part of the creature repeating the word. Here, then, immediately arose the idea of a non-reasoning creature capable of speech, and, very naturally, a parrot, in the first instance, suggested itself, but was superseded forthwith by a Raven, as equally capable of speech, and infinitely more in keeping with the intended tone.

I had now gone so far as the conception of a Raven—the bird of ill omen—monotonously repeating the one word, 'Nevermore,' at the conclusion of each stanza, in a poem of melancholy tone, and in length about one hundred lines. Now, never losing sight of the object supremeness, or perfection, at all points, I asked myself—'Of all melancholy topics, what, according to the universal understanding of mankind, is the most melancholy?' Death—was the obvious reply. 'And when,' I said, 'is this most melancholy of topics most poetical?' From what I have already explained at some length, the answer, here also, is obvious—'When it most closely allies itself to Beauty the death, then, of a beautiful woman is, unquestionably, the most poetical topic in the world—and equally is it beyond doubt that the lips best suited for such topic are those of a bereaved lover.'

I had now to combine the two ideas, of a lover lamenting his deceased mistress and a Raven continuously repeating the word 'Nevermore.'—I had to combine these, bearing in mind my design of varying, at every turn, the application of the word repeated, but the only intelligible mode of such combination is that of imagining the Raven employing the word in answer to the queries of the lover. And here it was that I saw at once the opportunity afforded for the effect on which I had been depending—that is to say, the effect of the variation of application. I saw that I could make the first query propounded by the lover—the first query to which the Raven should reply 10 ‘Nevermore’—that I could make this first query a commonplace one—the second less so—the third still less, and so on—until at length the lover, startled from his original nonchalance by the melancholy character of the word itself—by its frequent repetition—and by a consideration of the ominous reputation of the fowl that uttered it—is at length excited to superstition, and wildly propounds queries of a far different character—queries whose solution he has passionately at heart—propounds them half in superstition and half in that species of despair which delights in self-torture—propounds them not altogether because he believes in the prophetic or demoniac character of the bird (which, reason assures him, is merely repeating a lesson learned by rote) but because he experiences a frenzied pleasure in so modeling his questions 20 as to receive from the expected ‘Nevermore’ the most delicious because the most intolerable of sorrow. Perceiving the opportunity thus afforded me—or, more strictly, thus forced upon me in the progress of the construction—I first established in mind the climax, or concluding query—that query to which ‘Nevermore’ should be in the last place an answer—that in reply to which this word ‘Nevermore’ should involve the utmost conceivable amount of sorrow and despair.

Here then the poem may be said to have its beginning—at the end, where all works of art should begin—for it was here, at this point of my preconsiderations, that I first put pen to paper in the composition of the stanza

‘Prophet,’ said I, ‘thung of evil’ prophet still 30 if bird or devil!

By that heaven that bends above us—by
that God we both adore,

Tell this soul with sorrow laden, if within
the distant Aidenn,

It shall clasp a sainted maiden whom the angels name Lenore—

Clasp a rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore.’

Quoth the raven ‘Nevermore’

I composed this stanza, at this point, first that, by establishing the climax, I might the better vary and graduate, as regards seriousness and importance, the preceding queries of the lover—and, secondly, that I might definitely settle the rhythm, the metre, and the length and general arrangement of the stanza—as well as graduate the stanzas which were to precede, so that none of them might surpass this in rhythmical effect. Had I been able, in the subsequent composition, to construct more vigorous stanzas, I should, without scruple, have purposely enfeebled them, so as not to interfere with the climacteric effect.

And here I may as well say a few words of the versification. My first object (as usual) was originality. The extent to which this has been neglected, in versification, is one of the most unaccountable things in the world. Admitting that there is little possibility of variety in mere rhythm, it is still clear that the possible varieties of metre and stanza are absolutely infinite—and yet, for 30 centuries, no man, in verse, has ever done, or ever seemed to think of doing, an original thing. The fact is, that originality (unless in minds of very unusual force) is by no means a matter, as some suppose, of impulse or intuition. In general, to be found, it must be elaborately sought, and although a positive merit of the highest class, demands in its attainment less of invention than negation.

Of course, I pretend to no originality in either the rhythm or metre of the ‘Raven’. The former is trochaic—the latter is octameter catalectic, alternating with heptameter catalectic repeated in the refrain of the fifth verse, and terminating with tetrameter catalectic. Less pedantically—the feet employed throughout (trochees) consist of a long syllable followed by a short—the first line of the stanza consists of eight of these feet—the second of seven and a half (in effect two-thirds)—the third of eight—the fourth of seven and a half—the fifth the same—the sixth three and a half. Now, each of these lines, taken individually, has been employed before, and what originality the 'Raven' has, is in their combination into stanza, nothing even remotely approaching this combination has ever been attempted. The effect of this originality of combination is aided by other unusual, and some altogether novel effects, arising from an extension of the application of the principles of rhyme and alliteration.

The next point to be considered was the mode of bringing together the lover and the Raven—and the first branch of this consideration was the locale. For thus the most natural suggestion might seem to be a forest, or the fields—but it has always appeared to me that a close circumscription of space is absolutely necessary to the effect of insulated incident—it has the force of a frame to a picture. It has an indisputable moral power in keeping concentrated the attention, and, of course, must not be confounded with mere unity of place.

I determined, then, to place the lover in his chamber—in a chamber rendered sacred to him by memories of her who had frequented it. The room is represented as richly furnished—thus in mere pursuance of the ideas I have already explained on the subject of Beauty, as the sole true poetical thesis.

The locale being thus determined, I had now to introduce the bird—and the thought of introducing him through the window, was inevitable. The idea of making the lover suppose, in the first instance, that the flapping of the wings of the bird against the shutter, is a 'tapping' at the door, originated in a wish to increase, by prolonging, the reader's curiosity, and in a desire to admit the incidental effect arising from the lover's throwing open the door, finding all dark, and thence adopting the half-fancy that it was the spirit of his mistress that knocked.

I made the night tempestuous, first, to account for the Raven's seeking admission, and secondly, for the effect of contrast with the (physical) serenity within the chamber.

I made the bird alight on the bust of Pallas, also for the effect of contrast between the marble and the plumage—it being understood that the bust was absolutely suggested by the bird—the bust of Pallas being chosen, first, as most in keeping with the scholarship of the lover, and, secondly, for the sonorousness of the word, Pallas, itself.

About the middle of the poem, also, I have availed myself of the force of contrast, with a view of deepening the ultimate impression. For example, an air of the fantastic—approaching as nearly to the ludicrous as was admissible—is given to the Raven's entrance. He comes in 'with many a flut and flutter.'

10 Not the least obeisance made he—not a moment stopped or stayed he,
But with mien of lord or lady, perched above my chamber door

In the two stanzas which follow, the design is more obviously carried out—

Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling 20 By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore,
'Though thy crest be shorn and shaven thou,' I said, 'art sure no craven, Ghastly grim and ancient Raven wandering from the nightly shore—Tell me what thy lordly name is on the Night's Plutonian shore?'
Quoth the Raven 'Nevermore.'

30 Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore, For we cannot help agreeing that no living human being Ever yet was blessed with seeing bird above his chamber door—
Bird or beast upon the sculptured bust above his chamber door,
40 With such name as 'Nevermore.'

The effect of the denouement being thus provided for, I immediately drop the fantastic for a tone of the most profound seriousness—this tone commencing in the stanza directly following the one last quoted, with the line,

But the Raven, sitting lonely on that placid bust, spoke only, etc

From this epoch the lover no longer jests—no longer sees any thing even of the fantastic in the Raven's demeanor. He speaks of him as a 'grim, ungainly, ghastly, gaunt, and ominous bird of yore,' and feels the 'fiery eyes' burning into his 'bosom's core' This revolution of thought, or fancy, on the lover's part, is intended to induce a similar one on the part of the reader—to bring the mind into a proper frame for the denouement—which is now brought about as rapidly and as directly as possible

With the denouement proper—with the Raven's reply, 'Nevermore,' to the lover's final demand if he shall meet his mistress in another world—the poem, in its obvious phase, that of a simple narrative, may be said to have its completion So far, every thing is within the limits of the accountable—of the real A raven, having learned by rote the single word 'Nevermore,' and having escaped from the custody of its owner, is driven at midnight, through the violence of a storm, to seek admission at a window from which a light still gleams—the chamber-window of a student, occupied half in poring over a volume, half in dreaming of a beloved mistress deceased The casement being thrown open at the fluttering of the bird's wings, the bird itself perches on the most convenient seat out of the immediate reach of the student, who, amused by the incident and the oddity of the visitor's demeanor, demands of it, in jest and without looking for a reply, its name The raven addressed, answers with its customary word, 'Nevermore'—a word which finds immediate echo in the melancholy heart of the student, who, giving utterance aloud to certain thoughts suggested by the occasion, is again startled by the fowl's repetition of 'Nevermore' The student now guesses the state of the case, but is impelled, as I have before explained, by the human thirst for self-torture, and in part by superstition, to propound such queries to the bird as will bring him, the lover, the most of the luxury of sorrow, through the anticipated answer 'Nevermore' With the indulgence, to the extreme, of this self-torture, the narration, in what I have termed its first or obvious phase, has a natural termination, and so far there has been no overstepping of the limits of the real

But in subjects so handled, however skilfully, or with however vivid an array of incident, there is always a certain hardness or nakedness, which repels the artist's eye Two things are invariably required—first, some amount of complexity, or more properly, adaptation, and, secondly, some amount of suggestiveness—some under-current, however indefinite, of meaning It is this latter, in especial, which imparts to a work of art so much of that richness (to borrow from colloquy a forcible term) which we are too fond of confounding with the ideal It is the excess of the suggested meaning—it is the rendering thus the upper instead of the under-current of the theme—which turns into prose (and that of the very flattest kind) the so called poetry of the so called transcendentalists

Holding these opinions, I added the two concluding stanzas of the poem—their suggestiveness being thus made to pervade all the narrative which has preceded them The under-current of meaning is rendered first apparent in the lines—

'Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!"
Quoth the Raven 'Nevermore!'

It will be observed that the words, 'from out my heart,' involve the first metaphorical expression in the poem They, with the answer, 'Nevermore,' dispose the mind to seek a moral in all that has been previously narrated The reader begins now to regard the Raven as emblematical—but it is not until the very last line of the very last stanza, that the intention of making him emblematical of Mournful and Never-ending Remembrance is permitted distinctly to be seen

And the Raven, never flitting, still is sitting,
still is sitting,
On the pallid bust of Pallas, just above my chamber door,
And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming,
And the lamplight o'er him streaming throws his shadow on the floor, And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor Shall be lifted—nevermore

A DREAM WITHIN A DREAM

TAKE this kiss upon the brow!
And, in parting from you now,

Thus much let me avow
 You are not wrong, who deem That my days have been a dream; Yet if Hope has flown away
 In a night, or in a day,
 In a vision, or in none,
 Is it therefore the less gone?
All that we see or seem 10
 Is but a dream within a dream.

I stand amid the roar
 Of a surf-tormented shore,
 And I hold within my hand Grains of the golden sand—
 How few! yet how they creep Through my fingers to the deep, While I weep—while I weep!
 O God! can I not grasp 20
 Them with a tighter clasp?
 O God! can I not save
 One from the pitiless wave?
 Is all that we see or seem But a dream within a dream? 1850

SONNET—TO SCIENCE

SCIENCE! true daughter of Old Time thou art!
 Who alterest all things with thy peering
 eyes
 Why preyest thou thus upon the poet's
 heart, Vulture, whose wings are dull realities?
 How should he love thee? or how deem thee wise,
 Who wouldst not leave him in his wandering
 To seek for treasure in the jewelled
 skies,
 Albeit he soared with an undaunted
 wing?
 Hast thou not dragged Diana from her car?
 And driven the Hamadryad from the wood 10
 To seek a shelter in some happier star?
 Hast thou not torn the Naiad from her
 flood,
 The Elfin from the green grass, and from me
 The summer dream beneath the tamarind tree? 1829

FROM AL AARAAF

'NEATH blue-bell or streamer — Or tufted wild spray
 That keeps, from the dreamer,
 The moonbeam away— 230
 Bright beings! that ponder,
 With half closing eyes,
 On the stars which your wonder Hath drawn from the skies, Till they glance thro' the shade, and Come down to your brow Like—eyes of the maiden Who calls on you now—Arise! from your dreaming
 In violet bowers,
 To duty beseeching 240
 These star-litten hours—
 And shake from your tresses Encumber'd with dew
 The breath of those kisses
 That cumber them too (O, how, without you, Love!
 Could angels be blest?)— Those kisses of true love That lull'd ye to rest! 250
 Up!—shake from your wing
 Each hundering thing.
 The dew of the night—
 It would weigh down your flight,
 And true love caresses—
 O! leave them apart
 They are light on the tresses, But lead on the heart Ligeia! Ligeia!
 My beautiful one!
 Whose harshest idea 260
 Will to melody run, O! is it thy will
 On the breezes to toss?
 Or, capriciously still,
 Like the lone Albatross, Incumbent on night (As she on the air)
 To keep watch with delight
 On the harmony there?
 Ligeia! wherever 270 Thy image may be,
 No magic shall sever Thy music from thee Thou hast bound many eyes
 In a dreamy sleep—

But the strains still arise Which thy vigilance keep:
 The sound of the rain Which leaps down to the flower, And dances again 280
 In the rhythm of the shower—
 The murmur that springs From the growing of grass Are the music of things—But are modell'd, alas!—
 Away, then my dearest, O! hie thee away
 To springs that lie clearest Beneath the moon-ray—
 To lone lake that smiles, 290
 In its dream of deep rest,
 At the many star-isles
 That enjewel its breast—
 Where wild flowers, creeping, Have mingled their shade,
 On its margin is sleeping Full many a maid—
 Some have left the cool glade, and Have slept with the bee—Arouse them, my maiden, 300
 On moorland and lea—Go! breathe on their slumber, All softly in ear,
 The musical number
 They slumber'd to hear—
 For what can awaken
 An angel so soon
 Whose sleep hath been taken Beneath the cold moon,
 As the spell which no slumber 310
 Of witchery may test,
 The rhythmical number Which lull'd him to rest?

ROMANCE

ROMANCE, who loves to nod and sing,
 With drowsy head and folded wing, Among the green leaves as they shake Far down within some shadowy lake,
 To me a painted paroquet Hath been—a most familiar bird—Taught me my alphabet to say,
 To lisp my very earliest word,
 While in the wild wood I did lie,
 A child—with a most knowing eye 10

Of late, eternal Condor years So shake the very Heaven on high

With tumult as they thunder by,
 I have no time for idle cares Through gazing on the unquiet sky.
 And when an hour with calmer wings
 Its down upon my spirit flings—
 That little time with lyre and rhyme
 To while away—forbidden things!
 My heart would feel to be a crime 20
 Unless it trembled with the strings.

TO HELEN <sup>1</sup>

HELEN, thy beauty is to me Like those Nicéan barks of yore, That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
 The weary, way-worn wanderer bore
 To his own native shore

On desperate seas long wont to roam, Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face, Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
 To the glory that was Greece,
 And the grandeur that was Rome 10

Lo! in yon brilliant window-niche
 How statue-like I see thee stand,
 The agate lamp within thy hand!
 Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy Land!

ISRAFEL

And the angel Israfil, whose heart-strings are a lute, and who has the sweetest voice of all God's creatures

KORAN.

In Heaven a spirit doth dwell
 'Whose heart-strings are a lute', None sing so wildly well As the angel Israfil,
 And the giddy stars (so legends tell),
 Ceasing their hymns, attend the spell
 Of his voice, all mute

Tottering above
 In her highest noon,
 The enamored moon 10
 Blushes with love,

<sup>1</sup> The poem was, said Poe, written 'in my passionate boyhood, to the first purely ideal love of my soul—to Helen Stannard' Mrs Stannard, the mother of one of Poe's friends, died in 1824. Harrison, ed., The Complete Works of Edgar Allan Poe (N Y, 1902), XVII.294

While, to listen, the red levin (With the rapid Pleiads, even, Which were seven,) Pauses in Heaven

And they say (the starry choir And the other listening things) That Israfel's fire Is owing to that lyre
 By which he sits and sings— 20
 The trembling living wire
 Of those unusual strings

But the skies that angel trod, Where deep thoughts are a duty,
 Where Love's a grown-up God, Where the Hours glance are Imbued with all the beauty Which we worship in a star

Therefore, thou art not wrong, Israfel, who despisest 30
 An unimpassioned song,
 To thee the laurels belong,
 Best bard, because the wisest!
 Merrily live, and long!

The ecstasies above
 With thy burning measures suit—Thy grief, thy joy, thy hate, thy love, With the fervor of thy lute—
 Well may the stars be mute!

Yes, Heaven is thine, but this 40
 Is a world of sweets and sour,
 Our flowers are merely—flowers,
 And the shadow of thy perfect bliss
 Is the sunshine of ours.

If I could dwell
 Where Israfel
 Hath dwelt, and he where I,
 He might not sing so wildly well
 A mortal melody,
 While a bolder note than this might swell
 From my lyre within the sky 51

THE CITY IN THE SEA

Lo! Death has reared himself a throne In a strange city lying alone Far down within the dim West, Where the good and the bad and the worst and the best

Have gone to their eternal rest
 There shrines and palaces and towers (Time-eaten towers that tremble not!) Resemble nothing that is ours Around, by lifting winds forgot, Resignedly beneath the sky 10
 The melancholy waters lie

No rays from the holy heaven come down On the long night-time of that town,
 But light from out the lurid sea Streams up the turrets silently—Gleams up the pinnacles far and free—Up domes—up spires—up kingly halls—
 Up fanes—up Babylon-like walls—
 Up shadowy long-forgotten bowers Of sculptured ivy and stone flowers— 20
 Up many and many a marvellous shrine Whose wreathed friezes intertwine
 The viol, the violet, and the vine

Resignedly beneath the sky
 The melancholy waters lie
 So blend the turrets and shadows there That all seem pendulous in air, While from a proud tower in the town Death looks gigantically down

There open fanes and gaping graves 30 Yawn level with the luminous waves, But not the riches there that lie In each idol's diamond eye—
 Not the gayly-jewelled dead Tempt the waters from their bed,
 For no ripples curl, alas!
 Along that wilderness of glass—No swellings tell that winds may be Upon some far-off happier sea—
 No heavings hint that winds have been 40
 On seas less hideously serene

But lo, a stir is in the air!
 The wave—there is a movement there!
 As if the towers had thrust aside,
 In slightly sinking, the dull tide—
 As if their tops had feebly given A void within the filmy Heaven
 The waves have now a redder glow—
 The hours are breathing faint and low—
 And when, amid no earthly moans, 50 Down, down that town shall settle hence, Hell, rising from a thousand thrones, Shall do it reverence.

THE SLEEPER

At midnight, in the month of June, I stand beneath the mystic moon
 An opiate vapor, dewy, dim, Exhales from out her golden rim,
 And, softly dripping, drop by drop,
 Upon the quiet mountain top, Steals drowsily and musically Into the universal valley
 The rosemary nods upon the grave;
 The lily lolls upon the wave, Wrapping the fog about its breast,
 The ruin moulders into rest, Looking like Lethe, see! the lake A conscious slumber seems to take,
 And would not, for the world, awake All Beauty sleeps!—and lo! where lies Irene, with her Destinies!

Oh, lady bright! can it be right—
 This window open to the night?
 The wanton airs, from the tree-top, Laughingly through the lattice drop—
 The bodiless airs, a wizard rout, Flit through thy chamber in and out,
 And wave the curtain canopy
 So fitfully—so fearfully—Above the closed and fringed lid
 'Neath which thy slumb'ring soul lies hid,
 That, o'er the floor and down the wall,
 Like ghosts the shadows rise and fall!
 Oh, lady dear, hast thou no fear?
 Why and what art thou dreaming here?
 Sure thou art come o'er far-off seas,
 A wonder to these garden trees!
 Strange is thy pallor! strange thy dress!
 Strange, above all, thy length of tress,
 And this all solemn silentness!

The lady sleeps! Oh, may her sleep,
 Which is enduring, so be deep!
 Heaven have her in its sacred keep!
 This chamber changed for one more holy,
 This bed for one more melancholy,
 I pray to God that she may lie Forever with unopened eye, While the pale sheeted ghosts go by!

My love, she sleeps! Oh, may her sleep,
 As it is lasting, so be deep!
 Soft may the worms about her creep!
 Far in the forest, dim and old,
 For her may some tall vault unfold—

Some vault that oft hath flung its black And wingèd pannels fluttering back, Triumphant, o'er the crested palls
 Of her grand family funerals—

Some sepulchre, remote, alone, Against whose portal she hath thrown,
 In childhood, many an idle stone—
 Some tomb from out whose sounding door
 She ne'er shall force an echo more, Thrilling to think, poor child of sin!
 It was the dead who groaned within.

LENORE<sup>1</sup>

Ah, broken is the golden bowl!—the spirit flown forever!
 Let the bell toll!—a saintly soul floats on the Stygian river — And, Guy De Vere, has thou no tear?— weep now or never more!
 See! on yon drear and rigid bier low lies thy love, Lenore!
 Come, let the burial rite be read—the funeral song be sung!— An anthem for the queenliest dead that ever died so young—
 A dirge for her the doubly dead in that she died so young

'Wretches! ye loved her for her wealth, and ye hated her for her pride, And, when she fell in feeble health, ye blessed her—that she died — How shall the ritual, then, be read—the requiem how be sung By you—by yours, the evil eye,—by yours, the slanderous tongue That did to death the innocence that died, and died so young?

Peccavimus, yet rave not thus! but let a Sabbath song
 Go up to God so solemnly the dead may feel no wrong!

<sup>1</sup> In reviewing the poems of a contemporary, in 1844, Poe wrote "Her tone is not so much the tone of passion, as of a gentle and melancholy regret, interwoven with a pleasant sense of the natural loveliness surrounding the lost in the tomb, and a memory of her beauty while alive—Elegiac poems should either assume this character, or dwell purely on the beauty (moral or physical) of the departed, or better still, utter the note of triumph. I have endeavored to carry out this idea in some verses which I have called "Lenore" " Ibid. XVI, 56.

The sweet Lenore hath gone before, with Hope that flew beside, Leaving thee wild for the dear child that should have been thy bride—For her, the fair and debonaire, that now so lowly lies,
 The life upon her yellow hair, but not within her eyes—
 The life still there upon her hair, the death upon her eyes

'Avaunt!—avaunt! to friends from fiends the indignant ghost is riven— 20 From Hell unto a high estate within the utmost Heaven—
 From moan and groan to a golden throne beside the King of Heaven — Let no bell toll, then, lest her soul, amid its hallowed mirth,
 Should catch the note as it doth float up from the damned Earth!
 And I—to-night my heart is light —no dirge will I upraise, But waft the angel on her flight with a Pæan of old days!'

THE VALLEY OF UNREST

ONCE it smiled a silent dell Where the people did not dwell,
 They had gone unto the wars, Trusting to the mild-eyed stars, Nightly, from their azure towers,
 To keep watch above the flowers,
 In the midst of which all day
 The red sun-light lazily lay Now each visitor shall confess
 The sad valley's restlessness 10 Nothing there is motionless—Nothing save the airs that brood Over the magic solitude
 Ah, by no wind are stirred those trees That palpitate like the chill seas Around the misty Hebrides!
 Ah, by no wind those clouds are driven That rustle through the unquiet Heaven Uneasily, from morn till even,
 Over the violets there that lie 20
 In myriad types of the human eye—
 Over the lilies there that wave
 And weep above a nameless grave!
 They wave —from out their fragrant tops
 Eternal dews come down in drops

They weep —from off their delicate stems Perennial tears descend in gems

TO ONE IN PARADISE

THOU wast that all to me, love,
 For which my soul did pine—
 A green isle in the sea, love,
 A fountain and a shrine,
 All wreathed with fairy fruits and flowers,
 And all the flowers were mine

Ah, dream too bright to last!
 Ah, starry Hope! that didst arise
 But to be overcast!
 A voice from out the Future cries, 10
 'On! on!'—but o'er the Past (Dim gulf!) my spirit hovering lies Mute, motionless, aghast!

For, alas! alas! with me
 The light of Life is o'er!
 No more—no more—no more—(Such language holds the solemn sea To the sands upon the shore) Shall bloom the thunder-blasted tree,
 Or the stricken eagle soar! 20

And all my days are trances,
 And all my nightly dreams Are where thy grey eye glances,
 And where thy footstep gleams—
 In what ethereal dances, By what eternal streams

DREAM-LAND

By a route obscure and lonely,
 Haunted by ill angels only,
 Where an Eidolon, named NIGHT,
 On a black throne reigns upright,
 I have reached these lands but newly From an ultimate dim Thule—From a wild weird clime that lieth, sublime,
 Out of SPACE—out of TIME

Bottomless vales and boundless floods, And chasms, and caves, and Titan woods, 10
 With forms that no man can discover For the tears that drip all over, Mountains toppling evermore Into seas without a shore,

Seas that restlessly aspire, Surging, unto skies of fire, Lakes that endlessly outspread
 Their lone waters, lone and dead,—
 Their still waters, still and chilly
 With the snows of the lolling lily. 20

By the lakes that thus outspread
 Their lone waters, lone and dead,—
 Their sad waters, sad and chilly
 With the snows of the lolling lily,—
 By the mountains—near the river Murmuring lowly, murmuring ever,— By the grey woods,—by the swamp Where the toad and the newt encamp,— By the dismal tarns and pools Where dwell the Ghouls,— 30
 By each spot the most unholy—
 In each nook most melancholy,— There the traveller meets, aghast, Sheeted Memories of the Past—Shrouded forms that start and sigh As they pass the wanderer by—White-robed forms of friends long given,
 In agony, to the Earth—and Heaven

For the heart whose woes are legion
 'Tis a peaceful, soothing region— 40 For the spirit that walks in shadow
 'Tis—oh 'tis an Eldorado!
 But the traveller, travelling through it,
 May not—dare not openly view it, Never its mysteries are exposed To the weak human eye unclosed, So wills its King, who hath forbid
 The uplifting of the fringed lid,
 And thus the sad Soul that here passes Beholds it but through darkened glasses 50

By a route obscure and lonely,
 Haunted by ill angels only,
 Where an Eidolon, named NIGHT,
 On a black throne reigns upright,
 I have wandered home but newly From this ultimate dim Thule

THE RAVEN <sup>1</sup>

ONCE upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary, Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore—

<sup>1</sup> To an unknown correspondent, n.d., Poe wrote "What you say about the blundering criticism of 'the Hartford

While I nodded, nearly napping, suddenly there came a tapping, As of some one gently rapping, rapping at my chamber door.
 ' 'Tis some visitor,' I muttered, 'tapping at my chamber door—
 Only this and nothing more '

Ah, distinctly I remember it was in the bleak December, And each separate dying ember wrought its ghost upon the floor Eagerly I wished the morrow,—vainly I had sought to borrow From my books surcease of sorrow—sorrow for the lost Lenore— 10 For the rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore—Nameless here for evermore.

And the silken, sad, uncertain rustling of each purple curtain Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic terrors never felt before,
 So that now, to still the beating of my heart,
 I stood repeating
 ' 'Tis some visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door—
 Some late visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door,—
 This it is and nothing more '

Presently my soul grew stronger, hesitating then no longer,
 'Sir,' said I, 'or Madam, truly your forgiveness I implore, 20

Review man" is just. For the purposes of poetry it is quite sufficient that a thing is possible, or at least that the improbability be not offensively glaring. It is true that in several ways, as you say, the lamp might have thrown the bird's shadow on the floor. My conception was that of the bracket candelabrum affixed against the wall, high up above the door and bust, as is often seen in the English palaces, and even in some of the better houses of New York.

'Your objection to the tinkling of the footfalls is far more pointed, and in the course of composition occurred so forcibly to myself that I hesitated to use the term. I finally used it, because I saw that it had, in its first conception, been suggested to my mind by the sense of the supernatural with which it was, at the moment, filled. No human or physical foot could tinkle on a soft carpet, therefore, the tinkling of feet would vividly convey the supernatural impression. This was the idea, and it is good within itself, but if it fails, (as I fear it does), to make itself immediately and generally felt, according to my intention, then in so much is it badly conveyed, or expressed 'Ibid., XVII, 206-07

But the fact is I was napping, and so gently you came rapping,
 And so faintly you came tapping, tapping at my chamber door,
 That I scarce was sure I heard you'—here
 I opened wide the door,— Darkness there and nothing more

Deep into that darkness peering long I stood there wondering, fearing, Doubting, dreaming dreams no mortal ever dared to dream before, But the silence was unbroken, and the stillness gave no token, And the only word there spoken was the whispered word, 'Lenore?'
 This I whispered, and an echo murmured back the word, 'Lenore!' Merely this and nothing more 30

Back into the chamber turning, all my soul within me burning, Soon again I heard a tapping somewhat louder than before 'Surely,' said I, 'surely that is something at my window lattice, Let me see, then, what thereat is, and this mystery explore—Let my heart be still a moment and this mystery explore,—
 'Tis the wind and nothing more!"

Open here I flung the shutter, when, with many a flirt and flutter, In there stepped a stately Raven of the saintly days of yore, Not the least obeisance made he, not a minute stopped or stayed he,
 But, with mien of lord or lady, perched above my chamber door— 40 Perched upon a bust of Pallas just above my chamber door—
 Perched, and sat, and nothing more.

Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling, By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore,
 'Though thy crest be shorn and shaven, thou,' I said, 'art sure no craven, Ghastly grim and ancient Raven wandering from the Nightly shore—Tell me what thy lordly name is on the Night's Plutonian shore!
 Quoth the Raven, 'Nevermore'

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly, Though its answer little meaning—little relevancy bore, 50
 For we cannot help agreeing that no living human being Ever yet was blessed with seeing bird above his chamber door—Bird or beast upon the sculptured bust above his chamber door,
 With such name as 'Nevermore'

But the Raven, sitting lonely on the placid bust, spoke only That one word, as if his soul in that one word he did outpour Nothing farther then he uttered—not a feather then he fluttered—Till I scarcely more than muttered 'Other friends have flown before—On the morrow he will leave me, as my Hopes have flown before'
 Then the bird said 'Nevermore' 60

Startled at the stillness broken by reply so aptly spoken,
 'Doubtless,' said I, 'what it utters is its only stock and store Caught from some unhappy master whom unmerciful Disaster Followed fast and followed faster till his songs one burden bore—Till the dirges of his Hope that melancholy burden bore
 Of "Never—nevermore"'

But the Raven still beguiling my sad fancy into smiling, Straight I wheeled a cushioned seat in front of bird, and bust and door, Then, upon the velvet sinking, I betook myself to linking Fancy unto fancy, thinking what this ominous bird of yore— 70 What this grim, ungainly, ghastly, gaunt, and ominous bird of yore Meant in croaking 'Nevermore'

This I sat engaged in guessing, but no syllable expressing To the fowl whose fiery eyes now burned into my bosom's core, This and more I sat divining, with my head at ease reclining

On the cushion's velvet lining that the lamp-light gloated o'er, But whose velvet-violet lining with the lamp-light gloating o'er,
She shall press, ah, nevermore!

Then, methought, the air grew denser, perfumed from an unseen censer

Swung by seraphim whose foot-falls tinkled on the tufted floor 80

'Wretch,' I cried, 'thy God hath lent thee—by these angels he hath sent thee

Respite—respite and nepenthe from thy memories of Lenore,

Quaff, oh quaff this kind nepenthe and forget this lost Lenore!

Quoth the Raven 'Nevermore'

'Prophet!' said I, 'thing of evil!—prophet still, if bird or devil!—

Whether Tempter sent, or whether tempest tossed thee here ashore,

Desolate yet all undaunted, on this desert land enchanted—

On this home by Horror haunted—tell me truly, I implore—

Is there—is there balm in Gilead?—tell me —tell me, I implore!

Quoth the Raven 'Nevermore' 90

'Prophet!' said I, 'thing of evil!—prophet
 still, if bird or devil!

By that Heaven that bends above us—by
 that God we both adore—

Tell this soul with sorrow laden if, within
 the distant Aidenn,

It shall clasp a sainted maiden whom the angels name Lenore—

Clasp a rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore'

Quoth the Raven 'Nevermore'

'Be that word our sign of parting, bird or fiend!' I shrieked, upstarting—

'Get thee back into the tempest and the Night's Plutonian shore!

Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul hath spoken!

Leave my loneliness unbroken!—quit the bust above my door! 100

Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!

Quoth the Raven 'Nevermore'

And the Raven, never flitting, still is sitting,
still is sitting

 chamber door;

And his eyes have all the seeming of a
 demon's that is dreaming,

And the lamp-light o'er him streaming
 throws his shadow on the floor,

And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor

Shall be lifted—nevermore!

ULALUME—A BALLAD <sup>1</sup>

THE skies they were ashen and sober, The leaves they were crisped and sere—

The leaves they were withering and sere

It was night, in the lonesome October
 Of my most immemorial year

It was hard by the dim lake of Auber, In the misty mid region of Weir—

It was down by the dank tarn of Auber, In the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir

Here once, through an alley Titanic, 10
 Of cypress, I roamed with my Soul—

Of cypress, with Psyche, my Soul These were days when my heart was volcanic

As the scoriac rivers that roll—

As the lavas that restlessly roll

Their sulphurous currents down Yaanek

In the ultimate climes of the Pole—

That groan as they roll down Mount Yaanek

In the realms of the Boreal Pole.

Our talk had been serious and sober, 20 But our thoughts they were palsied and sere—

Our memories were treacherous and
 sere,

<sup>1</sup> 'On transcribing "Ulalume" for a friend, Poe wrote to her "I would endeavor to explain to you what I really meant—or what I fancied I meant by the poem, if it were not that I remembered Dr. Johnson's bitter and rather just remark about the folly of explaining what, if worth explanation, would explain itself. He has a happy witicism, too, about some book which he calls "as obscure as an explanatory note"'" Whitty, ed., The Complete Poems of Edgar Allan Poe (Boston, 1911), 247

For we knew not the month was October, And we marked not the night of the year
 (Ah, night of all nights in the year!)— We noted not the dim lake of Auber (Though once we had journeyed down here)—
 We remembered not the dank tarn of Auber, Nor the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir

And now, as the night was senescent 30
 And star-dials pointed to morn—
 As the star-dials hunted of morn—
 At the end of our path a liquescent And nebulous lustre was born,
 Out of which a miraculous crescent Arose with a duplicate horn—Astarte's bediamonded crescent Distinct with its duplicate horn

And I said 'She is warmer than Dian, She rolls through an ether of sighs— 40
 She revels in a region of sighs She has seen that the tears are not dry on These cheeks, where the worm never dies,
 And has come past the stars of the Lion,
 To point us the path to the skies—
 To the Lethæan peace of the skies—Come up, in despite of the Lion, To shine on us with her bright eyes—
 Come up through the lair of the Lion, With love in her luminous eyes ' 50

But Psyche, uplifting her finger, Said 'Sadly this star I mistrust—Her pallor I strangely mistrust Ah, hasten!—ah, let us not linger!
 Ah, fly!—let us fly!—for we must '
 In terror she spoke, letting sink her Wings till they trailed in the dust—In agony sobbed, letting sink her Plumes till they trailed in the dust—Till they sorrowfully trailed in the dust 60

I replied 'This is nothing but dreaming'
 Let us on by this tremulous light!
 Let us bathe in this crystalline light!
 Its Sibyllic splendor is beaming With Hope and in Beauty to-night — See!—it flickers up the sky through the night!

Ah, we safely may trust to its gleaming,
 And be sure it will lead us aright—
 We surely may trust to a gleaming, That cannot but guide us aright, 70 Since it flickers up to Heaven through the night '

Thus I pacified Psyche and kissed her,
 And tempted her out of her gloom—And conquered her scruples and gloom,
 And we passed to the end of the vista,
 But were stopped by the door of a tomb—
 By the door of a legended tomb,
 And I said 'What is written, sweet sister,
 On the door of this legended tomb?'
 She replied 'Ulalume—Ulalume!— 80
 'T is the vault of thy lost Ulalume!'

Then my heart it grew ashen and sober As the leaves that were crispèd and sere—
 As the leaves that were withering and
 sere,
 And I cried 'It was surely October
 On this very night of last year That I journeyed—I journeyed down
 That I brought a dread burden down
 On this night of all nights in the year,
 Ah, what demon hath tempted me
 here? 90
 Well I know, now, this dim lake of Auber—This misty mid region of Weir—Well I know, now, this dank tarn of Auber, This ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir '

Said we, then—the two, then 'Ah, can it Have been that the woodlandish ghouls—
 The pitiful, the merciful ghouls—
 To bar up our way and to ban it From the secret that lies in these wolds—
 From the thing that lies hidden in these wolds— 100
 Have drawn up the spectre of a planet
 From the limbo of lunar souls—
 This sinfully scintillant planet From the Hell of the planetary souls?'

THE BELLS

I

HEAR the sledges with the bells—Silver bells!
 What a world of merriment their melody foretells!
 How they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle,
 In the icy air of night!
 While the stars that oversprinkle
 All the heavens, seem to twinkle With a crystalline delight, Keeping time, time, time,
 In a sort of Runic rhyme,
 To the tintinnabulation that so musically wells
 From the bells, bells, bells, bells, Bells, bells, bells—
 From the jingling and the tinkling of the bells

2

Hear the mellow wedding bells—Golden bells!
 What a world of happiness their harmony
 foretells!
 Through the balmy air of night
 How they ring out their delight!—
 From the molten-golden notes,
 And all in tune,
 What a liquid ditty floats To the turtle-dove that listens, while she gloats
 On the moon!
 Oh, from out the sounding cells, What a gush of euphony voluminously wells!
 How it swells!
 How it dwells
 On the Future!—how it tells Of the rapture that impels
 To the swinging and the ringing
 Of the bells, bells, bells—
 Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
 Bells, bells, bells—
 To the rhyming and the churning of the bells!

3

Hear the loud alarm bells—Brazen bells!
 What a tale of terror, now, their turbulency tells!
 In the startled ear of night
 How they scream out their affright!

Too much horrified to speak,
 They can only shriek, shriek, Out of tune,
 In a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire,
 In a mad expostulation with the deaf and frantic fire,
 Leaping higher, higher, higher,
 With a desperate desire,
 And a resolute endeavor Now—now to sit, or never,
 By the side of the pale-faced moon.
 Oh, the bells, bells, bells!
 What a tale their terror tells Of Despair!
 How they clang, and clash, and roar!
 What a horror they outpour
 On the bosom of the palpitating air!
 Yet the ear, it fully knows,
 By the twanging
 And the clanging,
 How the danger ebbs and flows;
 Yet the ear distinctly tells,
 In the jangling
 And wrangling,
 How the danger sinks and swells, By the sinking or the swelling in the anger of the bells—
 Of the bells,—
 Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
 Bells, bells, bells—
 In the clamor and the clangor of the bells!

4

Hear the tolling of the bells—Iron bells!
 What a world of solemn thought their monody compels!
 In the silence of the night,
 How we shiver with affright
 At the melancholy menace of their tone!
 For every sound that floats From the rust within their throats Is a groan
 And the people—ah, the people—They that dwell up in the steeple, All alone,
 And who tolling, tolling, tolling,
 In that muffled monotone, Feel a glory in so rolling On the human heart a stone—
 They are neither man nor woman—They are neither brute nor human—They are Ghouls —

And their king it is who tolls —
 And he rolls, rolls, rolls, 90 Rolls
 A pæan from the bells!
 And his merry bosom swells
 With the pæan of the bells!
 And he dances, and he yells,
 Keeping time, time, time,
 In a sort of Runic rhyme,
 To the pæan of the bells—
 Of the bells —
 Keeping time, time, time, 100
 In a sort of Runic rhyme,
 To the throbbing of the bells—
 Of the bells, bells, bells—
 To the sobbing of the bells,
 Keeping time, time, time,
 As he knells, knells, knells,
 In a happy Runic rhyme,
 To the rolling of the bells—
 Of the bells, bells, bells —
 To the tolling of the bells— 110
 Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
 Bells, bells, bells—
 To the moaning and the groaning of the bells

ELDORADO

GAILY bedight,
 A gallant knight,
 In sunshine and in shadow,
 Had journeyed long,
 Singing a song,
 In search of Eldorado

 But he grew old—
 This knight so bold—
 And o'er his heart a shadow Fell as he found 10
 No spot of ground
 That looked like Eldorado

 And, as his strength Failed him at length, He met a pilgrim shadow—
 'Shadow,' said he,
 'Where can it be—
 This land of Eldorado?'

 'Over the Mountains Of the Moon, 20
 Down the Valley of the Shadow,

Ride, boldly ride,'
 The shade replied,—
 'If you seek for Eldorado'

FOR ANNIE

THANK Heaven! the crisis,
 The danger, is past,
 And the lingering illness Is over at last—
 And the fever called 'Living'
 Is conquered at last

 Sadly, I know
 I am shorn of my strength,
 And no muscle I move
 As I lie at full length— 10
 But no matter!—I feel I am better at length

 And I rest so composedly,
 Now, in my bed,
 That any beholder Might fancy me dead—Might start at beholding me, Thinking me dead

 The moaning and groaning,
 The sighing and sobbing, 20
 Are quieted now,
 With that horrible throbbing
 At heart —ah, that horrible, Horrible throbbing!

 The sickness—the nausea—
 The pitiless pain—
 Have ceased with the fever That maddened my brain—
 With the fever called 'Living' That burned in my brain 30

 And oh! of all tortures That torture the worst Has abated—the terrible Torture of thirst
 For the naphthaline river Of Passion accurst —
 I have drank of a water That quenches all thirst —

 Of a water that flows,
 With a lullaby sound, 40
 From a spring but a very few Feet under ground—

From a cavern not very far Down under ground

And ah! let it never Be foolishly said
That my room it is gloomy
And narrow my bed,
For a man never slept
In a different bed— 50
And, to sleep, you must slumber In just such a bed

My tantalized spirit
Here blandly reposes, Forgetting, or never Regretting, its roses—
Its old agitations
Of myrtles and roses

For now, while so quietly Lying, it fancies 60
A holier odor
About it, of pansies—
A rosemary odor, Commingled with pansies—With rue and the beautiful Puritan pansies

And so it lies happily, Bathing in many A dream of the truth
And the beauty of Annie— 70 Drowned in a bath
Of the tresses of Annie

She tenderly kissed me,
She fondly caressed,
And then I fell gently
To sleep on her breast—Deeply to sleep
From the heaven of her breast.

When the light was extinguished,
She covered me warm, 80
And she prayed to the angels To keep me from harm—
To the queen of the angels
To shield me from harm.

And I lie so composedly,
Now, in my bed
(Knowing her love),
That you fancy me dead—
And I rest so contentedly,
Now, in my bed 90

(With her love at my breast),
That you fancy me dead—
That you shudder to look at me,
Thinking me dead —

But my heart it is brighter Than all of the many Stars in the sky,
For it sparkles with Annie—
It glows with the light Of the love of my Annie— 100
With the thought of the light Of the eyes of my Annie.

TO MY MOTHER

BECAUSE I feel that, in the Heavens above,
The angels, whispering to one another, Can find, among their burning terms of love,
None so devotional as that of 'Mother', Therefore by that dear name I long have called you—
You who are more than mother unto
me,
And fill my heart of hearts, where Death installed you
In setting my Virginia's spirit free My mother—my own mother, who died early,
Was but the mother of myself, but you 10
Are mother to the one I loved so dearly, And thus are dearer than the mother I knew

By that infinity with which my wife Was dearer to my soul than its soul-life

It was many and many a year ago,
In a kingdom by the sea,
That a maiden there lived whom you may know
By the name of Annabel Lee,— And this maiden she lived with no other thought
Than to love and be loved by me.

She was a child and I was a child,
In this kingdom by the sea,

<sup>1</sup> The poem is generally considered the last of Poe's compositions, and to have been written in memory of his child-wife, Virginia

But we loved with a love that was more than love—

I and my Annabel Lee—

With a love that the wingèd seraphs of

Coveted her and me

And this was the reason that, long ago,

In this kingdom by the sea,

A wind blew out of a cloud by night

Chilling my Annabel Lee,

So that her highborn kinsmen came

And bore her away from me,

To shut her up in a sepulchre

In this kingdom by the sea

The angels, not half so happy in Heaven,

Went envying her and me —

Yes! that was the reason (as all men know,

In this kingdom by the sea)

That the wind came out of the cloud, chilling

And killing my Annabel Lee

But our love it was stronger by far than the love

Of those who were older than we—

Of many far wiser than we—

And neither the angels in Heaven above 30

Nor the demons down under the sea,

Can ever dissever my soul from the soul

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee —

For the moon never beams without bringing me dreams

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee,

And the stars never rise but I see the bright eyes

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee,

And so, all the night-tide, I lie down by the side

Of my darling, my darling, my life and my bride,

In her sepulchre there by the sea— 40

In her tomb by the side of the sea

THE OLD MANSE

THE AUTHOR MAKES THE READER ACQUAINTED WITH HIS ABODE

BETWEEN two tall gateposts of rough-hewn stone (the gate itself having fallen from its hinges at some unknown epoch) we beheld the gray front of the old parsonage terminating the vista of an avenue of black ash-trees. It was now a twelvemonth since 10 the funeral procession of the venerable clergyman, its last inhabitant, had turned from that gateway towards the village burying-ground. The wheel-track leading to the door, as well as the whole breadth of the avenue, was almost overgrown with grass, affording dainty mouthfuls to two or three vagrant cows and an old white horse who had his own living to pick up along the roadside. The glimmering shadows that lay 20 half asleep between the door of the house and the public highway were a kind of spiritual medium, seen through which the edifice had not quite the aspect of belonging to the material world. Certainly it had little in common with those ordinary abodes which stand so imminent upon the road that every passer-by can thrust his head, as it were, into the domestic circle. From these quiet windows the figures of passing travel- lers looked too remote and dim to disturb the sense of privacy. In its near retirement and accessible seclusion it was the very spot for the residence of a clergyman,—a man not estranged from human life, yet enveloped in the midst of it with a veil woven of intermingled gloom and brightness. It was worthy to have been one of the time-honored parsonages of England in which, through many generations, a succession of holy occupants pass from youth to age, and bequeath each an inheritance of sanctity to pervade the house and hover over it as with an atmosphere.

Nor, in truth, had the Old Manse ever been profaned by a lay occupant until that memorable summer afternoon when I entered it as my home. A priest had built it, a priest had succeeded to it, other priestly men from time to time had dwelt in it, and children born in its chambers had grown up to assume the priestly character. It was awful to reflect how many sermons must have been written there. The latest inhabitant alone—he by whose translation to Paradise the dwelling was left vacant—had penned nearly three thousand discourses, besides the better, if not the greater, number that gushed living from his lips. How often, no doubt, had he paced to and fro along the avenue, attuning his meditations to the sighs and gentle murmurs, and deep and solemn peals of the wind among the lofty tops of the trees! In that variety of natural utterances he could find something accordant with every passage of his sermon, were it of tenderness or reverential fear. The boughs over my head seemed shadowy with solemn thoughts as well as with rustling leaves. I took shame to myself for having been so long a writer of idle stories, and ventured to hope that wisdom would descend upon me with the falling leaves of the avenue, and that I should light upon an intellectual treasure in the Old Manse well worth those hoards of long-hidden gold which people seek for in moss-grown houses. Profound treatises of morality, a layman's unprofessional and therefore unprejudiced views of religion, histories (such as Bancroft might have written had he taken up his abode here as he once purposed) bright with picture, gleaming over a depth of philosophic thought,—these were the works that might fitly have flowed from such a retirement. In the humblest event I resolved at least to achieve a novel that should evolve some deep lesson and should possess physical substance enough to stand alone.

In furtherance of my design, and as if to leave me no pretext for not fulfilling it, there was in the rear of the house the most delightful little nook of a study that ever afforded its snug seclusion to a scholar. It was here that Emerson wrote Nature, for he was then an inhabitant of the Manse, and used to watch the Assyrian dawn and Paphian sunset and moonrise from the summit of our eastern hill. When I first saw the room its walls were blackened with the smoke of unnumbered years, and made still blacker by the grim prints of Puritan ministers that hung around. These worthies looked strangely like bad angels, or at least like men who had wrestled so continually and so sternly with the devil that somewhat of his sooty fierceness had been imparted to their own visages. They had all vanished now, a cheerful coat of paint and golden-tinted paper-hangings lighted up the small apartment, while the shadow of a willow-tree that swept against the overhanging eaves attempered the cheery western sunshine. In place of the grim prints there was the sweet and lovely head of one of Raphael's Madonnas and two pleasant little pictures of the Lake of Como. The only other decorations were a purple vase of flowers, always fresh, and a bronze one containing graceful ferns. My books (few, and by no means choice, for they were chiefly such waifs as chance had thrown in my way) stood in order about the room, seldom to be disturbed.

The study had three windows, set with little, old-fashioned panes of glass, each with a crack across it. The two on the western side looked, or rather peeped, between the willow branches down into the orchard, with glimpses of the river through the trees. The third, facing northward, commanded a broader view of the river at a spot where its hitherto obscure waters gleam forth into the light of history. It was at this window that the clergyman who then dwelt in the Manse stood watching the outbreak of a long and deadly struggle between two nations; he saw the irregular array of his parishioners on the farther side of the river and the glittering line of the British on the hither bank. He awaited in an agony of suspense the rattle of the musketry. It came, and there needed but a gentle wind to sweep the battle smoke around this quiet house.

Perhaps the reader, whom I cannot help considering as my guest in the Old Manse and entitled to all courtesy in the way of sight-showing,—perhaps he will choose to take a nearer view of the memorable spot. We stand now on the river's brink. It may well be called the Concord, the river of peace and quietness, for it is certainly the most unexcitable and sluggish stream that ever loitered imperceptibly towards its eternity—the sea. Positively, I had lived three weeks beside it before it grew quite clear to my perception which way the current flowed. It never has a vivacious aspect except when a northwestern breeze is vexing its surface on a sunshiny day. From the incurable indolence of its nature, the stream is happily incapable of becoming the slave of human ingenuity, as is the fate of so many a wild, free mountain torrent. While all things else are compelled to subserve some useful purpose, it idles its sluggish life away in lazy liberty, without turning a solitary spindle or affording even water-power enough to grind the corn that grows upon its banks. The torpor of its movement allows it nowhere a bright, pebbly shore, nor so much as a narrow strip of glistening sand, in any part of its course. It slumbers between broad prairies, kissing the long meadow grass, and bathes the overhanging boughs of elder bushes and willows or the roots of elms and ash-trees and clumps of maples. Flags and rushes grow along its plashy shore, the yellow water-lily spreads its broad, flat leaves on the margin, and the fragrant white pond-lily abounds, generally selecting a position just so far from the river's brink that it cannot be grasped save at the hazard of plunging in.

It is a marvel whence this perfect flower derives its loveliness and perfume, springing as it does from the black mud over which the river sleeps, and where lurk the slimy eel and speckled frog and the mud turtle, whom continual washing cannot cleanse. It is the very same black mud out of which the yellow lily sucks its obscene life and noisome odor. Thus we see, too, in the world that some persons assimilate only what is ugly and evil from the same moral circumstances which supply good and beautified results—the fragrance of celestial flowers—to the daily life of others.

The reader must not, from any testimony of mine, contract a dislike towards our slumberous stream. In the light of a calm and golden sunset it becomes lovely beyond expression, the more lovely for the quietude that so well accords with the hour, when even the wind, after blustering all day long, usually hushes itself to rest. Each tree and rock, and every blade of grass, is distinctly imaged, and, however unsightly in reality, assumes ideal beauty in the reflection. The minutest things of earth and the broad aspect of the firmament are pictured equally without effort and with the same felicity of success. All the sky glows downward at our feet, the rich clouds float through the unruffled bosom of the stream like heavenly thoughts through a peaceful heart. We will not, then, malign our river as gross and impure while it can glorify itself with so adequate a picture of the heaven that broods above it, or, if we remember its tawny hue and the muddiness of its bed, let it be a symbol that the earthliest human soul has an infinite spiritual capacity and may contain the better world within its depths. But, indeed, the same lesson might be drawn out of any mud puddle in the streets of a city, and, being taught us everywhere, it must be true.

Come, we have pursued a somewhat devious track in our walk to the battle-ground. Here we are, at the point where the river was crossed by the old bridge, the possession of which was the immediate object of the contest. On the hither side grow two or three elms, throwing a wide circumference of shade, but which must have been planted at some period within the three-score years and ten that have passed since the battle day. On the farther shore, overhung by a clump of elder-bushes, we discern the stone abutment of the bridge. Looking down into the river, I once discovered some heavy fragments of the timbers, all green with half a century's growth of water-moss, for during that length of time the tramp of horses and human footsteps have ceased along this ancient highway. The stream has here about the breadth of twenty strokes of a swimmer's arm,—a space not too wide when the bullets were whistling across. Old people who dwell hereabouts will point out the very spots on the western bank where our countrymen fell down and died, and on this side of the river an obelisk of granite has grown up from the soil that was fertilized with British blood. The monument, not more than twenty feet in height, is such as it befitted the inhabitants of a village to erect in illustration of a matter of local interest rather than what was suitable to commemorate an epoch of national history. Still, by the fathers of the village this famous deed was done, and their descendants might rightfully claim the privilege of building a memorial.

A humbler token of the fight, yet a more interesting one than the granite obelisk, may be seen close under the stone-wall which separates the battle-ground from the precincts of the parsonage. It is the grave—marked by a small, mossgrown fragment of stone at the head and another at the foot—the grave of two British soldiers who were slain in the skirmish, and have ever since slept peacefully where Zechariah Brown and Thomas Davis buried them. Soon was their warfare ended, a weary night march from Boston, a rattling volley of musketry across the river, and then these many years of rest. In the long procession of slain invaders who passed into eternity from the battle-fields of the revolution, these two nameless soldiers led the way.

Lowell, the poet, as we were once standing over this grave, told me a tradition in reference to one of the inhabitants below. The story has something deeply impressive, though its circumstances cannot altogether be reconciled with probability. A youth in the service of the clergyman happened to be chopping wood, that April morning, at the back door of the Manse, and when the noise of battle rang from side to side of the bridge he hastened across the intervening field to see what might be going forward. It is rather strange, by the way, that this lad should have been so diligently at work when the whole population of town and country were startled out of their customary business by the advance of the British troops. Be that as it might, the tradition says that the lad now left his task and hurried to the battle-field with the axe still in his hand. The British had by this time retreated, the Americans were in pursuit, and the late scene of strife was thus deserted by both parties. Two soldiers lay on the ground—one was a corpse, but, as the young New Englander drew nigh, the other Briton raised himself painfully upon his hands and knees and gave a ghastly stare into his face. The boy,—it must have been a nervous impulse, without purpose, without thought, and betokening a sensitive and impressible nature rather than a hardened one,—the boy uplifted his axe and dealt the wounded soldier a fierce and fatal blow upon the head.

I could wish that the grave might be opened, for I would fain know whether either of the skeleton soldiers has the mark of an axe in his skull. The story comes home to me like truth. Oftentimes, as an intellectual and moral exercise, I have sought to follow that poor youth through his subsequent career, and observe how his soul was tortured by the blood stain, contracted as it had been before the long custom of war had robbed human life of its sanctity, and while it still seemed murderous to slay a brother-man. This one circumstance has borne more fruit for me than all that history tells us of the fight.

Many strangers come in the summer time to view the battle-ground. For my own part, I have never found my imagination much excited by this or any other scene of historic celebrity, nor would the placid margin of the river have lost any of its charm for me had men never fought and died there. There is a wilder interest in the tract of land—perhaps a hundred yards in breadth—which extends between the battle-field and the northern face of our Old Manse, with its contiguous avenue and orchard. Here, in some unknown age, before the white man came, stood an Indian village, convenient to the river, whence its inhabitants must have drawn so large a part of their subsistence. The site is identified by the spear and arrowheads, the chusels, and other implements of war, labor, and the chase, which the plough turns up from the soil. You see a splinter of stone, half hidden beneath a sod, it looks like nothing worthy of note, but, if you have faith enough to pick it up, behold a relic! Thoreau, who has a strange faculty of finding what the Indians have left behind them, first set me on the search, and I afterwards enriched myself with some very perfect specimens, so rudely wrought that it seemed almost as if chance had fashioned them. Their great charm consists in this rudeness and in the individuality of each article, so different from the productions of civilized machinery, which shapes everything on one pattern. There is exquisite delight, too, in picking up for one's self an arrowhead that was dropped centuries ago and has never been handled since, and which we thus receive directly from the hand of the red hunter, who purposed to shoot it at his game or at an enemy. Such an incident builds up again the Indian village and its encircling forest, and recalls to life the painted chiefs and warriors, the squaws at their household toil, and the children sporting among the wigwams, while the little wind-rocked pappoose swings from the branch of the tree. It can hardly be told whether it is a joy or a pain, after such a momentary vision, to gaze around in the broad daylight of reality and see stone fences, white houses, potato fields, and men doggedly hoeing in their shirtsleeves and homespun pantaloons. But this is nonsense. The Old Manse is better than a thousand wigwams.

The Old Manse! We had almost forgotten it, but will return thither through the orchard. This was set out by the last clergyman, in the decline of his life, when the neighbors laughed at the hoary-headed man for planting trees from which he could have no prospect of gathering fruit. Even had that been the case, there was only so much the better motive for planting them, in the pure and unselfish hope of benefiting his successors,—an end so seldom achieved by more ambitious efforts. But the old minister, before reaching his patriarchal age of ninety, ate the apples from this orchard during many years, and added silver and gold to his annual stipend by disposing of the superfluity. It is pleasant to think of him walking among the trees in the quiet afternoons of early autumn and picking up here and there a windfall, while he observes how heavily the branches are weighed down, and computes the number of empty flour barrels that will be filled by their burden. He loved each tree, doubtless, as if it had been his own child. An orchard has a relation to mankind, and readily connects itself with matters of the heart. The trees possess a domestic character, they have lost the wild nature of their forest kindred, and have grown humanized by receiving the care of man as well as by contributing to his wants. There is so much individuality of character, too, among apple-trees that it gives them an additional claim to be the objects of human interest. One is harsh and crabbed in its manifestations, another gives us fruit as mild as charity. One is churlish and illiberal, evidently grudging the few apples that it bears, another exhausts itself in free-hearted benevolence. The variety of grotesque shapes into which apple-trees contort themselves has its effect on those who get acquainted with them: they stretch out their crooked branches, and take such hold of the imagination that we remember them as humorists and odd-fellows. And what is more melancholy than the old apple-trees that linger about the spot where once stood a homestead, but where there is now only a ruined chimney rising out of a grassy and weed-grown cellar? They offer their fruit to every wayfarer,—apples that are bitter sweet with the moral of Time's vicissitude.

10 I have met with no other such pleasant trouble in the world as that of finding myself, with only the two or three mouths which it was my privilege to feed, the sole inheritor of the old clergyman's wealth of fruits. Throughout the summer there were cherries and currants, and then came autumn, with his immense burden of apples, dropping them continually from his overlaiden shoulders as he trudged along.
20 In the stillest afternoon, if I listened, the thump of a great apple was audible, falling without a breath of wind, from the mere necessity of perfect ripeness. And, besides, there were pear-trees, that flung down bushels upon bushels of heavy pears, and peach-trees, which, in a good year, tormented me with peaches, neither to be eaten nor kept, nor, without labor and perplexity, to be given away. The idea of an 30 infinite generosity and exhaustless bounty on the part of our Mother Nature was well worth obtaining through such cares as these. That feeling can be enjoyed in perfection only by the natives of summer islands, where the bread-fruit, the cocoa, the palm, and the orange grow spontaneously and hold forth the ever-ready meal, but likewise almost as well by a man long habituated to city life, who plunges into 40 such a solitude as that of the Old Manse, where he plucks the fruit of trees that he did not plant, and which therefore, to my heterodox taste, bear the closest resemblance to those that grew in Eden. It has been an apothegm these five thousand years, that toil sweetens the bread it earns. For my part (speaking from hard experience, acquired while belaboring the rugged furrows of Brook Farm), I relish best the 50 free gifts of Providence.

Not that it can be disputed that the light toil requisite to cultivate a moderately-sized garden imparts such zest to kitchen vegetables as is never found in those of the market gardener. Childless men, if they would know something of the bliss of paternity, should plant a seed,—be it squash, bean, Indian corn, or perhaps a mere flower or worthless weed,—should plant it with their own hands, and nurse it from infancy to maturity altogether by their own care. If there be not too many of them, each individual plant becomes an object of separate interest. My garden, that skirted the avenue of the Manse, was of precisely the right extent. An hour or two of morning labor was all that it required. But I used to visit and revisit it a dozen times a day, and stand in deep contemplation over my vegetable progeny with a love that nobody could share or conceive of who had never taken part in the process of creation. It was one of the most bewitching sights in the world to observe a hill of beans thrusting aside the soil, or a row of early peas just peeping forth sufficiently to trace a line of delicate green. Later in the season the humming-birds were attracted by the blossoms of a peculiar variety of bean, and they were a joy to me, those little spiritual visitants, for deigning to sip airy food out of my nectar cups. Multitudes of bees used to bury themselves in the yellow blossoms of the summer squashes. This, too, was a deep satisfaction, although when they had laden themselves with sweets they flew away to some unknown hive, which would give back nothing in requital of what my garden had contributed. But I was glad thus to fling a benefaction upon the passing breeze with the certainty that somebody must profit by it, and that there would be a little more honey in the world to allay the sourness and bitterness which mankind is always complaining of. Yes, indeed, my life was the sweeter for that honey.

Speaking of summer squashes, I must say a word of their beautiful and varied forms. They presented an endless diversity of urns and vases, shallow or deep, scalloped or plain, moulded in patterns which a sculptor would do well to copy, since Art has never invented anything more graceful. A hundred squashes in the garden were worthy, in my eyes at least, of being rendered indestructible in marble. If ever Providence (but I know it never will) should assign me a superfluity of gold, part of it shall be expended for a service of plate, or most delicate porcelain, to be wrought into the shapes of summer squashes gathered from vines which I will plant with my own hands. As dishes for containing vegetables they would be peculiarly appropriate.

But not merely the squeamish love of the beautiful was gratified by my toil in the kitchen garden. There was a hearty enjoyment, likewise, in observing the growth of the crook-necked winter squashes, from the first little bulb, with the withered blossom adhering to it, until they lay strewn upon the soil, big, round fellows, hiding their heads beneath the leaves, but turning up their great yellow rotundities to the noon-tide sun. Gazing at them, I felt that by my agency something worth living for had been done. A new substance was born into the world. They were real and tangible existences, which the mind could seize hold of and rejoice in. A cabbage, too,—especially the early Dutch cabbage, which swells to a monstrous circumference, until its ambitious heart often bursts asunder,—is a matter to be proud of when we can claim a share with the earth and sky in producing it. But, after all, the hugest pleasure is reserved until these vegetable children of ours are smoking on the table, and we, like Saturn, make a meal of them.

What with the river, the battle-field, the orchard and the garden, the reader begins to despair of finding his way back into the Old Manse. But in agreeable weather it is the truest hospitality to keep him out-of-doors. I never grew quite acquainted with my habitation till a long spell of sulky rain had confined me beneath its roof. There could not be a more sombre aspect of external nature than as then seen from the windows of my study. The great willow-tree had caught and retained among its leaves a whole cataract of water, to be shaken down at intervals by the frequent gusts of wind. All day long, and for a week together, the rain was drip-drip-dripping and splash-splash-splashing from the eaves, and bubbling and foaming into the tubs beneath the spouts. The old, unpainted shingles of the house and out-buildings were black with moisture; and the mosses of ancient growth upon the walls looked green and fresh, as if they were the newest things and afterthought of Time. The usually mirrored surface of the river was blurred by an infinity of raindrops, the whole landscape had a completely water-soaked appearance, conveying the impression that the earth was wet through like a sponge; while the summit of a wooded hill, about a mile distant, was enveloped in a dense mist, where the demon of the tempest seemed to have his abiding-place and to be plotting still direr inclemencies

Nature has no kindness, no hospitality, during a rain. In the fiercest heat of sunny days she retains a secret mercy, and welcomes the wayfarer to shady nooks of the woods whither the sun cannot penetrate, but she provides no shelter against her storms. It makes us shiver to think of those deep, umbrageous recesses, those over-shadowing banks, where we found such enjoyment during the sultry afternoons. Not a twig of foliage there but would dash a little shower into our faces. Looking reproachfully towards the impenetrable sky,—if sky there be above that dismal uniformity of cloud,—we are apt to murmur against the whole system of the universe, since it involves the extinction of so many summer days in so short a life by the hissing and spluttering rain. In such spells of weather—and it is to be supposed such weather came—Eve's bower in Paradise must have been but a cheerless and aguish kind of shelter, nowise comparable to the old parsonage, which had resources of its own to beguile the week's imprisonment. The idea of sleeping on a couch of wet roses!

Happy the man who in a rainy day can betake himself to a huge garret, stored, like that of the Manse, with lumber that each generation has left behind it from a period before the revolution. Our garret was an arched hall, dimly illuminated through small and dusty windows, it was but a twilight at the best, and there were nooks, or rather caverns, of deep obscurity, the secrets of which I never learned, being too reverent of their dust and cobwebs. The beams and rafters, roughly hewn and with strips of bark still on them, and the rude masonry of the chimneys, made the garret look wild and uncivilized,—an aspect unlike what was seen elsewhere in the quiet and decorous old house. But on one side there was a little whitewashed apartment which bore the traditionary title of the Saint's Chamber, because holy men in their youth had slept and studied and prayed there. With its elevated retirement, its one window, its small fireplace, and its closet, convenient for an oratory, it was the very spot where a young man might inspire himself with solemn enthusiasm and cherish saintly dreams. The occupants, at various epochs, had left brief records and ejaculations inscribed upon the walls. There, too, hung a tattered and shrivelled roll of canvas, which on inspection proved to be the forcibly wrought picture of a clergyman, in wig, band, and gown, holding a Bible in his hand. As I turned his face towards the light he eyed me with an air of authority such as men of his profession seldom assume in our days. The original had been pastor of the parish more than a century ago, a friend of Whitefield, and almost his equal in fervid eloquence. I bowed before the effigy of the dignified divine, and felt as if I had now met face to face with the ghost by whom, as there was reason to apprehend, the Manse was haunted.

Houses of any antiquity in New England are so invariably possessed with spirits that the matter seems hardly worth alluding to. Our ghost used to heave deep sighs in a particular corner of the parlor, and sometimes rustled paper, as if he were turning over a sermon in the long upper entry,—where nevertheless he was invisible in spite of the bright moonshine that fell through the eastern window. Not improbably he wished me to edit and publish a selection from a chest full of manuscript discourses that stood in the garret. Once, while Hillard and other friends sat talking with us in the twilight, there came a rustling noise as of a minister's silk gown, sweeping through the very midst of the company so closely as almost to brush against the chairs. Still there was nothing visible. A yet stranger business was that of a ghostly servant-maid, who used to be heard in the kitchen at deepest midnight grinding coffee, cooking, ironing,—performing, in short, all kinds of domestic labor,—although no traces of anything accomplished could be detected the next morning. Some neglected duty of her servitude—some ill-starched ministerial band—disturbed the poor damsel in her grave and kept her at work without any wages.

But to return from this digression. A part of my predecessor's library was stored in the garret,—no unfit receptacle indeed for such dreary trash as comprised the greater number of volumes. The old books would have been worth nothing at an auction. In this venerable garret, however, they possessed an interest, quite apart from their literary value, as heirlooms, many of which had been transmitted down through a series of consecrated hands from the days of the mighty Puritan divines. Autographs of famous names were to be seen in faded ink on some of their fly-leaves, and there were marginal observations or interpolated pages closely covered with manuscript in illegible shorthand, perhaps concealing matter of profound truth and wisdom. The world will never be the better for it. A few of the books were Latin folios, written by Catholic authors, others demolished Papistry, as with a sledge-hammer, in plain English. A dissertation on the book of Job—which only Job himself could have had patience to read—filled at least a score of small, thickset quartos, at the rate of two or three volumes to a chapter. Then there was a vast folio body of divinity—too corpulent a body, it might be feared, to comprehend the spiritual element of religion. Volumes of this form dated back two hundred years or more, and were generally bound in black leather, exhibiting precisely such an appearance as we should attribute to books of enchantment. Others equally antique were of a size proper to be carried in the large waistcoat pockets of old times,—diminutive, but as black as their bulkier brethren, and abundantly interfused with Greek and Latin quotations. These little old volumes impressed me as if they had been intended for very large ones, but had been unfortunately blighted at an early stage of their growth.

The rain pattered upon the roof and the sky gloomed through the dusty garret windows, while I burrowed among these venerable books in search of any living thought which should burn like a coal of fire, or glow like an inextinguishable gem, beneath the dead trumpery that had long hidden it. But I found no such treasure, all was dead alike, and I could not but muse deeply and wonderingly upon the humiliating fact that the works of man's intellect decay like those of his hands. Thought grows mouldy.

What was good and nourishing food for the spirits of one generation affords no sustenance for the next. Books of religion, however, cannot be considered a fair test of the enduring and vivacious properties of human thought, because such books so seldom really touch upon their ostensible subject, and have, therefore, so little business to be written at all. So long as an unlettered soul can attain to saving grace, there would seem to be no deadly error in holding theological libraries to be accumulations of, for the most part, stupendous impertinence.

Many of the books had accrued in the latter years of the last clergyman's lifetime. These threatened to be of even less interest than the elder works, a century hence, to any curious inquirer who should then rummage them as I was doing now. Volumes of the Liberal Preacher and Christian Examiner, occasional sermons, controversial pamphlets, tracts, and other productions of a like fugitive nature took the place of the thick and heavy volumes of past time. In a physical point of view there was much the same difference as between a feather and a lump of lead, but, intellectually regarded, the specific gravity of old and new was about upon a par. Both also were alike frigid. The elder books, nevertheless, seemed to have been earnestly written, and might be conceived to have possessed warmth at some former period, although, with the lapse of time, the heated masses had cooled down even to the freezing-point. The frigidity of the modern productions, on the other hand, was characteristic and inherent, and evidently had little to do with the writer's qualities of mind and heart. In fine, of this whole dusty heap of literature I tossed aside all the sacred part, and felt myself none the less a Christian for eschewing it. There appeared no hope of either mounting to the better world on a Gothic staircase of ancient folios or of flying thither on the wings of a modern tract.

Nothing, strange to say, retained any sap except what had been written for the passing day and year without the remotest pretension or idea of permanence. There were a few old newspapers, and still older almanacs, which reproduced to my mental eye the epochs when they had issued from the press with a distinctness that was altogether unaccountable. It was as if I had found bits of magic looking-glass among the books, with the images of a vanished century in them. I turned my eyes towards the tattered picture above mentioned, and asked of the austere divine wherefore it was that he and his brethren, after the most painful rummaging and groping into their minds, had been able to produce nothing half so real as these newspaper scribblers and almanac makers had thrown off in the effervescence of a moment. The portrait responded not, so I sought an answer for myself. It is the age itself that writes newspapers and almanacs, which, therefore, have a distinct purpose and meaning at the time, and a kind of intelligible truth for all times, whereas most other works—being written by men who, in the very act, set themselves apart from their age—are likely to possess little significance when new, and none at all when old. Genius, indeed, melts many ages into one, and thus effects something permanent, yet still with a similarity of office to that of the more ephemeral writer. A work of genius is but the newspaper of a century, or perchance of a hundred centuries.

Lightly as I have spoken of these old books, there yet lingers with me a superstitious reverence for literature of all kinds. A bound volume has a charm in my eyes similar to what scraps of manuscript possess for the good Mussulman. He imagines that those wind-wafted records are perhaps hallowed by some sacred verse, and I, that every new book or antique one may contain the 'open sesame,'—the spell to disclose treasures hidden in some unsuspected cave of Truth. Thus it was not without sadness that I turned away from the library of the Old Manse.

Blessed was the sunshyne when it came again at the close of another stormy day, beaming from the edge of the western horizon, while the massive firmament of clouds threw down all the gloom it could, but served only to kindle the golden light into a more brilliant glow by the strongly contrasted shadows. Heaven smiled at the earth, so long unseen, from beneath its heavy eyelid. To-morrow for the hill-tops and the wood-paths.

Or it might be that Ellery Channing came up the avenue to join me in a fishing excursion on the river. Strange and happy times were those when we cast aside all irksome forms and strait-laced habitudes, and delivered ourselves up to the free air, to live like the Indians or any less conventional race during one bright semicircle of the sun. Rowing our boat against the current, between wide meadows, we turned aside into the Assabeth. A more lovely stream than this, for a mile above its junction with the Concord, has never flowed on earth,—nowhere, indeed, except to lave the interior regions of a poet's imagination. It is sheltered from the breeze by woods and a hill-side, so that elsewhere there might be a hurricane, and here scarcely a ripple across the shaded water. The current lingers along so gently that the mere force of the boatman's will seems sufficient to propel his craft against it. It comes flowing softly through the midmost privacy and deepest heart of a wood which whispers it to be quiet, while the stream whispers back again from its sedgy borders, as if river and wood were hushing one another to sleep. Yes, the river sleeps along its course and dreams of the sky and of the clustering foliage, amid which fall showers of broken sunlight, imparting specks of vivid cheerfulness, in contrast with the quiet depth of the prevailing tint. Of all this scene, the slumbering river has a dream picture in its bosom. Which, after all, was the most real—the picture, or the original?—the objects palpable to our grosser senses, or their apotheosis in the stream beneath? Surely the disembodied images stand in closer relation to the soul. But both the original and the reflection had here an ideal charm, and, had it been a thought more wild, I could have fancied that this river had strayed forth out of the rich scenery of my companion's inner world, only the vegetation along its banks should then have had an Oriental character.

Gentle and unobtrusive as the river is, yet the tranquil woods seem hardly satisfied to allow its passage. The trees are rooted on the very verge of the water, and dip their pendent branches into it. At one spot there is a lofty bank, on the slope of which grow some hemlocks, declining across the stream with outstretched arms, as if resolute to take the plunge. In other places the banks are almost on a level with the water, so that the quiet congregation of trees set their feet in the flood, and are fringed with foliage down to the surface. Cardinal flowers kindle their spiral flames and illuminate the dark nooks among the shrubbery. The pond-lily grows abundantly along the margin—that delicious flower, which, as Thoreau tells me, opens its virgin bosom to the first sunlight and perfects its being through the magic of that genial kiss. He has beheld beds of them unfolding in due succession as the sunrise stole gradually from flower to flower—a sight not to be hoped for unless when a poet adjusts his inward eye to a proper focus with the outward organ. Grape-vines here and there twine themselves around shrub and tree and hang their clusters over the water within reach of the boatman's hand. Oftentimes they unite two trees of alien race in an inextricable twine, marrying the hemlock and the maple against their will, and enriching them with a purple offspring of which neither is the parent. One of these ambitious parasites has climbed into the upper branches of a tall, white pine, and is still ascending from bough to bough, unsatisfied till it shall crown the tree's airy summit with a wreath of its broad foliage and a cluster of its grapes.

The winding course of the stream continually shut out the scene behind us, and revealed as calm and lovely a one before. We glided from depth to depth, and breathed new seclusion at every turn. The shy kingfisher flew from the withered branch close at hand to another at a distance, uttering a shrill cry of anger or alarm. Ducks that had been floating there since the preceding eve were startled at our approach, and skimmed along the glassy river, breaking its dark surface with a bright streak. The pickerel leaped from among the lily-pads. The turtle, sunning itself upon a rock or at the root of a tree, slid suddenly into the water with a plunge. The painted Indian who paddled his canoe along the Assabeth three hundred years ago could hardly have seen a wilder gentleness displayed upon its banks and reflected in its bosom than we did. Nor could the same Indian have prepared his noon-tide meal with more simplicity. We drew up our skiff at some point where the over-arching shade formed a natural bower, and there kindled a fire with the pine cones and decayed branches that lay strewn plentifully around. Soon the smoke ascended among the trees, impregnated with a savory incense, not heavy, dull, and surfeiting, like the steam of cookery within doors, but sprightly and piquant. The smell of our feast was akin to the woodland odors with which it mingled; there was no sacrilege committed by our intrusion; there the sacred solitude was hospitable, and granted us free leave to cook and eat in the recess that was at once our kitchen and banquet-hall. It is strange what humble offices may be performed in a beautiful scene without destroying its poetry. Our fire, red gleaming among the trees, and we beside it, busied with culinary rites and spreading out our meal on a moss-grown log, all seemed in unison with the river gliding by and the foliage rustling over us. And, what was strangest, neither did our mirth seem to disturb the propriety of the solemn woods, although the hobgoblins of the old wilderness and the will-of-the-wisps that glimmered in the marshy places might have come trooping to share our table-talk, and have added their shrill laughter to our merriment. It was the very spot in which to utter the extremest nonsense or the profoundest wisdom, or that ethereal product of the mind which partakes of both, and may become one or the other, in correspondence with the faith and insight of the auditor.

So amid sunshine and shadow, rustling leaves and sighing waters, up gushed our talk like the babble of a fountain. The evanescent spray was Ellery's, and his, too, the lumps of golden thought that lay glimmering in the fountain's bed and brightened both our faces by the reflection. Could he have drawn out that virgin gold and stamped it with the mint mark that alone gives currency, the world might have had the profit, and he the fame. My mind was the richer merely by the knowledge that it was there. But the chief profit of those wild days to him and me, lay, not in any definite idea, not in any angular or rounded truth, which we dug out of the shapeless mass of problematical stuff, but in the freedom which we thereby won from all custom and conventionalism and fettering influences of man on man. We were so free to-day that it was impossible to be slaves again to-morrow. When we crossed the threshold of the house or trod the thronged pavements of a city, still the leaves of the trees that overhang the Assabeth were whispering to us, 'Be free! be free!' Therefore along that shady river-bank there are spots, marked with a heap of ashes and half-consumed brands, only less sacred in my remembrance than the hearth of a household fire.

And yet how sweet, as we floated homeward adown the golden river at sunset,—how sweet was it to return within the system of human society, not as to a dungeon and a chain, but as to a stately edifice, whence we could go forth at will into state-lir simplicity! How gently, too, did the sight of the Old Manse, best seen from the river, overshadowed with its willow and all environed about with the foliage of its orchard and avenue,—how gently did its gray, homely aspect rebuke the speculative extravagances of the day! It had grown sacred in connection with the artificial life against which we inveighed, it had been a home for many years in spite of all, it was my home too, and, with these thoughts, it seemed to me that all the artifice and conventionalism of life was but an impalpable thinness upon its surface, and that the depth below was none the worse for it. Once, as we turned our boat to the bank, there was a cloud, in the shape of an immensely gigantic figure of a hound, couched above the house, as if keeping guard over it. Gazing at this symbol, I prayed that the upper influences might long protect the institutions that had grown out of the heart of mankind.

If ever my readers should decide to give up civilized life, cities, houses, and whatever moral or material enormities in addition to these the perverted ingenuity of our race has contrived, let it be in the early autumn. Then Nature will love him better than at any other season, and will take him to her bosom with a more motherly tenderness. I could scarcely endure the roof of the old house above me in those first autumnal days. How early in the summer, too, the prophecy of autumn comes! Earlier in some years than in others, sometimes even in the first weeks of July. There is no other feeling like what is caused by this faint, doubtful, yet real perception—if it be not rather a foreboding—of the year's decay, so blessedly sweet and sad in the same breath.

Did I say that there was no feeling like it? Ah, but there is a half-acknowledged melancholy like to this when we stand in the perfected vigor of our life and feel that Time has now given us all his flowers, and that the next work of his never idle fingers must be to steal them one by one away.

I have forgotten whether the song of the cricket be not as early a token of autumn's approach as any other,—that song which may be called an audible stillness, for though very loud and heard afar, yet the mind does not take note of it as a sound, so completely is its individual existence merged among the accompanying characteristics of the season. Alas for the pleasant summer time! In August the grass is still verdant on the hills and in the valleys, the foliage of the trees is as dense as ever, and as green, the flowers gleam forth in richer abundance along the margin of the river, and by the stone walls, and deep among the woods, the days, too, are as fervid now as they were a month ago, and yet in every breath of wind and in every beam of sunshine we hear the whispered farewell and behold the parting smile of a dear friend. There is a coolness amid all the heat, a mildness in the blazing noon. Not a breeze can stir but it thrills us with the breath of autumn. A pensive glory is seen in the far golden gleams, among the shadows of the trees. The flowers—even the brightest of them, and they are the most gorgeous of the year—have this gentle sadness wedded to their pomp, and typify the character of the delicious time each within itself. The brilliant cardinal flower has never seemed gay to me.

Still later in the season Nature's tenderness waxes stronger. It is impossible not to be fond of our mother now, for she is so fond of us! At other periods she does not make this impression on me, or only at rare intervals, but in those genial days of autumn, when she has perfected her harvests and accomplished every needful thing that was given her to do, then she overflows with a blessed superfluity of love. She has leisure to caress her children now. It is good to be alive at such times. Thank Heaven for breath—yes, for mere breath—when it is made up of a heavenly breeze like this! It comes with a real kiss upon our cheeks, it would linger fondly around us if it might, but, since it must be gone, it embraces us with its whole kindly heart and passes onward to embrace likewise the next thing that it meets. A blessing is flung abroad and scattered far and wide over the earth, to be gathered up by all who choose. I recline upon the still unwithered grass and whisper to myself, ‘O perfect day! O beautiful world! O beneficent God!’ And it is the promise of a blessed eternity, for our Creator would never have made such lovely days and have given us the deep hearts to enjoy them, above and beyond all thought, unless we were meant to be immortal. This sunshine is the golden pledge thereof. It beams through the gates of paradise and shows us glumpses far inward.

By and by, in a little time, the outward world puts on a drear austerity. On some October morning there is a heavy hoarfrost on the grass and along the tops of the fences, and at sunrise the leaves fall from the trees of our avenue without a breath of wind, quietly descending by their own weight. All summer long they have murmured like the noise of waters, they have roared loudly while the branches were wrestling with the thunder gust, they have made music both glad and solemn, they have attuned my thoughts by their quiet sound as I paced to and fro beneath the arch of intermingling boughs. Now they can only rustle under my feet. Henceforth the gray parsonage begins to assume a larger importance, and draws to its fireside,—for the abomination of the air-tight stove is reserved till wintry weather,—draws closer and closer to its fireside the vagrant impulses that had gone wandering about through the summer.

When summer was dead and buried the Old Manse became as lonely as a hermitage. Not that ever—in my time at least—it had been thronged with company, but, at no rare intervals, we welcomed some friend out of the dusty glare and tumult of the world, and rejoiced to share with him the transparent obscurity that was floating over us. In one respect our precincts were like the Enchanted Ground through which the pilgrim travelled on his way to the Celestial City! The guests, each and all, felt a slumberous influence upon them, they fell asleep in chairs, or took a more deliberate siesta on the sofa, or were seen stretched among the shadows of the orchard, looking up dreamily through the boughs. They could not have paid a more acceptable compliment to my abode, nor to my own qualities as a host. I held it as a proof that they left their cares behind them as they passed between the stone gate-posts at the entrance of our avenue, and that the so powerful opiate was the abundance of peace and quiet within and all around us. Others could give them pleasure and amusement or instruction—these could be picked up anywhere, but it was for me to give them rest—rest in a life of trouble. What better could be done for those weary and world-worn spirits?—for him whose career of perpetual action was impeded and harassed by the rarest of his powers and the richest of his acquirements?—for another who had thrown his ardent heart from earliest youth into the strife of politics, and now, perchance, began to suspect that one lifetime is too brief for the accomplishment of any lofty aim?—for her on whose feminine nature had been imposed the heavy gift of intellectual power, such as a strong man might have staggered under, and with it the necessity to act upon the world?—in a word, not to multiply instances, what better could be done for anybody who came within our magic circle than to throw the spell of a tranquil spirit over him? And when it had wrought its full effect, then we dismissed him, with but misty reminiscences, as if he had been dreaming of us.

Were I to adopt a pet idea, as so many people do, and fondle it in my embraces to the exclusion of all others, it would be, that the great want which mankind labors under at this present period is sleep. The world should recline its vast head on the first convenient pillow and take an age-long nap. It has gone distracted through a morbid activity, and, while preternaturally wide-awake, is nevertheless tormented by visions that seem real to it now, but would assume their true aspect and character were all things once set right by an interval of sound repose This is the only method of getting rid of old delusions and avoiding new ones, of regenerating our race, so that it might in due time awake as an infant out of dewy slumber, of restoring to us the simple perception of what is right, and the single-hearted desire to achieve it, both of which have long been lost in consequence of this weary activity of brain and torpor or passion of the heart that now afflict the universe Stimulants, the only mode of treatment hitherto attempted, cannot quell the disease, they do but heighten the delirium

Let not the above paragraph ever be quoted against the author, for, though tinctured with its modicum of truth, it is the result and expression of what he knew, while he was writing, to be but a distorted survey of the state and prospects of mankind There were circumstances around me which made it difficult to view the world precisely as it exists, for, severe and sober as was the Old Manse, it was necessary to go but a little way beyond its threshold before meeting with stranger moral shapes of men than might have been encountered elsewhere in a circuit of a thousand miles

These hobgoblins of flesh and blood were attracted thither by the widespreading influence of a great original thinker, who had his earthly abode at the opposite extremity of our village His mind acted upon other minds of a certain constitution with wonderful magnetism, and drew many men upon long pilgrimages to speak with him face to face Young visionaries—to whom just so much of insight had been imparted as to make life all a labyrinth around them—came to seek the clew that should guide them out of their self-involved bewilderment Gray-headed theorists—whose systems, at first air, had finally imprisoned them in an iron frame-work—travelled painfully to his door, not to ask deliverance, but to invite the free spirit into their own thralldom People that had lighted on a new thought, or a thought that they fancied new, came to Emerson, as the finder of a glittering gem hastens to a lapidary, to ascertain its quality and value Uncertain, troubled, earnest wanderers through the midnight of the moral world beheld his intellectual fire as a beacon burning on a hill-top, and, climbing the difficult ascent, looked forth into the surrounding obscurity more hopefully than hitherto. The light revealed objects unseen before,—mountains, gleaming lakes, glimpses of a creation among the chaos, but also, as was unavoidable, it attracted bats and owls and the whole host of night birds, which flapped their dusky wings against the gazer's eyes, and sometimes were mistaken for fowls of angelic feather Such delusions always hover nigh whenever a beacon fire of truth is kindled

For myself, there had been epochs of my life when I, too, might have asked of this prophet the master word that should solve me the riddle of the universe, but now, being happy, I felt as if there were no question to be put, and therefore admired Emerson as a poet of deep beauty and austere tenderness, but sought nothing from him as a philosopher It was good, nevertheless, to meet him in the wood-paths, or sometimes in our avenue, with that pure intellectual gleam diffused about his presence like the garment of a shining one, and he so quiet, so simple, so without pretension, encountering each man alive as if expecting to receive more than he could impart And, in truth, the heart of many an ordinary man had, perchance, inscriptions which he could not read But it was impossible to dwell in his vicinity without inhaling more or less the mountain atmosphere of his lofty thought, which, in the brains of some people, wrought a singular giddiness,—new truth being as heady as new wine Never was a poor little country village infested with such a variety of queer, strangely-dressed, oddly-behaved mortals, most of whom took upon themselves to be important agents of the world's destiny, yet were simply bores of a very intense water Such, I imagine, is the invariable character of persons who crowd so closely about an original thinker as to draw in his unuttered breath and thus become imbued with a false originality This triteness of novelty is enough to make any man of common sense blaspheme at all ideas of less than a century's standing, and pray that the world may be petrified and rendered immovable in precisely the worst moral and physical state that it ever yet arrived at, rather than be benefited by such schemes of such philosophers

And now I begin to feel—and perhaps should have sooner felt—that we have talked enough of the Old Manse. Mine honored reader, it may be, will vilify the poor author as an egotist for babbling through so many pages about a mossgrown country parsonage, and his life within its walls and on the river and in the woods, and the influences that wrought upon him from all these sources. My conscience, however, does not reproach me with betraying anything too sacredly individual to be revealed by a human spirit to its brother or sister spirit. How narrow—how shallow and scanty too—is the stream of thought that has been flowing from my pen, compared with the broad tide of dim emotions, ideas, and associations which swell around me from that portion of my existence! How little have I told! and of that little, how almost nothing is even tinctured with any quality that makes it exclusively my own! Has the reader gone wandering, hand in hand with me, through the inner passages of my being? and have we groped together into all its chambers and examined their treasures or their rubbish? Not so. We have been standing on the greensward, but just within the cavern's mouth, where the common sunshine is free to penetrate, and where every footstep is therefore free to come. I have appealed to no sentiment or sensibilities save such as are diffused among us all. So far as I am a man of really individual attributes I veil my face, nor am I, nor have I ever been, one of those supremely hospitable people who serve up their own hearts, delicately fried, with brain sauce, as a tidbit for their beloved public.

Glancing back over what I have written, it seems but the scattered reminiscences of a single summer. In fairyland there is no measurement of time, and, in a spot so sheltered from the turmoil of life's ocean, three years hastened away with a noiseless flight, as the breezy sunshine chases the cloud shadows across the depths of a still valley. Now came hints, growing more and more distinct, that the owner of the old house was pining for his native air. Carpenters next appeared, making a tremendous racket among the out-buildings, strewing the green grass with pine shavings and chips of chestnut joists, and vexing the whole antiquity of the place with their discordant renovations. Soon, moreover, they divested our abode of the veil of woodbine which had crept over a large portion of its southern face. All the aged mosses were cleared unsparingly away, and there were horrible whispers about brushing up the external walls with a coat of paint—a purpose as little to my taste as might be that of rouging the venerable cheeks of one's grandmother. But the hand that renovates is always more sacrilegious than that which destroys. In fine, we gathered up our household goods, drank a farewell cup of tea in our pleasant little breakfast-room,—delicately fragrant tea, an unpurchasable luxury, one of the many angel gifts that had fallen like dew upon us,—and passed forth between the tall stone gateposts as uncertain as the wandering Arabs where our tent might next be pitched. Providence took me by the hand, and—an oddity of dispensation which, I trust, there is no irreverence in smiling at—has led me, as the newspapers announce while I am writing, from the Old Manse into a custom house. As a story-teller, I have often contrived strange vicissitudes for my imaginary personages, but none like this.

The treasure of intellectual good which I hoped to find in our secluded dwelling had never come to light. No profound treatise of ethics, no philosophic history, no novel even, that could stand unsupported on its edges. All that I had to show, as a man of letters, were these few tales and essays, which had blossomed out like flowers in the calm summer of my heart and mind. Save editing (an easy task) the journal of my friend of many years, the African Cruiser,<sup>1</sup> I had done nothing else. With these idle weeds and withering blossoms I have intermixed some that were produced long ago,—old, faded things, reminding me of flowers pressed between the leaves of a book,—and now offer the bouquet, such as it is, to any whom it may please. These fitful sketches, with so little of external life about them, yet claiming no profundity of purpose,—so reserved, even while they sometimes seem so frank,—often but half in earnest, and never, even when most so, expressing satisfactorily the thoughts which they profess to image,—such trifles, I truly feel, afford no solid basis for a literary reputation. Nevertheless, the public—if my limited number of readers, whom I venture to regard rather as a circle of friends, may be termed a public—will receive them the more kindly, as the last offering, the last collection, of this nature which it is my purpose ever to put forth. Unless I could do better, I have done enough in this kind. For myself the book will always retain one charm—as reminding me of the river, with its delightful solitudes, and of the avenue, the garden, and the orchard, and especially the dear Old Manse, with the little study on its western side, and the sunshine glimmering through the willow branches while I wrote.

Let the reader, if he will do me so much honor, imagine himself my guest, and that, having seen whatever may be worthy of notice within and about the Old Manse, he has finally been ushered into my study. There, after seating him in an antique elbow chair, an heirloom of the house, I take forth a roll of manuscript and entreat his attention to the following tales—an act of personal inhospitality, however, which I never was guilty of, nor ever will be, even to my worst enemy.

THE GRAY CHAMPION

THERE was once a time when New England groaned under the actual pressure of heavier wrongs than those threatened ones which brought on the Revolution. James II, the bigoted successor of Charles the Voluptuous, had annulled the charters of all the colonies, and sent a harsh and unprincipled soldier to take away our liberties and endanger our religion. The administration of Sir Edmund Andros lacked scarcely a single characteristic of tyranny: a Governor and Council, holding office from the King, and wholly independent of the country, laws made and taxes levied without concurrence of the people immediate or by their representatives, the rights of private citizens violated, and the titles of all landed property declared void, the voice of complaint stifled by restrictions on the press, and, finally, disaffection overawed by the first band of mercenary troops that ever marched on our free soil. For two years our ancestors were kept in sullen submission by that filial love which had invariably secured their allegiance to the mother country, whether its head chanced to be a Parliament, Protector, or Popish Monarch. Till these evil times, however, such allegiance had been merely nominal, and the colonists had ruled themselves, enjoying far more freedom than is even yet the privilege of the native subjects of Great Britain.

At length a rumor reached our shores that the Prince of Orange had ventured on an enterprise, the success of which would be the triumph of civil and religious rights and the salvation of New England. It was but a doubtful whisper, it might be false, or the attempt might fail, and, in either case, the man that stirred against King James would lose his head. Still the intelligence produced a marked effect. The people smiled mysteriously in the streets, and threw bold glances at their oppressors, while far and wide there was a subdued and silent agitation, as if the slightest signal would rouse the whole land from its sluggish despondency. Aware of their danger, the rulers resolved to avert it by an imposing display of strength, and perhaps to confirm their despotism by yet harsher measures. One afternoon in April, 1689, Sir Edmund Andros and his favorite councilors, being warm with wine, assembled the red-coats of the Governor's Guard, and made their appearance in the streets of Boston. The sun was near setting when the march commenced.

The roll of the drum at that unquiet crisis seemed to go through the streets, less as the martial music of the soldiers, than as a muster-call to the inhabitants themselves. A multitude, by various avenues, assembled in King Street, which was destined to be the scene, nearly a century afterwards, of another encounter between the troops of Britain, and a people struggling against her tyranny. Though more than sixty years had elapsed since the pilgrims came, this crowd of their descendants still showed the strong and sombre features of their character perhaps more strikingly in such a stern emergency than on happier occasions.

There were the sober garb, the general severity of mien, the gloomy but undismayed expression, the scriptural forms of speech, and the confidence in Heaven's blessing on a righteous cause, which would have marked a band of the original Puritans, when threatened by some peril of the wilderness. Indeed, it was not yet time for the old spirit to be extinct, since there were men in the street that day who had worshipped there beneath the trees, before a house was reared to the God for whom they had become exiles. Old soldiers of the Parliament were here, too, smiling grimly at the thought that their aged arms might strike another blow against the house of Stuart. Here, also, were the veterans of King Philip's war, who had burned villages and slaughtered young and old, with pious fierceness, while the godly souls throughout the land were helping them with prayer. Several ministers were scattered among the crowd, which, unlike all other mobs, regarded them with such reverence, as if there were sanctity in their very garments. These holy men exerted their influence to quiet the people, but not to disperse them. Meantime, the purpose of the Governor, in disturbing the peace of the town at a period when the slightest commotion might throw the country into a ferment, was almost the universal subject of inquiry, and variously explained.

'Satan will strike his master-stroke presently,' cried some, 'because he knoweth that his time is short. All our godly pastors are to be dragged to prison! We shall see them at a Smithfield fire in King Street!'

Hereupon the people of each parish gathered closer round their minister, who looked calmly upwards and assumed a more apostolic dignity, as well befitted a candidate for the highest honor of his profession, the crown of martyrdom. It was actually fancied, at that period, that New England might have a John Rogers of her own to take the place of that worthy in the Primer.

'The Pope of Rome has given orders for a new St Bartholomew!' cried others. 'We are to be massacred, man and male child!'

Neither was this rumor wholly discredited, although the wiser class believed the Governor's object somewhat less atrocious.
 His predecessor under the old charter,

Bradstreet, a venerable companion of the first settlers, was known to be in town.
 There were grounds for conjecturing, that Sir Edmund Andros intended at once to strike terror by a parade of military force, and to confound the opposite faction by possessing himself of their chief.

'Stand firm for the old charter Governor!' shouted the crowd, seizing upon the idea. 'The good old Governor Bradstreet!'

While this cry was at the loudest, the people were surprised by the well-known figure of Governor Bradstreet himself, a patriarch of nearly ninety, who appeared on the elevated steps of a door, and, with characteristic mildness, besought them to submit to the constituted authorities.

'My children,' concluded this venerable person, 'do nothing rashly. Cry not aloud, but pray for the welfare of New England, and expect patiently what the Lord will do in this matter!'

The event was soon to be decided. All this time, the roll of the drum had been approaching through Cornhill, louder and deeper, till with reverberations from house to house, and the regular tramp of martial footsteps, it burst into the street. A double rank of soldiers made their appearance, occupying the whole breadth of the passage, with shouldered matchlocks, and matches burning, so as to present a row of fires in the dusk. Their steady march was like the progress of a machine, that would roll irresistibly over everything in its way.
 Next, moving slowly, with a confused clatter of hoofs on the pavement, rode a party of mounted gentlemen, the central figure being Sir Edmund Andros, elderly, but erect and soldier-like. Those around him were his favorite councillors, and the bitterest foes of New England. At his right hand rode Edward Randolph, our archenemy, that 'blasted wretch,' as Cotton Mather calls him, who achieved the downfall of our ancient government, and was followed with a sensible curse, through life and to his grave. On the other side was Bullivant, scattering jests and mockery as he rode along. Dudley came behind, with a downcast look, dreading, as well he might,
 to meet the indignant gaze of the people, who beheld him, their only countryman by birth, among the oppressors of his native land. The captain of a frigate in the harbor, and two or three civil officers under the Crown, were also there. But the figure which most attracted the public eye, and stirred up the deepest feeling, was the Episcopal clergyman of King's Chapel, riding haughtily among the magistrates in his priestly vestments, the fitting representative of prelacy and persecution, the union of church and state, and all those abominations which had driven the Puritans to the wilderness. Another guard of soldiers, in double rank, brought up the rear.

The whole scene was a picture of the condition of New England, and its moral, the deformity of any government that does not grow out of the nature of things and the character of the people. On one side the religious multitude, with their sad visages and dark attire, and on the other, the group of despotic rulers, with the high churchman in the midst, and here and there a crucifix at their bosoms, all magnificently clad, flushed with wine, proud of unjust authority, and scoffing at the universal groan. And the mercenary soldiers, waiting but the word to deluge the street with blood, showed the only means by which obedience could be secured.

'Oh! Lord of Hosts,' cried a voice among the crowd, 'provide a Champion for thy people!'

This ejaculation was loudly uttered, and served as a herald's cry, to introduce a remarkable personage. The crowd had rolled back, and were now huddled together nearly at the extremity of the street, while the soldiers had advanced no more than a third of its length. The intervening space was empty—a paved solitude, between lofty edifices, which threw almost a twilight shadow over it. Suddenly, there was seen the figure of an ancient man, who seemed to have emerged from among the people, and was walking by himself along the centre of the street, to confront the armed band. He wore the old Puritan dress, a dark cloak and a steeple-crowned hat, in the fashion of at least fifty years before, with a heavy sword upon his thigh, but a staff in his hand to assist the tremulous gait of age.

When at some distance from the multitude, the old man turned slowly round, displaying a face of antique majesty, rendered doubly venerable by the hoary beard that descended on his breast. He made a gesture at once of encouragement and warning, then turned again, and resumed his way.

'Who is this gray patriarch?' asked the young men of their sires.

'Who is this venerable brother?' asked the old men among themselves.

But none could make reply. The fathers of the people, those of fourscore years and upwards, were disturbed, deeming it strange that they should forget one of such evident authority, whom they must have known in their early days, the associate of Winthrop, and all the old councillors, giving laws, and making prayers, and leading them against the savage. The elderly men ought to have remembered him, too, with locks as gray in their youth, as their own were now. And the young! How could he have passed so utterly from their memories—that hoary sire, the relic of long-departed times, whose awful benediction had surely been bestowed on their uncovered heads, in childhood?

'Whence did he come? What is his purpose? Who can this old man be?' whispered the wondering crowd.

Meanwhile, the venerable stranger, staff in hand, was pursuing his solitary walk along the centre of the street. As he drew near the advancing soldiers, and as the roll of their drum came full upon his ear, the old man raised himself to a loftier mien, while the decrepitude of age seemed to fall from his shoulders, leaving him in gray but unbroken dignity. Now, he marched onward with a warrior's step, keeping time to the military music. Thus the aged form advanced on one side, and the whole parade of soldiers and magistrates on the other, till, when scarcely twenty yards remained between, the old man grasped his staff by the middle, and held it before him like a leader's truncheon.

'Stand!' cried he.

The eye, the face, and attitude of command, the solemn, yet warlike peal of that voice, fit either to rule a host in the battlefield or be raised to God in prayer, were irresistible. At the old man's word and outstretched arm, the roll of the drum was hushed at once, and the advancing line stood still. A tremulous enthusiasm seized upon the multitude. That stately form, com-binning the leader and the saint, so gray, so dimly seen, in such an ancient garb, could only belong to some old champion of the righteous cause, whom the oppressor's drum had summoned from his grave. They raised a shout of awe and exultation, and looked for the deliverance of New England.

The Governor, and the gentlemen of his party, perceiving themselves brought to an unexpected stand, rode hastily forward, as if they would have pressed their snorting and affrighted horses right against the hoary apparition. He, however, blenched not a step, but glancing his severe eye round the group, which half encompassed him, at last bent it sternly on Sir Edmund Andros. One would have thought that the dark old man was chief ruler there, and that the Governor and Council, with soldiers at their back, representing the whole power and authority of the Crown, had no alternative but obedience.

'What does this old fellow here?' cried Edward Randolph, fiercely. 'On, Sir Edmund! Bid the soldiers forward, and give the dotard the same choice that you give all his countrymen—to stand aside or be trampled on!'

'Nay, nay, let us show respect to the good grandsire,' said Bullivant, laughing. 'See you not, he is some old round-headed dignitary, who hath lain asleep these thirty years, and knows nothing of the change of times? Doubtless, he thinks to put us down with a proclamation in Old Noll's name!'

'Are you mad, old man?' demanded Sir Edmund Andros, in loud and harsh tones. 'How dare you stay the march of King James's Governor?'

'I have stayed the march of a King himself, ere now,' replied the gray figure, with stern composure. 'I am here, Sir Governor, because the cry of an oppressed people hath disturbed me in my secret place, and beseeching this favor earnestly of the Lord, it was vouchsafed me to appear once again on earth, in the good old cause of his saints. And what speak ye of James? There is no longer a Popish tyrant on the throne of England, and by to-morrow noon, his name shall be a byword in this very street, where ye would make it a word of terror. Back, thou that wast a Governor, back! With this night thy power is ended—to-morrow, the prison!—back, lest I foretell the scaffold!'

The people had been drawing nearer and nearer, and drinking in the words of their champion, who spoke in accents long disused, like one unaccustomed to converse, except with the dead of many years ago. But his voice stirred their souls. They confronted the soldiers, not wholly without arms, and ready to convert the very stones of the street into deadly weapons. Sir Edmund Andros looked at the old man, then he cast his hard and cruel eye over the multitude, and beheld them burning with that lurid wrath, so difficult to kindle or to quench, and again he fixed his gaze on the aged form, which stood obscurely in an open space, where neither friend nor foe had thrust himself. What were his thoughts, he uttered no word which might discover. But whether the oppressor were overawed by the Gray Champion's look, or perceived his peril in the threatening attitude of the people, it is certain that he gave back, and ordered his soldiers to commence a slow and guarded retreat. Before another sunset, the Governor, and all that rode so proudly with him, were prisoners, and long ere it was known that James had abdicated, King William was proclaimed throughout New England.

But where was the Gray Champion? Some reported that, when the troops had gone from King Street, and the people were thronging tumultuously in their rear, Bradstreet, the aged Governor, was seen to embrace a form more aged than his own. Others soberly affirmed, that while they marvelled at the venerable grandeur of his aspect, the old man had faded from their eyes, melting slowly into the hues of twilight, till, where he stood, there was an empty space. But all agreed that the hoary shape was gone. The men of that generation watched for his reappearance, in sunshine and in twilight, but never saw him more, nor knew when his funeral passed, nor where his gravestone was.

And who was the Gray Champion? Perhaps his name might be found in the records of that stern Court of Justice, which passed a sentence, too mighty for the age, but glorious in all after-times, for its humbling lesson to the monarch and its high example to the subject. I have heard, that whenever the descendants of the Puritans are to show the spirit of their sires, the old man appears again When eighty years had passed, he walked once more in King Street Five years later, in the twilight of an April morning, he stood on the green, beside the meeting-house, at Lexington, where now the obelisk of granite, with a slab of slate inlaid, commemorates the first fallen of the Revolution And when our fathers were toiling at the breastwork on Bunker's Hill, all through that night the old warrior walked his rounds Long, long may it be, ere he comes again! His hour is one of darkness, and adversity, and peril But should domestic tyranny oppress us, or the invader's step pollute our soil, still may the Gray Champion come, for he is the type of New England's hereditary spirit, and his shadowy march, on the eve of danger, must ever be the pledge, that New England's sons will vindicate their ancestry

FROM THE SCARLET LETTER

OLD Roger Chillingworth, throughout life, had been calm in temperament, kindly, though not of warm affections, but ever, and in all his relations with the world, a pure and upright man He had begun an investigation, as he imagined, with the severe and equal integrity of a judge, desirous only of truth, even as if the question involved no more than the air-drawn lines and figures of a geometrical problem, instead of human passions, and wrongs inflicted on himself But, as he proceeded, a terrible fascination, a kind of fierce, though still calm, necessity seized the old man within its gripe, and never set him free again until he had done all its bidding He now dug into the poor clergyman's heart, like a miner searching for gold, or, rather, like a sexton delving into a grave, possibly in quest of a jewel that had been buried on the dead man's bosom, but likely to find nothing save mortality and corruption Alas for his own soul, if these were what he sought!

Sometimes a light glimmered out of the physician's eyes, burning blue and ominous, like the reflection of a furnace, or, let us say, like one of those gleams of ghastly fire that darted from Bunyan's awful doorway in the hill-side, and quivered on the pilgrim's face The soil where this dark miner was working had perchance shown indications that encouraged him

"This man," said he, at one such moment, to himself, 'pure as they deem him,—all spiritual as he seems,—hath inherited a strong animal nature from his father or his mother Let us dig a little further in the direction of this vein!'

Then, after long search into the minister's dim interior, and turning over many precious materials, in the shape of high aspirations for the welfare of his race, warm love of souls, pure sentiments, natural piety, strengthened by thought and study, and illuminated by revelation,—all of which invaluable gold was perhaps no better than rubbish to the seeker,—he would turn back discouraged, and begin his quest towards another point He groped along as stealthily, with as cautious a tread, and as wary an outlook, as a thief entering a chamber where a man lies only half asleep,—or, it may be, broad awake,—with purpose to steal the very treasure which this man guards as the apple of his eye In spite of his premeditated carefulness, the floor would now and then creak, his garments would rustle, the shadow of his presence, in a forbidden proximity, would be thrown across his victim In other words, Mr Dimmesdale, whose sensibility of nerve often produced the effect of spiritual intuition, would become vaguely aware that something inimical to his peace had thrust itself into relation with him But old Roger Chillingworth, too, had perceptions that were almost intuitive, and when the minister threw his startled eyes towards him, there the physician sat, his kind, watchful, sympathizing, but never intrusive friend

Yet Mr Dimmesdale would perhaps have seen this individual's character more perfectly, if a certain morbidness, to which sick hearts are liable, had not rendered him suspicious of all mankind Trusting no man as his friend, he could not recognize his enemy when the latter actually appeared He therefore still kept up a familiar intercourse with him, daily receiving the old physician in his study, or visiting the laboratory, and, for recreation's sake, watching the processes by which weeds were converted into drugs of potency

One day, leaning his forehead on his hand, and his elbow on the sill of the open window, that looked towards the graveyard, he talked with Roger Chillingworth, while the old man was examining a bundle of unsightly plants

'Where,' asked he, with a look askance at them,—for it was the clergyman's peculiarity that he seldom, nowadays, looked straightforth at any object, whether human or inanimate,—'where, my kind doctor, did you gather those herbs, with such a dark, flabby leaf?'

'Even in the graveyard here at hand,' answered the physician continuing his employment 'They are new to me I found them growing on a grave, which bore no tombstone, nor other memorial of the dead man, save these ugly weeds, that have taken upon themselves to keep him in remembrance They grew out of his heart, and typify, it may be, some hideous secret that was buried with him, and which he had done better to confess during his lifetime'

'Perchance,' said Mr Dimmesdale, 'he earnestly desired it, but could not'

'And wherefore?' rejoined the physician 'Wherefore not, since all the powers of nature call so earnestly for the confession of sin, that these black weeds have sprung up out of a buried heart, to make manifest an unspoken crime?'

'That, good Sir, is but a fantasy of yours,' replied the minister 'There can be, if I forebode aright, no power, short of the Divine mercy, to disclose, whether by uttered words, or by type or emblem, the secrets that may be buried with a human heart The heart, making itself guilty of such secrets, must perforce hold them, until the day when all hidden things shall be revealed Nor have I so read or interpreted Holy Writ, as to understand that the disclosure of human thoughts and deeds, then to be made, is intended as a part of the retribution That, surely, were a shallow view of it No, these revelations, unless I greatly err, are meant merely to promote the intellectual satisfaction of all intelligent beings, who will stand waiting, on that day, to see the dark problem of this life made plain A knowledge of men's hearts will be needful to the completest solution of that problem And I conceive, moreover, that the hearts holding such miserable secrets as you speak of will yield them up, at that last day, not with reluctance, but with a joy unutterable'

'Then why not reveal them here?' asked Roger Chillingworth, glancing quietly aside at the minister 'Why should not the guilty ones sooner avail themselves of this unutterable solace?'

'They mostly do,' said the clergyman, griping hard at his breast as if afflicted with an importunate throb of pain 'Many, many a poor soul hath given its confidence to me, not only on the death-bed, but while strong in life, and fair in reputation And ever, after such an outpouring, oh, what a relief have I witnessed in those sinful brethren! even as in one who at last draws free air, after long stifling with his own polluted breath How can it be otherwise? Why should a wretched man, guilty, we will say, of murder, prefer to keep the dead corpse buried in his own heart, rather than fling it forth at once, and let the universe take care of it!'

'Yet some men bury their secrets thus,' observed the calm physician

'True, there are such men,' answered

Mr Dimmesdale 'But, not to suggest more obvious reasons, it may be that they are kept silent by the very constitution of their nature Or,—can we not suppose it?—guilty as they may be, retaining, nevertheless, a zeal for God's glory and man's welfare, they shrink from displaying themselves black and filthy in the view of men, because, thenceforward, no good can be achieved by them, no evil of the past be redeemed by better service So, to their own unutterable torment, they go about among their fellow-creatures, looking pure as new-fallen snow while their hearts are all speckled and spotted with iniquity of which they cannot rid themselves'

'These men deceive themselves,' said Roger Chillingworth, with somewhat more emphasis than usual, and making a slight gesture with his forefinger 'They fear to take up the shame that rightfully belongs to them Their love for man, their zeal for God's service,—these holy impulses may or may not coexist in their hearts with the evil inmates to which their guilt has unbarred the door, and which must needs propagate a hellish breed within them. But, if they seek to glorify God, let them not lift heavenward their unclean hands! If they would serve their fellowmen, let them do it by making manifest the power and reality of conscience, in constraining them to penitential self-abasement! Wouldst thou have me to believe, O wise and pious friend, that a false show can be better—can be more for God's glory, or man's welfare—than God's own truth? Trust me, such men deceive themselves!"

"It may be so," said the young clergyman, indifferently, as waiving a discussion that he considered irrelevant or unreasonable. He had a ready faculty, indeed, of escaping from any topic that agitated his too sensitive and nervous temperament. "But, now, I would ask of my well-skilled physician, whether, in good sooth, he deems me to have profited by his kindly care of this weak frame of mine?"

Before Roger Chillingworth could answer, they heard the clear, wild laughter of a young child's voice, proceeding from the adjacent burial-ground. Looking instinctively from the open window,—for it was summer-time,—the minister beheld Hester Prynne and little Pearl passing along the footpath that traversed the enclosure. Pearl looked as beautiful as the day, but was in one of those moods of perverse merriment which, whenever they occurred, seemed to remove her entirely out of the sphere of sympathy or human contact. She now skipped irreverently from one grave to another, until, coming to the broad, flat, armorial tombstone of a departed worthy,—perhaps of Isaac Johnson himself,—she began to dance upon it. In reply to her mother's command and entreaty that she would behave more decorously, little Pearl paused to gather the prickly burrs from a tall burdock which grew beside the tomb. Taking a handful of these, she arranged them along the lines of the scarlet letter that decorated the maternal bosom, to which the burrs, as their nature was, tenaciously adhered. Hester did not pluck them off.

Roger Chillingworth had by this time approached the window, and smiled grimly down

"There is no law, nor reverence for authority, no regard for human ordinances or opinions, right or wrong, mixed up with that child's composition," remarked he, as much to himself as to his companion. "I saw her, the other day, bespatter the Governor himself with water, at the cattle-trough in Spring Lane. What, in Heaven's name, is she? Is the imp altogether evil? Hath she affections? Hath she any discoverable principle of being?"

"None,—save the freedom of a broken law," answered Mr. Dimmesdale, in a quiet way, as if he had been discussing the point within himself. "Whether capable of good, I know not."

The child probably overheard their voices, for, looking up to the window, with a bright, but naughty smile of mirth and intelligence, she threw one of the prickly burrs at the Reverend Mr. Dimmesdale. The sensitive clergyman shrank, with nervous dread, from the light missile. Detecting his emotion, Pearl clapped her little hands in the most extravagant ecstasy. Hester Prynne, likewise, had involuntarily looked up, and all these four persons, old and young, regarded one another in silence, till the child laughed aloud, and shouted,— "Come away, mother! Come away, or yonder old Black Man will catch you! He hath got hold of the minister already. Come away, mother, or he will catch you! But he cannot catch little Pearl!"

So she drew her mother away, skipping, dancing, and frisking fantastically, among the hillocks of the dead people, like a creature that had nothing in common with a bygone and buried generation, nor owned herself akin to it. It was as if she had been made afresh, out of new elements, and must perforce be permitted to live her own life, and be a law unto herself, without her eccentricities being reckoned to her for a crime.

"There goes a woman," resumed Roger Chillingworth, after a pause, "who, be her demerits what they may, hath none of that mystery of hidden sinfulness which you deem so grievous to be borne. Is Hester Prynne the less miserable, thank you, for that scarlet letter on her breast?"

"I do verily believe it," answered the clergyman. "Nevertheless I cannot answer for her. There was a look of pain in her face, which I would gladly have been spared the sight of. But still, methinks, it must needs be better for the sufferer to be free to show his pain, as this poor woman Hester is, than to cover it all up in his heart'

There was another pause, and the physician began anew to examine and arrange the plants which he had gathered

'You inquired of me, a little time ago,' said he, at length, 'my judgment as touching your health'

'I did,' answered the clergyman, 'and would gladly learn it. Speak frankly, I pray you, be it for life or death'

'Freely, then, and plainly,' said the physician, still busy with his plants, but keeping a wary eye on Mr Dimmesdale, 'the disorder is a strange one, not so much in itself, nor as outwardly manifested,—in so far, at least, as the symptoms have been laid open to my observation. Looking daily at you, my good Sir, and watching the tokens of your aspect, now for months gone by, I should deem you a man sore sick, it may be, yet not so sick but that an instructed and watchful physician might well hope to cure you. But—I know not what to say—the disease is what I seem to know, yet know it not'

'You speak in riddles, learned Sir,' said the pale minister, glancing aside out of the window

'Then to speak more plainly,' continued the physician, 'and I crave pardon, Sir,—should it seem to require pardon,—for this needful plainness of my speech. Let me ask,—as your friend,—as one having charge, under Providence, of your life and physical well-being,—hath all the operation of this disorder been fairly laid open and recounted to me?'

'How can you question it?' asked the minister. 'Surely, it were child's play to call in a physician, and then hide the sore!'

'You would tell me, then, that I know all?' said Roger Chillingworth, deliberately, and fixing an eye, bright with intense and concentrated intelligence, on the minister's face. 'Be it so! But, again! He to whom only the outward and physical evil is laid open, knoweth, oftentimes, but half the evil which he is called upon to cure. A bodily disease, which we look upon as whole and entire within itself, may, after all, be but a symptom of some ailment in the spiritual part. Your pardon, once again, good Sir, if my speech give the shadow of offence. You, Sir, of all men whom I have known, are he whose body is the closest conjoined, and imbued, and identified, so to speak, with the spirit whereof it is the instrument'

'Then I need ask no further,' said the clergyman, somewhat hastily rising from his chair. 'You deal not, I take it, in medicine for the soul!'

'Thus, a sickness,' continued Roger Chillingworth, going on, in an unaltered tone, without heeding the interruption,—but standing up, and confronting the emaciated and white-cheeked minister, with his low, dark, and misshapen figure,—'a sickness, a sore place, if we may so call it, in your spirit, hath immediately its appropriate manifestation in your bodily frame. Would you, therefore, that your physician heal the bodily evil? How may this be, unless you first lay open to him the wound or trouble in your soul?'

'No!—not to thee!—not to an earthly physician!' cried Mr Dimmesdale, passionately, and turning his eyes, full and bright, and with a kind of fierceness, on old Roger Chillingworth. 'Not to thee! But, if it be the soul's disease, then do I commit myself to the one Physician of the soul! He, if it stand with his good pleasure, can cure, or he can kill! Let him do with me as, in his justice and wisdom, he shall see good. But who art thou, that meddlest in this matter?—that dares thrust himself between the sufferer and his God?'

With a frantic gesture he rushed out of the room

'It is as well to have made this step,' said Roger Chillingworth to himself, looking after the minister with a grave smile. 'There is nothing lost. We shall be friends again anon. But see, now, how passion takes hold upon this man, and hurrieth him out of himself! As with one passion, so with another! He hath done a wild thing ere now, this pious Master Dimmesdale, in the hot passion of his heart!'

It proved not difficult to reestablish the intimacy of the two companions, on the same footing and in the same degree as heretofore. The young clergyman, after a few hours of privacy, was sensible that the disorder of his nerves had hurried him into an unseemly outbreak of temper, which there had been nothing in the physician's words to excuse or palliate. He marvelled, indeed, at the violence with which he had thrust back the kind old man, when merely proffering the advice which it was his duty to bestow, and which the minister himself had expressly sought. With these remorseful feelings, he lost no time in making the amplest apologies, and besought his friend still to continue the care, which, if not successful in restoring him to health, had, in all probability, been the means of prolonging his feeble existence to that hour. Roger Chillingworth readily assented, and went on with his medical supervision of the minister, doing his best for him, in all good faith, but always quitting the patient's apartment, at the close of a professional interview, with a mysterious and puzzled smile upon his lips. This expression was invisible in Mr Dimmesdale's presence, but grew strongly evident as the physician crossed the threshold.

'A rare case!' he muttered. 'I must needs look deeper into it. A strange sympathy betwixt soul and body! Were it only for the art's sake, I must search this matter to the bottom!'

It came to pass, not long after the scene above recorded, that the Reverend Mr Dimmesdale, at noonday, and entirely unawares, fell into a deep, deep slumber, sitting in his chair, with a large black-letter volume open before him on the table. It must have been a work of vast ability in the somniferous school of literature. The profound depth of the minister's repose was the more remarkable, inasmuch as he was one of those persons whose sleep, ordinarily, is as light, as fitful, and as easily scared away, as a small bird hopping on a twig. To such an unwonted remoteness, however, had his spirit now withdrawn into itself, that he stirred not in his chair when old Roger Chillingworth, without any extraordinary precaution, came into the room. The physician advanced directly in front of his patient, laid his hand upon his bosom, and thrust aside the vestment that, hitherto, had always covered it even from the professional eye.

Then, indeed, Mr Dimmesdale shuddered, and slightly stirred.

After a brief pause, the physician turned away.

But with what a wild look of wonder, joy, and horror! With what a ghastly rapture, as it were, too mighty to be expressed only by the eye and features, and therefore bursting forth through the whole ugliness of his figure, and making itself even riotously manifest by the extravagant gestures with which he threw up his arms towards the ceiling, and stamped his foot upon the floor! Had a man seen old Roger Chillingworth, at that moment of his ecstasy, he would have had no need to ask how Satan comports himself when a precious human soul is lost to heaven, and won into his kingdom.

But what distinguished the physician's ecstasy from Satan's was the trait of wonder in it!

ETHAN BRAND

BARTRAM the lime-burner, a rough, heavy-looking man, begrimed with charcoal, sat watching his kiln, at nightfall, while his little son played at building houses with the scattered fragments of marble, when, on the hill-side below them, they heard a roar of laughter, not mirthful, but slow, and even solemn, like a wind shaking the boughs of the forest.

'Father, what is that?' asked the little boy, leaving his play, and pressing betwixt his father's knees.

'Oh, some drunken man, I suppose,' answered the lime-burner, 'some merry fellow from the bar-room in the village, who dared not laugh loud enough within doors lest he should blow the roof of the house off. So here he is, shaking his jolly sides at the foot of Graylock.'

'But, father,' said the child, more sensitive than the obtuse, middle-aged clown, 'he does not laugh like a man that is glad. So the noise frightens me!'

'Don't be a fool, child!' cried his father, gruffly. 'You will never make a man, I do believe, there is too much of your mother in you. I have known the rustling of a leaf startle you. Hark! Here comes the merry fellow now. You shall see that there is no harm in him.'

Bartram and his little son, while they were talking thus, sat watching the same lime-kiln that had been the scene of Ethan Brand's solitary and meditative life, before he began his search for the Unpardonable Sin. Many years, as we have seen, had now elapsed, since that portentous night when the IDEA was first developed. The kiln, however, on the mountain-side, stood unimpaired, and was in nothing changed since he had thrown his dark thoughts into the intense glow of its furnace, and melted them, as it were, into the one thought that took possession of his life. It was a rude, round, tower-like structure about twenty feet high, heavily built of rough stones, and with a hillock of earth heaped about the larger part of its circumference, so that the blocks and fragments of marble might be drawn by cart-loads, and thrown in at the top. There was an opening at the bottom of the tower, like an oven-mouth, but large enough to admit a man in a stooping posture, and provided with a massive iron door. With the smoke and jets of flame issuing from the chinks and crevices of this door, which seemed to give admittance into the hill-side, it resembled nothing so much as the private entrance to the infernal regions, which the shepherds of the Delectable Mountains were accustomed to show to pilgrims.

There are many such lime-kilns in that tract of country, for the purpose of burning the white marble which composes a large part of the substance of the hills. Some of them, built years ago, and long deserted, with weeds growing in the vacant round of the interior, which is open to the sky, and grass and wildflowers rooting themselves into the chinks of the stones, look already like relics of antiquity, and may yet be over-spread with the lichens of centuries to come. Others, where the lime-burner still feeds his daily and night-long fire, afford points of interest to the wanderer among the hills, who seats himself on a log of wood or a fragment of marble, to hold a chat with the solitary man. It is a lonesome, and, when the character is inclined to thought, may be an intensely thoughtful occupation, as it proved in the case of Ethan Brand, who had mused to such strange purpose, in days gone by, while the fire in this very kiln was burning.

The man who now watched the fire was of a different order, and troubled himself with no thoughts save the very few that were requisite to his business. At frequent intervals, he flung back the clashing weight of the iron door, and, turning his face from the insufferable glare, thrust in huge logs of oak, or stirred the immense brands with a long pole. Within the furnace were seen the curling and riotous flames, and the burning marble, almost molten with the intensity of heat, while without, the reflection of the fire quivered on the dark intricacy of the surrounding forest, and showed in the foreground a bright and ruddy little picture of the hut, the spring beside its door, the athletic and coal-begrimed figure of the lime-burner, and the half-frightened child, shrinking into the protection of his father's shadow. And when again the iron door was closed, then re-appeared the tender light of the half-full moon, which vainly strove to trace out the indistinct shapes of the neighboring mountains, and, in the upper sky, there was a fitting congregation of clouds, still faintly tinged with the rosy sunset, though thus far down into the valley the sunshine had vanished long and long ago.

The little boy now crept still closer to his father, as footsteps were heard ascending the hill-side, and a human form thrust aside the bushes that clustered beneath the trees.

'Halloo! who is it?' cried the lime-burner, vexed at his son's timidity, yet half infected by it. 'Come forward, and show yourself, like a man, or I'll fling this chunk of marble at your head!'

'You offer me a rough welcome,' said a gloomy voice, as the unknown man drew nigh. 'Yet I neither claim nor desire a kinder one, even at my own fireside.'

To obtain a distincter view, Bartram threw open the iron door of the kiln, whence immediately issued a gush of fierce light, that smote full upon the stranger's face and figure. To a careless eye there appeared nothing very remarkable in his aspect, which was that of a man in a coarse, brown, country-made suit of clothes, tall and thin, with the staff and heavy shoes of a wayfarer. As he advanced, he fixed his eyes—which were very bright—intently upon the brightness of the furnace, as if he beheld, or expected to behold, some object worthy of note within it.

'Good evening, stranger,' said the lime-burner, 'whence come you, so late in the day?'

'I come from my search,' answered the wayfarer, 'for, at last, it is finished'

'Drunk!—or crazy!' muttered Bartram to himself 'I shall have trouble with the fellow The sooner I drive him away, the better'

The little boy, all in a tremble, whispered to his father, and begged him to shut the door of the kiln, so that there might not be so much light, for that there was something in the man's face which he was afraid to look at, yet could not look away from And, indeed, even the lime-burner's dull and torpid sense began to be impressed by an indescribable something in that thin, rugged, thoughtful visage, with the grizzled hair hanging wildly about it, and those deeply sunken eyes, which gleamed like fires within the entrance of a mysterious cavern. But, as he closed the door, the stranger turned towards him, and spoke in a quiet, familiar way, that made Bartram feel as if he were a sane and sensible man, after all

'Your task draws to an end, I see,' said he 'This marble has already been burning three days A few hours more will convert the stone to lime'

'Why, who are you?' exclaimed the lime-burner 'You seem as well acquainted with my business as I am myself'

'And well I may be,' said the stranger, 'for I followed the same craft many a long year, and here, too, on this very spot But you are a new-comer in these parts Did you never hear of Ethan Brand?'

'The man that went in search of the Unpardonable Sin?' asked Bartram, with a laugh

'The same,' answered the stranger 'He has found what he sought, and therefore he comes back again'

'What! then you are Ethan Brand himself?' cried the lime-burner, in amazement. 'I am a new-comer here, as you say, and they call it eighteen years since you left the foot of Graylock But, I can tell you, the good folks still talk about Ethan Brand, in the village yonder, and what a strange errand took him away from his lime-kiln. Well, and so you have found the Unpardonable Sin?'

'Even so!' said the stranger, calmly

'If the question is a fair one,' proceeded Bartram, 'where might it be?'

Ethan Brand laid his finger on his own heart

'Here!' replied he

And then, without mirth in his countenance, but as if moved by an involuntary recognition of the infinite absurdity of seeking throughout the world for what was the closest of all things to himself, and looking into every heart, save his own, for what was hidden in no other breast, he broke into a laugh of scorn It was the same slow, heavy laugh, that had almost appalled the lime-burner when it heralded the wayfarer's approach

The solitary mountain-side was made dismal by it Laughter, when out of place, mistimed, or bursting forth from a disordered state of feeling, may be the most terrible modulation of the human voice The laughter of one asleep, even if it be a little child,—the madman's laugh,—the wild, screaming laugh of a born idiot,—are sounds that we sometimes tremble to hear, and would always willingly forget Poets have imagined no utterance of fiends or hobgoblins so fearfully appropriate as a laugh And even the obtuse lime-burner felt his nerves shaken, as this strange man looked inward at his own heart, and burst into laughter that rolled away into the night, and was indistinctly reverberated among the hills

'Joe,' said he to his little son, 'scamper down to the tavern in the village, and tell the jolly fellows there that Ethan Brand has come back, and that he has found the Unpardonable Sin!'

The boy darted away on his errand, to which Ethan Brand made no objection, nor seemed hardly to notice it He sat on a log of wood, looking steadfastly at the iron door of the kiln When the child was out of sight, and his swift and light footsteps ceased to be heard treading first on the fallen leaves and then on the rocky mountain-path, the lime-burner began to regret his departure. He felt that the little fellow's presence had been a barrier between his guest and himself, and that he must now deal, heart to heart, with a man who, on his own confession, had committed the one only crime for which Heaven could afford no mercy. That crime, in its indistinct blackness, seemed to overshadow him The lime-burner's own sins rose up within him, and made his memory riotous with a throng of evil shapes that asserted their kindred with the Master Sin, whatever it might be, which it was within the scope of man's corrupted nature to conceive and cherish. They were all of one family, they went to and fro between his breast and Ethan Brand's, and carried dark greetings from one to the other.

Then Bartram remembered the stories which had grown traditionary in reference to this strange man, who had come upon him like a shadow of the night, and was making himself at home in his old place, after so long absence that the dead people, dead and buried for years, would have had more right to be at home, in any familiar spot, than he. Ethan Brand, it was said, had conversed with Satan himself in the lurid blaze of this very kiln. The legend had been matter of mirth heretofore, but looked grisly now. According to this tale, before Ethan Brand departed on his search, he had been accustomed to evoke a fiend from the hot furnace of the lime-kiln, night after night, in order to confer with him about the Unpardonable Sin, the man and the fiend each laboring to frame the image of some mode of guilt which could neither be atoned for nor forgiven. And, with the first gleam of light upon the mountain-top, the fiend crept in at the iron door, there to abide the intensest element of fire, until again summoned forth to share in the dreadful task of extending man's possible guilt beyond the scope of Heaven's else infinite mercy.

While the lime-burner was struggling with the horror of these thoughts, Ethan Brand rose from the log, and flung open the door of the kiln. The action was in such accordance with the idea in Bartram's mind, that he almost expected to see the Evil One issue forth, red-hot, from the raging furnace.

"Hold! hold!" cried he, with a tremulous attempt to laugh, for he was ashamed of his fears, although they overmastered him. "Don't, for mercy's sake, bring out your Devil now!"

"Man!" sternly replied Ethan Brand, "what need have I of the Devil? I have left him behind me, on my track. It is with such half-way sinners as you that he busies himself. Fear not, because I open the door. I do but act by old custom, and am going to trim your fire, like a lime-burner, as I was once."

He stirred the vast coals, thrust in more wood, and bent forward to gaze into the hollow prison-house of the fire, regardless of the fierce glow that reddened upon his face. The lime-burner sat watching him, and half suspected this strange guest of a purpose, if not to evoke a fiend, at least to plunge bodily into the flames, and thus vanish from the sight of man. Ethan Brand, however, drew quietly back, and closed the door of the kiln.

"I have looked," said he, "into many a human heart that was seven times hotter with sinful passions than yonder furnace is with fire. But I found not there what I sought. No, not the Unpardonable Sin!"

"What is the Unpardonable Sin?" asked the lime-burner, and then he shrank farther from his companion, trembling lest his question should be answered.

"It is a sin that grew within my own breast," replied Ethan Brand, standing erect, with a pride that distinguishes all enthusiasts of his stamp. "A sin that grew nowhere else! The sin of an intellect that triumphed over the sense of brotherhood with man and reverence for God, and sacrificed everything to its own mighty claims! The only sin that deserves a recompense of immortal agony! Freely, were it to do again, would I incur the guilt. Unshrinkingly I accept the retribution!"

"The man's head is turned," muttered the lime-burner to himself. "He may be a sinner like the rest of us,—nothing more likely,—but, I'll be sworn, he is a madman too."

Nevertheless, he felt uncomfortable at his situation, alone with Ethan Brand on the wild mountain-side, and was right glad to hear the rough murmur of tongues, and the footsteps of what seemed a pretty numerous party, stumbling over the stones and rustling through the underbrush. Soon appeared the whole lazy regiment that was wont to infest the village tavern, comprehending three or four individuals who had drunk flip beside the bar-room fire through all the winters, and smoked their pipes beneath the stoop through all the summers, since Ethan Brand's departure. Laughing boisterously, and mingling all their voices together in unceremonious talk, they now burst into the moonshine and narrow streaks of firelight that illuminated the open space before the lime-kiln. Bartram set the door ajar again, flooding the spot with light, that the whole company might get a fair view of Ethan Brand, and he of them.

There, among other old acquaintances, was a once ubiquitous man, now almost extinct, but whom we were formerly sure to encounter at the hotel of every thriving village throughout the country. It was the stage-agent. The present specimen of the genus was a wilted and smoke-dried man, wrinkled and red-nosed, in a smartly cut, brown, bobtailed coat, with brass buttons, who, for a length of time unknown, had kept his desk and corner in the bar-room, and was still puffing what seemed to be the same cigar that he had lighted twenty years before. He had great fame as a dry joker, though, perhaps, less on account of any intrinsic humor than from a certain flavor of brandy-toddy and tobacco-smoke, which impregnated all his ideas and expressions, as well as his person. Another well-remembered though strangely-altered face was that of Lawyer Giles, as people still called him in courtesy, an elderly ragamuffin, in his soiled shirt-sleeves and tow-cloth trousers. This poor fellow had been an attorney, in what he called his better days, a sharp practitioner, and in great vogue among the village litigants, but flip, and sling, and toddy, and cocktails, imbibed at all hours, morning, noon, and night, had caused him to slide from intellectual to various kinds and degrees of bodily labor, till at last, to adopt his own phrase, he slid into a soap-vat. In other words, Giles was now a soap-boiler, in a small way. He had come to be but the fragment of a human being, a part of one foot having been chopped off by an axe, and an entire hand torn away by the devilish grip of a steam-engine. Yet, though the corporeal hand was gone, a spiritual member remained, for, stretching forth the stump, Giles steadfastly averred that he felt an invisible thumb and fingers with as vivid a sensation as before the real ones were amputated. A maimed and miserable wretch he was, but one, nevertheless, whom the world could not trample on, and had no right to scorn, either in this or any previous stage of his misfortunes, since he had still kept up the courage and spirit of a man, asked nothing in charity, and with his one hand—and that the left one—fought a stern battle against want and hostile circumstances.

Among the throng, too, came another personage, who, with certain points of similarity to Lawyer Giles, had many more of difference. It was the village doctor, a man of some fifty years, whom, at an earlier period of his life, we introduced as paying a professional visit to Ethan Brand during the latter's supposed insanity. He was now a purple-visaged, rude, and brutal, yet half-gentlemanly figure, with something wild, ruined, and desperate in his talk, and in all the details of his gesture and manners. Brandy possessed this man like an evil spirit, and made him as surly and savage as a wild beast, and as miserable as a lost soul, but there was supposed to be in him such wonderful skill, such native gifts of healing, beyond any which medical science could impart, that society caught hold of him, and would not let him sink out of its reach. So, swaying to and fro upon his horse, and grumbling thick accents at the bedside, he visited all the sick-chambers for miles about among the mountain towns, and sometimes raised a dying man, as it were, by miracle, or quite as often, no doubt, sent his patient to a grave that was dug many a year too soon. The doctor had an everlasting pipe in his mouth, and, as somebody said, in allusion to his habit of swearing, it was always alight with hell-fire.

These three worthies pressed forward, and greeted Ethan Brand each after his own fashion, earnestly inviting him to partake of the contents of a certain black bottle, in which, as they averred, he would find something far better worth seeking for than the Unpardonable Sin. No mind, which has wrought itself by intense and solitary meditation into a high state of enthusiasm, can endure the kind of contact with low and vulgar modes of thought and feeling to which Ethan Brand was now subjected. It made him doubt—and, strange to say, it was a painful doubt—whether he had indeed found the Unpardonable Sin, and found it within himself. The whole question on which he had exhausted life, and more than life, looked like a delusion.

'Leave me,' he said bitterly, 'ye brute beasts, that have made yourselves so, shrivelling up your souls with fiery liquors! I have done with you Years and years ago, I groped into your hearts, and found nothing there for my purpose Get ye gone!

'Why, you uncivil scoundrel,' cried the fierce doctor, 'is that the way you respond to the kindness of your best friends? Then let me tell you the truth You have no more found the Unpardonable Sin than yonder boy Joe has You are but a crazy fellow,—I told you so twenty years ago,—neither better nor worse than a crazy fellow, and the fit companion of old Humphrey, here!'

He pointed to an old man, shabbily dressed, with long white hair, thin visage, and unsteady eyes For some years past this aged person had been wandering about among the hills, inquiring of all travellers whom he met for his daughter The girl, it seemed, had gone off with a company of circus-performers, and occasionally tidings of her came to the village, and fine stories were told of her glittering appearance as she rode on horseback in the ring, or performed marvellous feats on the tight-rope

The white-haired father now approached Ethan Brand, and gazed unsteadily into his face

'They tell me you have been all over the earth,' said he, wringing his hands with earnestness 'You must have seen my daughter, for she makes a grand figure in the world, and everybody goes to see her Did she send any word to her old father, or say when she was coming back?'

Ethan Brand's eye quailed beneath the old man's That daughter, from whom he so earnestly desired a word of greeting, was the Esther of our tale, the very girl whom, with such cold and remorseless purpose, Ethan Brand had made the subject of a psychological experiment, and wasted, absorbed, and perhaps annihilated her soul, in the process

'Yes,' murmured he, turning away from the hoary wanderer, 'it is no delusion There is an Unpardonable Sin!'

While these things were passing, a merry scene was going forward in the area of cheerful light, beside the spring and before the door of the hut. A number of the youth of the village, young men and girls, had hurried up the hill-side, impelled by curiosity to see Ethan Brand, the hero of so many a legend familiar to their childhood

Finding nothing, however, very remarkable in his aspect,—nothing but a sun-burnt wayfarer, in plain garb and dusty shoes, who sat looking into the fire as if he fancied pictures among the coals,—these young people speedily grew tired of observing him As it happened, there was other amusement at hand An old German Jew, travelling with a diorama on his back, was passing down the mountain-road towards the village just as the party turned aside from it, and, in hopes of eking out the profits of the day, the showman had kept them company to the lime-kiln

'Come, old Dutchman,' cried one of the young men, 'let us see your pictures, if you can swear they are worth looking at!'

'Oh, yes, Captain,' answered the Jew,—whether as a matter of courtesy or craft, he styled everybody Captain,—'I shall show you, indeed, some very superb pictures!'

So, placing his box in a proper position, he invited the young men and girls to look through the glass orifices of the machine, and proceeded to exhibit a series of the most outrageous scratchings and daubings, as specimens of the fine arts, that ever an itinerant showman had the face to impose upon his circle of spectators The pictures were worn out, moreover, tattered, full of cracks and wrinkles, dingy with tobacco-smoke, and otherwise in a most pitiable condition Some purported to be cities, public edifices, and ruined castles in Europe, others represented Napoleon's battles and Nelson's sea-fights, and in the midst of these would be seen a gigantic, brown, hairy hand,—which might have been mistaken for the Hand of Destiny, though, in truth, it was only the showman's,—pointing its forefinger to various scenes of the conflict, while its owner gave historical illustrations When, with much merriment at its abominable deficiency of merit, the exhibition was concluded, the German bade little Joe put his head into the box Viewed through the magnifying-glasses, the boy's round, rosy visage assumed the strangest imaginable aspect of an immense Titanic child, the mouth grinning broadly, and the eyes and every other feature overflowing with fun at the joke Suddenly, however, that merry face turned pale, and its expression changed to horror, for this easily impressed and excitable child had become sensible that the eye of Ethan Brand was fixed upon him through the glass

'You make the little man to be afraid, Captain,' said the German Jew, turning up the dark and strong outline of his visage, from his stooping posture 'But look again, and, by chance, I shall cause you to see somewhat that is very fine, upon my word!'

Ethan Brand gazed into the box for an instant, and then starting back, looked fixedly at the German. What had he seen? Nothing, apparently, for a curious youth, who had peeped in almost at the same moment, beheld only a vacant space of canvas

'I remember you now,' muttered Ethan Brand to the showman

'Ah, Captain,' whispered the Jew of Nuremburg, with a dark smile, 'I find it to be a heavy matter in my show-box,—this Unpardonable Sin! By my faith, Captain, it has wearied my shoulders, this long day, to carry it over the mountain'

'Peace,' answered Ethan Brand, sternly, 'or get thee into the furnace yonder!'

The Jew's exhibition had scarcely concluded, when a great, elderly dog—who seemed to be his own master, as no person in the company laid claim to him—saw fit to render himself the object of public notice. Hitherto, he had shown himself a very quiet, well-disposed old dog, going round from one to another, and, by way of being sociable, offering his rough head to be patted by any kindly hand that would take so much trouble. But now, all of a sudden, this grave and venerable quadruped, of his own mere motion, and without the slightest suggestion from anybody else, began to run round after his tail, which, to heighten the absurdity of the proceeding, was a great deal shorter than it should have been. Never was seen such headlong eagerness in pursuit of an object that could not possibly be attained, never was heard such a tremendous outbreak of growling, snarling, barking, and snapping,—as if one end of the ridiculous brute's body were at deadly and most unforgivable enmity with the other. Faster and faster, round about went the cur, and faster and still faster fled the unapproachable brevity of his tail, and louder and fiercer grew his yells of rage and animosity, until, utterly exhausted, and as far from the goal as ever, the foolish old dog ceased his performance as suddenly as he had begun it. The next moment he was as mild, quiet, sensible, and respectable in his deportment, as when he first scraped acquaintance with the company.

As may be supposed, the exhibition was greeted with universal laughter, clapping of hands, and shouts of encore, to which the canine performer responded by wagging all that there was to wag of his tail, but appeared totally unable to repeat his very successful effort to amuse the spectators.

Meanwhile, Ethan Brand had resumed his seat upon the log, and moved, it might be, by a perception of some remote analogy between his own case and that of this self-pursuing cur, he broke into the awful laugh, which, more than any other token, expressed the condition of his inward being. From that moment, the merriment of the party was at an end, they stood aghast, dreading lest the inauspicious sound should be reverberated around the horizon, and that mountain would thunder it to mountain, and so the horror be prolonged upon their ears. Then, whispering one to another that it was late,—that the moon was almost down,—that the August night was growing chill,—they hurried homewards, leaving the lime-burner and little Joe to deal as they might with their unwelcome guest. Save for these three human beings, the open space on the hill-side was a solitude, set in a vast gloom of forest. Beyond that darksome verge, the firelight glimmered on the stately trunks and almost black foliage of pines, intermixed with the lighter verdure of sapling oaks, maples, and poplars, while here and there lay the gigantic corpses of dead trees, decaying on the leaf-strewn soil. And it seemed to little Joe—a timorous and imaginative child—that the silent forest was holding its breath until some fearful thing should happen.

Ethan Brand thrust more wood into the fire, and closed the door of the kiln, then looking over his shoulder at the lime-burner and his son, he bade, rather than advised, them to retire to rest.

'For myself, I cannot sleep,' said he. 'I have matters that it concerns me to meditate upon. I will watch the fire, as I used to do in the old time.'

'And call the Devil out of the furnace to keep you company, I suppose,' muttered Bartram, who had been making intimate acquaintance with the black bottle above mentioned 'But watch, if you like, and call as many devils as you like! For my part, I shall be all the better for a snooze. Come, Joe!'

As the boy followed his father into the hut, he looked back at the wayfarer, and the tears came into his eyes, for his tender spirit had an intuition of the bleak and terrible loneliness in which this man had enveloped himself

When they had gone, Ethan Brand sat listening to the crackling of the kindled wood, and looking at the little spirits of fire that issued through the chunks of the door. These trifles, however, once so familiar, had but the slightest hold of his attention, while deep within his mind he was reviewing the gradual but marvellous change that had been wrought upon him by the search to which he had devoted himself. He remembered how the night dew had fallen upon him,—how the dark forest had whispered to him,—how the stars had gleamed upon him,—a simple and loving man, watching his fire in the years gone by, and ever musing as it burned. He remembered with what tenderness, with what love and sympathy for mankind, and what pity for human guilt and woe, he had first begun to contemplate those ideas which afterwards became the inspiration of his life, with what reverence he had then looked into the heart of man, viewing it as a temple originally divine, and, however desecrated, still to be held sacred by a brother, with what awful fear he had deprecated the success of his pursuit, and prayed that the Unpardonable Sin might never be revealed to him. Then ensued that vast intellectual development, which, in its progress, disturbed the counterpoise between his mind and heart. The Idea that possessed his life had operated as a means of education, it had gone on cultivating his powers to the highest point of which they were susceptible, it had raised him from the level of an unlettered laborer to stand on a star-lit eminence, whither the philosophers of the earth, laden with the lore of universities, might vainly strive to clamber after him. So much for the intellect! But where was the heart? That, indeed, had withered,—had contracted,—had hardened,—had perished! It had ceased to partake of the universal throb.

He had lost his hold of the magnetic chain of humanity. He was no longer a brother-man, opening the chambers or the dungeons of our common nature by the key of holy sympathy, which gave him a right to share in all its secrets; he was now a cold observer, looking on mankind as the subject of his experiment, and, at length, converting man and woman to be his puppets, and pulling the wires that moved them to such degrees of crime as were demanded for his study.

Thus Ethan Brand became a fiend. He began to be so from the moment that his moral nature had ceased to keep the pace of improvement with his intellect. And now, as his highest effort and inevitable development,—as the bright and gorgeous flower, and rich, delicious fruit of his life's labor,—he had produced the Unpardonable Sin!

'What more have I to seek? what more to achieve?' said Ethan Brand to himself. 'My task is done, and well done!'

Starting from the log with a certain alacrity in his gait and ascending the hillock of earth that was raised against the stone circumference of the lime-kiln, he thus reached the top of the structure. It was a space of perhaps ten feet across, from edge to edge, presenting a view of the upper surface of the immense mass of broken marble with which the kiln was heaped. All these innumerable blocks and fragments of marble were red-hot and vividly on fire, sending up great spouts of blue flame, which quivered aloft and danced madly, as within a magic circle, and sank and rose again, with continual and multitudinous activity. As the lonely man bent forward over this terrible body of fire, the blasting heat smote up against his person with a breath that, it might be supposed, would have scorched and shrivelled him up in a moment.

Ethan Brand stood erect, and raised his arms on high. The blue flames played upon his face, and imparted the wild and ghastly light which alone could have suited its expression, it was that of a fiend on the verge of plunging into his gulf of intensest torment.

'O Mother Earth,' cried he, 'who art no more my Mother, and into whose bosom this frame shall never be resolved! O mankind, whose brotherhood I have cast off, and trampled thy great heart beneath my feet! O stars of heaven, that shone on me of old, as if to light me onward and upward!—farewell all, and forever Come, deadly element of Fire,—henceforth my familiar frame! Embrace me, as I do thee!

That night the sound of a fearful peal of laughter rolled heavily through the sleep of the lime-burner and his little son, dim shapes of horror and anguish haunted their dreams, and seemed still present in the rude hovel, when they opened their eyes to the daylight

'Up, boy, up!' cried the lime-burner, staring about him 'Thank Heaven, the night is gone, at last, and rather than pass such another, I would watch my lime-kiln, wide awake, for a twelvemonth Thus Ethan Brand, with his humbug of an Unpardonable Sin, has done me no such mighty favor, in taking my place!'

He issued from the hut, followed by little Joe, who kept fast hold of his father's hand The early sunshine was already pouring its gold upon the mountain-tops, and though the valleys were still in shadow, they smiled cheerfully in the promise of the bright day that was hastening onward. The village, completely shut in by hills, which swelled away gently about it, looked as if it had rested peacefully in the hollow of the great hand of Providence Every dwelling was distinctly visible, the little spires of the two churches pointed upwards, and caught a fore-glimmering of brightness from the sun-gilt skies upon their gilded weather-cocks The tavern was astir, and the figure of the old, smoke-dried stage-agent, cigar in mouth, was seen beneath the stoop Old Graylock was glorified with a golden cloud upon his head. Scattered likewise over the breasts of the surrounding mountains, there were heaps of hoary mist, in fantastic shapes, some of them far down into the valley, others high up towards the summits, and still others, of the same family of mist or cloud, hovering in the gold radiance of the upper atmosphere. Stepping from one to another of the clouds that rested on the hills, and thence to the loftier brotherhood that sailed in air, it seemed almost as if a mortal man might thus ascend into the heavenly regions Earth was so mingled with sky that it was a day-dream to look at it.

To supply that charm of the familiar and homely, which Nature so readily adopts into a scene like this, the stage-coach was rattling down the mountain-road, and the driver sounded his horn, while Echo caught up the notes, and intertwined them into a rich and varied and elaborate harmony, of which the original performer could lay claim to little share. The great hills played a concert among themselves, each contributing a strain of airy sweetness

Little Joe's face brightened at once.

'Dear father,' cried he, skipping cheerily to and fro, 'that strange man is gone, and the sky and the mountains all seem glad of it!'

'Yes,' growled the lime-burner, with an oath, 'but he has let the fire go down, and no thanks to him if five hundred bushels of lime are not spoiled If I catch the fellow hereabouts again, I shall feel like tossing him into the furnace!'

With his long pole in his hand, he ascended to the top of the kiln After a moment's pause, he called to his son

'Come up here, Joe!' said he

So little Joe ran up the hillock, and stood by his father's side The marble was all burnt into perfect, snow-white lime But on its surface, in the midst of the circle,—snow-white too, and thoroughly converted into lime,—lay a human skeleton, in the attitude of a person who, after long toil, lies down to long repose Within the ribs—strange to say—was the shape of a human heart.

'Was the fellow's heart made of marble?' cried Bartram, in some perplexity at this phenomenon 'At any rate, it is burnt into what looks like special good lime, and, taking all the bones together, my kiln is half a bushel the richer for him'

So saying, the rude lime-burner lifted his pole, and, letting it fall upon the skeleton, the relics of Ethan Brand were crumbled into fragments

The Little Shop-Window

It still lacked half an hour of sunrise, when Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon—we will not say

awoke, it being doubtful whether the poor lady had so much as closed her eyes during the brief night of midsummer—but, at all events, arose from her solitary pillow, and began what it would be mockery to term the adornment of her person. Far from us be the indecorum of assisting, even in imagination, at a maiden lady's toilet! Our story must therefore await Miss Hepzibah at the threshold of her chamber, only presuming, 10 meanwhile, to note some of the heavy sighs that labored from her bosom, with little restraint as to their lugubrious depth and volume of sound, inasmuch as they could be audible to nobody save a disembodied listener like ourself. The Old Maid was alone in the old house. Alone, except for a certain respectable and orderly young man, an artist in the daguerreotype line, who, for about three months back, had been a lodger in a remote gable,—quite a house by 20 itself, indeed,—with locks, bolts, and oaken bars on all the intervening doors. Inaudible, consequently, were poor Miss Hepzibah's gusty sighs. Inaudible the creaking joints of her stiffened knees, as she knelt down by the bedside. And inaudible, too, by mortal ear, but heard with all-comprehending love and pity in the farthest heaven, that almost agony of prayer—now whis- 30 pered, now a groan, now a struggling silence—wherewith she besought the Divine assistance through the day! Evidently, this is to be a day of more than ordinary trial to Miss Hepzibah, who, for above a quarter of a century gone by, has dwelt in strict seclusion, taking no part in the business of life, and just as little in its intercourse and pleasures. Not with such fervor prays the torpid recluse, looking forward to the cold, sunless, stagnant calm of a day that is to be like innumerable yesterdays!

The maiden lady's devotions are concluded. Will she now issue forth over the threshold of our story? Not yet, by many moments. First, every drawer in the tall, old-fashioned bureau is to be opened, with difficulty, and with a succession of spasmodic jerks, then, all must close again, with the same fidgety reluctance. There is a rustling of stiff silks, a tread of backward and forward footsteps to and fro across the chamber. We suspect Miss Hepzibah, 50 moreover, of taking a step upward into a chair, in order to give heedful regard to her appearance on all sides, and at full length, in the oval, dingy-framed toilet-glass, that hangs above her table. Truly! well, indeed! who would have thought it! Is all this precious time to be lavished on the matutinal repair and beautifying of an elderly person, who never goes abroad, whom nobody ever 10 visits, and from whom, when she shall have done her utmost, it were the best charity to turn one's eyes another way?

Now she is almost ready. Let us pardon her one other pause, for it is given to the sole sentiment, or, we might better say,—heightened and rendered intense, as it has been, by sorrow and seclusion,—to the strong passion of her life. We heard the turning of a key in a small lock, she has opened a secret drawer of an escritoire, and is probably looking at a certain miniature, done in Malbone's most perfect style, and representing a face worthy of no less delicate a pencil. It was once our good fortune to see this picture. It is a likeness of a young man, in a silken dressing-gown of an old fashion, the soft richness of which is well adapted to the countenance of reverie, with its full, tender lips, and beautiful eyes, that seem to indicate not so much capacity of 30 thought, as gentle and voluptuous emotion. Of the possessor of such features we shall have a right to ask nothing, except that he would take the rude world easily, and make himself happy in it. Can it have been an early lover of Miss Hepzibah? No, she never had a lover—poor thing, how could she?—nor ever knew, by her own experience, what love technically means. And yet, her undying faith and trust, her fresh remembrance, and continual devotedness towards the original of that miniature, have been the only substance for her heart to feed upon. 40

She seems to have put aside the miniature, and is standing again before the toilet-glass. There are tears to be wiped off. A few more footsteps to and fro, and here, at last,—with another pitiful sigh, like a gust of chill, damp wind out of a long-closed vault, the door of which has accidentally been set ajar,—here comes Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon! Forth she steps into the dusky, time-darkened passage, a tall figure, clad in black silk, with a long and shrunken waist, feeling her way towards the stairs like a near-sighted person, as in truth she is

The sun, meanwhile, if not already above the horizon, was ascending nearer and nearer to its verge. A few clouds, floating high upward, caught some of the earliest light, and threw down its golden gleam on the windows of all the houses in the street, not forgetting the House of the Seven Gables, which—many such sunrises as it had witnessed—looked cheerfully at the present one. The reflected radiance served to show, pretty distinctly, the aspect and arrangement of the room which Hepzibah entered, after descending the stairs. It was a low-studded room, with a beam across the ceiling, panelled with dark wood, and having a large chimney-piece, set round with pictured tiles, but now closed by an iron fire-board, through which ran the funnel of a modern stove. There was a carpet on the floor, originally of rich texture, but so worn and faded in these latter years that its once brilliant figure had quite vanished into one indistinguishable hue. In the way of furniture, there were two tables one, constructed with perplexing intricacy and exhibiting as many feet as a centipede, the other, most delicately wrought, with four long and slender legs, so apparently frail that it was almost incredible what a length of time the ancient tea-table had stood upon them. Half a dozen chairs stood about the room, straight and stiff, and so ingeniously contrived for the discomfort of the human person that they were irksome even to sight, and conveyed the ugliest possible idea of the state of society to which they could have been adapted. One exception there was, however, in a very antique elbow-chair, with a high back, carved elaborately in oak, and a roomy depth within its arms, that made up, by its spacious comprehensiveness, for the lack of any of those artistic curves which abound in a modern chair.

As for ornamental articles of furniture, we recollect but two, if such they may be called. One was a map of the Pyncheon territory at the eastward, not engraved, but the handiwork of some skilful old draughtsman, and grotesquely illuminated with pictures of Indians and wild beasts, among which was seen a lion, the natural history of the region being as little known as its geography, which was put down most fantastically awry. The other adornment was the portrait of old Colonel Pyncheon, at two thirds length, representing the stern features of a Puritanic-looking personage, in a skull-cap, with a laced band and a grizzly beard, holding a Bible with one hand, and in the other uplifting an iron sword-hilt. The latter object, being more successfully depicted by the artist, stood out in far greater prominence than the sacred volume. Face to face with this picture, on entering the apartment, Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon came to a pause, regarding it with a singular scowl, a strange contortion of the brow, which, by people who did not know her, would probably have been interpreted as an expression of bitter anger and ill-will. But it was no such thing. She, in fact, felt a reverence for the pictured visage, of which only a far-descended and time-stricken virgin could be susceptible, and this forbidding scowl was the innocent result of her near-sightedness, and an effort so to concentrate her powers of vision as to substitute a firm outline of the object instead of a vague one.

We must linger a moment on this unfortunate expression of poor Hepzibah's brow. Her scowl,—as the world, or such part of it as sometimes caught a transitory glimpse of her at the window, wickedly persisted in calling it,—her scowl had done Miss Hepzibah a very ill office, in establishing her character as an ill-tempered old maid, nor does it appear improbable that, by often gazing at herself in a dim looking-glass, and perpetually encountering her own frown within its ghostly sphere, she had been led to interpret the expression almost as unjustly as the world did. 'How miserably cross I look!' she must often have whispered to herself, and ultimately have fancied herself so, by a sense of inevitable doom. But her heart never frowned. It was naturally tender, sensitive, and full of little tremors and palpitations, all of which weaknesses it retained, while her visage was growing so perversely stern, and even fierce. Nor had Hepzibah ever any hardihood, except what came from the very warmest nook in her affections.

All this time, however, we are loitering faint-heartedly on the threshold of our story. In very truth, we have an invincible reluctance to disclose what Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon was about to do

It has already been observed, that, in the basement story of the gable fronting on the street, an unworthy ancestor, nearly a century ago, had fitted up a shop. Ever since the old gentleman retired from trade, and fell asleep under his coffin-lid, not only the shop-door, but the inner arrangements, had been suffered to remain unchanged, while the dust of ages gathered inch-deep over the shelves and counter, and partly filled an old pair of scales, as if it were of value enough to be weighed. It treasured itself up, too, in the half-open till, where there still lingered a base sixpence, worth neither more nor less than the hereditary pride which had here been put to shame. Such had been the state and condition of the little shop in old Hepzibah's childhood, when she and her brother used to play at hide-and-seek in its forsaken precincts. So it had remained, until within a few days past.

But now, though the shop-window was still closely curtained from the public gaze, a remarkable change had taken place in its interior. The rich and heavy festoons of cobweb, which it had cost a long ancestral succession of spiders their life's labor to spin and weave, had been carefully brushed away from the ceiling. The counter, shelves, and floor had all been scoured, and the latter was overstrewn with fresh blue sand. The brown scales, too, had evidently undergone rigid discipline, in an unavailing effort to rub off the rust, which, alas! had eaten through and through their substance. Neither was the little old shop any longer empty of merchantable goods. A curious eye, privileged to take an account of stock, and investigate behind the counter, would have discovered a barrel,—yea, two or three barrels and half ditto,—one containing flour, another apples, and a third, perhaps, Indian meal. There was likewise a square box of pine-wood, full of soap in bars, also, another of the same size, in which were tallow-candles, ten to the pound. A small stock of brown sugar, some white beans and split peas, and a few other commodities of low price, and such as are constantly in demand, made up the bulkier portion of the merchandise. It might have been taken for a ghostly or phantasmagoric reflection of the old shop-keeper Pyncheon's shabbily provided shelves, save that some of the articles were of a description and outward form which could hardly have been known in his day. For instance, there was a glass pickle-jar, filled with fragments of Gibraltar rock, not, indeed, splinters of the veritable stone foundation of the famous fortress, but bits of delectable candy, neatly done up in white paper. Jim Crow, moreover, was seen executing his world-renowned dance, in gingerbread. A party of leaden dragoons were galloping along one of the shelves, in equipments and uniform of modern cut, and there were some sugar figures, with no strong resemblance to the humanity of any epoch, but less unsatisfactorily representing our own fashions than those of a hundred years ago. Another phenomenon, still more strikingly modern, was a package of lucifer matches, which, in old times, would have been thought actually to borrow their instantaneous flame from the nether fires of Tophet.

In short, to bring the matter at once to a point, it was incontrovertibly evident that somebody had taken the shop and fixtures of the long-retired and forgotten Mr Pyncheon, and was about to renew the enterprise of that departed worthy, with a different set of customers. Who could this bold adventurer be? And, of all places in the world, why had he chosen the House of the Seven Gables as the scene of his commercial speculations?

We return to the elderly maiden. She at length withdrew her eyes from the dark countenance of the Colonel's portrait, heaved a sigh,—indeed, her breast was a very cave of Æolus that morning,—and stepped across the room on tiptoe, as is the customary gait of elderly women. Passing through an intervening passage, she opened a door that communicated with the shop, just now so elaborately described. Owing to the projection of the upper story—and still more to the thick shadow of the Pyncheon Elm, which stood almost directly in front of the gable—the twilight, here, was still as much akin to night as morning. Another heavy sigh from Miss Hepzibah! After a moment's pause on the threshold, peering towards the window with her near-sighted scowl, as if frowning down some bitter enemy, she suddenly projected herself into the shop. The haste, and, as it were, the galvanic impulse of the movement, were really quite startling

Nervously—in a sort of frenzy, we might almost say—she began to busy herself in arranging some children's playthings, and other little wares, on the shelves and at the shop-window. In the aspect of this dark-arrayed, pale-faced, lady-like old figure there was a deeply tragic character that contrasted irreconcilably with the ludicrous pettiness of her employment. It seemed a queer anomaly, that so gaunt and dismal a personage should take a toy in hand, a miracle, that the toy did not vanish in her grasp, a miserably absurd idea, that she should go on perplexing her stuff and sombre intellect with the question how to tempt little boys into her premises! Yet such is undoubtedly her object. Now she places a gingerbread elephant against the window, but with so tremulous a touch that it tumbles upon the floor, with the dismemberment of three legs and its trunk, it has ceased to be an elephant, and has become a few bits of musty gingerbread. There, again, she has upset a tumbler of marbles, all of which roll different ways, and each individual marble, devil-directed, into the most difficult obscurity that it can find. Heaven help our poor old Hepzibah, and forgive us for taking a ludicrous view of her position! As her rigid and rusty frame goes down upon its hands and knees, in quest of the absconding marbles, we positively feel so much the more inclined to shed tears of sympathy, from the very fact that we must needs turn aside and laugh at her. For here,—and if we fail to impress it suitably upon the reader, it is our own fault, not that of the theme,—here is one of the truest points of melancholy interest that occur in ordinary life. It was the final throes of what called itself old gentility. A lady—who had fed herself from childhood with the shadowy food of aristocratic reminiscences, and whose religion it was that a lady's hand soils itself irremediably by doing aught for bread—this born lady, after sixty years of narrowing means, is fain to step down from her pedestal of imaginary rank. Poverty, treading closely at her heels for a lifetime, has come up with her at last. She must earn her own food, or starve! And we have stolen upon Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon, too irreverently, at the instant of time when the patrician lady is to be transformed into the plebeian woman

In this republican country, amid the fluctuating waves of our social life, somebody is always at the drowning-point. The tragedy is enacted with as continual a repetition as that of a popular drama on a holiday, and, nevertheless, is felt as deeply, perhaps, as when an hereditary noble sinks below his order. More deeply, since, with us, rank is the grosser substance of wealth and a splendid establishment, and has no spiritual existence after the death of these, but dies hopelessly along with them. And, therefore, since we have been unfortunate enough to introduce our heroine at so inauspicious a juncture, we would entreat for a mood of due solemnity in the spectators of her fate. Let us behold, in poor Hepzibah, the immemorial lady,—two hundred years old, on this side of the water, and thrice as many on the other,—with her antique portraits, pedigrees, coats of arms, records and traditions, and her claim, as joint heiress, to that princely territory at the eastward, no longer a wilderness, but a populous fertility,—born, too, in Pyncheon Street, under the Pyncheon Elm, and in the Pyncheon House, where she has spent all her days,—reduced now, in that very house, to be the hucksteress of a cent-shop

This business of setting up a petty shop is almost the only resource of women, in circumstances at all similar to those of our unfortunate recluse. With her near-sightedness, and those tremulous fingers of hers, at once inflexible and delicate, she could not be a seamstress, although her sampler, of fifty years gone by, exhibited some of the most recondite specimens of ornamental needlework. A school for little children had been often in her thoughts, and, at one time, she had begun a review of her early studies in the New England Primer, with a view to prepare herself for the office of instructress. But the love of children had never been quickened in Hepzibah's heart, and was now torpid, if not extinct, she watched the little people of the neighborhood from her chamber-window, and doubted whether she could tolerate a more intimate acquaintance with them. Besides, in our day, the very A B C has become a science greatly too abstruse to be any longer taught by pointing a pin from letter to letter A modern child could teach old Hepzibah more than old Hepzibah could teach the child So—with many a cold, deep heart-quake at the idea of at last coming into sordid contact with the world, from which she had so long kept aloof, while every added day of seclusion had rolled another stone against the cavern-door of her hermitage—the poor thing bethought herself of the ancient shop-window, the rusty scales, and dusty till She might have held back a little longer, but another circumstance, not yet hunted at, had somewhat hastened her decision Her humble preparations, therefore, were duly made, and the enterprise was now to be commenced Nor was she entitled to complain of any remarkable singularity in her fate, for, in the town of her nativity, we might point to several little shops of a similar description, some of them in houses as ancient as that of the Seven Gables, and one or two, it may be, where a decayed gentlewoman stands behind the counter, as grim an image of family pride as Miss Hepzibah Pyncheon herself

It was overpoweringly ridiculous—we must honestly confess it—the deportment of the maiden lady while setting her shop in order for the public eye She stole on tiptoe to the window, as cautiously as if she conceived some bloody-minded villain to be watching behind the elm-tree, with intent to take her life Stretching out her long, lank arm, she put a paper of pearl buttons, a jew's-harp, or whatever the small article might be, in its destined place, and straightway vanished back into the dusk, as if the world need never hope for another glimpse of her It might have been fancied, indeed, that she expected to minister to the wants of the community unseen, like a disembodied divinity or enchantress, holding forth her bargains to the reverential and awe-stricken purchaser in an invisible hand But Hepzibah had no such flattering dream She was well aware that she must ultimately come forward, and stand revealed in her proper individuality, but, like other sensitive persons, she could not bear to be observed in the gradual process, and chose rather to flash forth on the world's astonished gaze at once

The inevitable moment was not much longer to be delayed The sunshine might now be seen stealing down the front of the opposite house, from the windows of which came a reflected gleam, struggling through the boughs of the elm-tree, and enlightening the interior of the shop more distinctly than heretofore The town appeared to be waking up A baker's cart had already rattled through the street, chasing away the latest vestige of night's sanctity with the jingle-jangle of its dissonant bells A milkman was distributing the contents of his cans from door to door, and the harsh peal of a fisherman's conch-shell was heard far off, around the corner None of these tokens escaped Hepzibah's notice The moment had arrived To delay longer would be only to lengthen out her misery Nothing remained, except to take down the bar from the shop-door, leaving the entrance free—more than free—welcome, as if all were household friends—to every passer-by, whose eyes might be attracted by the commodities at the window Thus last act Hepzibah now performed, letting the bar fall with what smote upon her excited nerves as a most astounding clatter Then—as if the only barrier betwixt herself and the world had been thrown down, and a flood of evil consequences would come tumbling through the gap—she fled into the inner parlor, threw herself into the ancestral elbow-chair, and wept

Our miserable old Hepzibah! It is a heavy annoyance to a writer, who endeavors to represent nature, its various attitudes and circumstances, in a reasonably correct outline and true coloring, that so much of the mean and ludicrous should be hopelessly mixed up with the purest pathos which life anywhere supplies to him What tragic dignity, for example, can be wrought into a scene like this! How can we elevate our history of retribution for the sin of long ago, when, as one of our most prominent figures, we are compelled to introduce—not a young and lovely woman, nor even the stately remains of beauty, storm-shattered by affliction—but a gaunt, sallow, rusty-jointed maiden, in a long-waisted silk gown, and with the strange horror of a turban on her head! Her visage is not even ugly It is redeemed from insignificance only by the contraction of her eyebrows into a near-sighted scowl And, finally, her great life-trial seems to be, that, after sixty years of idleness, she finds it convenient to earn comfortable bread by setting up a shop in a small way. Nevertheless, if we look through all the heroic fortunes of mankind, we shall find this same entanglement of something mean and trivial with whatever is noblest in joy or sorrow. Life is made up of marble and mud. And, without all the deeper trust in a comprehensive sympathy above us, we might hence be led to suspect the insult of a sneer, as well as an immutable frown, on the iron countenance of fate. What is called poetic insight is the gift of discerning, in this sphere of strangely mingled elements, the beauty and the majesty which are compelled to assume a garb so sordid.

The First Customer

MISS HEPZIBAH PYNCHIEON sat in the oaken elbow-chair, with her hands over her face, giving way to that heavy down-sinking of the heart which most persons have experienced, when the image of hope itself seems ponderously moulded of lead, on the eve of an enterprise at once doubtful and momentous. She was suddenly startled by the tinkling alarum—high, sharp, and irregular—of a little bell. The maiden lady arose upon her feet, as pale as a ghost at cock-crow, for she was an enslaved spirit, and this the talisman to which she owed obedience. This little bell,—to speak in plainer terms,—being fastened over the shop-door, was so contrived as to vibrate by means of a steel spring, and thus convey notice to the inner regions of the house when any customer should cross the threshold. Its ugly and spiteful little din (heard now for the first time, perhaps, since Hepzibah's periwigged predecessor had retired from trade) at once set every nerve of her body in responsive and tumultuous vibration. The crisis was upon her! Her first customer was at the door!

Without giving herself time for a second thought, she rushed into the shop, pale, wild, desperate in gesture and expression, scowling portentously, and looking far better qualified to do fierce battle with a house-breaker than to stand smiling behind the counter, bartering small wares for a copper recompense. Any ordinary customer, indeed, would have turned his back and fled

And yet there was nothing fierce in Hepzibah's poor old heart, nor had she, at the moment, a single bitter thought against the world at large, or one individual man or woman. She wished them all well, but wished, too, that she herself were done with them, and in her quiet grave.

The applicant, by this time, stood within the door-way. Coming freshly, as he did, out of the morning light, he appeared to have brought some of its cheery influences into the shop along with him. It was a slender young man, not more than one or two and twenty years old, with rather a grave and thoughtful expression for his years, but likewise a springy alacrity and vigor. These qualities were not only perceptible, physically, in his make and motions, but made themselves felt almost immediately in his character. A brown beard, not too silken in its texture, fringed his chin, but as yet without completely hiding it, he wore a short mustache, too, and his dark, high-featured countenance looked all the better for these natural ornaments. As for his dress, it was of the simplest kind, a summer sack of cheap and ordinary material, thin checkered pantaloons, and a straw hat, by no means of the finest braid. Oak Hall might have supplied his entire equipment. He was chiefly marked as a gentleman—if such, indeed, he made any claim to be—by the rather remarkable whiteness and nicety of his clean linen.

He met the scowl of old Hepzibah without apparent alarm, as having heretofore encountered it and found it harmless.

'So, my dear Miss Pyncheon,' said the daguerreotypist,—for it was that sole other occupant of the seven-gabled mansion,—'I am glad to see that you have not shrunk from your good purpose. I merely look in to offer my best wishes, and to ask if I can assist you any further in your preparations.'

People in difficulty and distress, or in any manner at odds with the world, can endure a vast amount of harsh treatment, and perhaps be only the stronger for it, whereas they give way at once before the simplest expression of what they perceive to be genuine sympathy. So it proved with poor Hepzibah, for, when she saw the young man's smile,—looking so much the brighter on a thoughtful face,—and heard his kindly tone, she broke first into a hysteric giggle and then began to sob

'Ah, Mr Holgrave,' cried she, as soon as she could speak, 'I never can go through with it! Never, never, never! I wish I were dead, and in the old family-tomb, with all my forefathers! With my father, and my mother, and my sister! Yes, and with my brother, who had far better find me there than here! The world is too chill and hard, —and I am too old, and too feeble, and too hopeless!'

'Oh, believe me, Miss Hepzibah,' said the young man, quietly, 'these feelings will not trouble you any longer, after you are once fairly in the midst of your enterprise. They are unavoidable at this moment, standing, as you do, on the outer verge of your long seclusion, and peopling the world with ugly shapes, which you will soon find to be as unreal as the giants and ogres of a child's story-book. I find nothing so singular in life, as that everything appears to lose its substance the instant one actually grapples with it. So it will be with what you think so terrible.'

'But I am a woman!' said Hepzibah, pitiously. 'I was going to say, a lady,—but I consider that as past.'

'Well, no matter if it be past' answered the artist, a strange gleam of half-hidden sarcasm flashing through the kindness of his manner. 'Let it go! You are the better without it. I speak frankly, my dear Miss Pyncheon! for are we not friends? I look upon this as one of the fortunate days of your life. It ends an epoch and begins one. Hitherto, the life-blood has been gradually chilling in your veins as you sat aloof, within your circle of gentility, while the rest of the world was fighting out its battle with one kind of necessity or another. Henceforth, you will at least have the sense of healthy and natural effort for a purpose, and of lending your strength—be it great or small—to the united struggle of mankind. This is success,—all the success that any-body meets with!'

'It is natural enough, Mr Holgrave, that you should have ideas like these,' rejoined Hepzibah, drawing up her gaunt figure, with slightly offended dignity. 'You are a man, a young man, and brought up, I suppose, as almost everybody is nowadays, with a view to seeking your fortune. But I was born a lady, and have always lived one; no matter in what narrowness of means, always a lady!'

'But I was not born a gentleman, neither have I lived like one,' said Holgrave, slightly smiling, 'so, my dear madam, you will hardly expect me to sympathize with sensibilities of this kind, though, unless I deceive myself, I have some imperfect comprehension of them. These names of gentleman and lady had a meaning, in the past history of the world, and conferred privileges, desirable or otherwise, on those entitled to bear them. In the present—and still more in the future condition of society—they imply, not privilege, but restriction!'

'These are new notions,' said the old gentlewoman, shaking her head. 'I shall never understand them, neither do I wish it.'

'We will cease to speak of them, then,' replied the artist, with a friendlier smile than his last one, 'and I will leave you to feel whether it is not better to be a true woman than a lady. Do you really think, Miss Hepzibah, that any lady of your family has ever done a more heroic thing, since this house was built, than you are performing in it to-day? Never, and if the Pyncheons had always acted so nobly, I doubt whether an old wizard Maule's anathema, of which you told me once, would have had much weight with Providence against them.'

'Ah!—no, no!' said Hepzibah, not displeased at this allusion to the sombre dignity of an inherited curse. 'If old Maule's ghost, or a descendant of his, could see me behind the counter to-day, he would call it the fulfilment of his worst wishes. But I thank you for your kindness, Mr Holgrave, and will do my utmost to be a good shop-keeper.'

'Pray do,' said Holgrave, 'and let me have the pleasure of being your first customer. I am about taking a walk to the seashore, before going to my rooms, where I misuse Heaven's blessed sunshine by tracing out human features through its agency. A few of those biscuits dipt in sea-water, will be just what I need for breakfast. What is the price of half a dozen?'

'Let me be a lady a moment longer,' replied Hepzibah, with a manner of antique stateliness to which a melancholy smile lent a kind of grace. She put the biscuits into his hand, but rejected the compensation. 'A Pyncheon must not, at all events under her forefathers' roof, receive money for a morsel of bread from her only friend!'

Holgrave took his departure, leaving her, for the moment, with spirits not quite so much depressed. Soon, however, they had subsided nearly to their former dead level. With a beating heart, she listened to the footsteps of early passengers, which now began to be frequent along the street. Once or twice they seemed to linger, these strangers, or neighbors, as the case might be, were looking at the display of toys and petty commodities in Hepzibah's shop-window. She was doubly tortured, in part, with a sense of overwhelming shame that strange and unloving eyes should have the privilege of gazing, and partly because the idea occurred to her, with ridiculous importunity, that the window was not arranged so skilfully, nor nearly to so much advantage, as it might have been. It seemed as if the whole fortune or failure of her shop might depend on the display of a different set of articles, or substituting a fairer apple for one which appeared to be specked. So she made the change, and straightway fancied that everything was spoiled by it, not recognizing that it was the nervousness of the juncture, and her own native squeamishness as an old maid, that wrought all the seeming mischief.

Anon, there was an encounter, just at the door-step, betwixt two laboring men, as their rough voices denoted them to be. After some slight talk about their own affairs, one of them chanced to notice the shop-window, and directed the other's attention to it.

'See here!' cried he, 'what do you think of this? Trade seems to be looking up in Pyncheon Street!'

'Well, well, this is a sight, to be sure!' exclaimed the other. 'In the old Pyncheon House, and underneath the Pyncheon Elm! Who would have thought it? Old Maid Pyncheon is setting up a cent-shop!'

'Will she make it go, thank you, Dixey?' said his friend. 'I don't call it a very good stand. There's another shop just round the corner.'

'Make it go!' cried Dixey, with a most contemptuous expression, as if the very idea were impossible to be conceived. 'Not a bit of it! Why, her face—I've seen it, for I dug her garden for her one year—her face is enough to frighten the Old Nick himself, if he had ever so great a mind to trade with her. People can't stand it, I tell you! She scowls dreadfully, reason or none, out of pure ugliness of temper!'

'Well, that's not so much matter,' remarked the other man. 'These sour-tempered folks are mostly handy at business, and know pretty well what they are about. But, as you say, I don't think she'll do much. This business of keeping cent-shops is overdone, like all other kinds of trade, handicraft, and bodily labor. I know it, to my cost! My wife kept a cent-shop three months, and lost five dollars on her outlay!'

'Poor business!' responded Dixey, in a tone as if he were shaking his head, 'poor business!'

For some reason or other, not very easy to analyze, there had hardly been so bitter a pang in all her previous misery about the matter as what thrilled Hepzibah's heart, on overhearing the above conversation. The testimony in regard to her scowl was frightfully important, it seemed to hold up her image wholly relieved from the false light of her self-partialities, and so hideous that she dared not look at it. She was absurdly hurt, moreover, by the slight and idle effect that her setting up shop—an event of such breathless interest to herself—appeared to have upon the public, of which these two men were the nearest representatives. A glance, a passing word or two, a coarse laugh, and she was doubtless forgotten before they turned the corner! They cared nothing for her dignity, and just as little for her degradation. Then, also, the augury of ill-success, uttered from the sure wisdom of experience, fell upon her half-dead hope like a clod into a grave. The man's wife had already tried the same experiment, and failed! How could the born lady,—the recluse of half a lifetime, utterly unpractised in the world, at sixty years of age,—how could she ever dream of succeeding, when the hard, vulgar, keen, busy, hackneyed New England woman had lost five dollars on her little outlay! Success presented itself as an impossibility, and the hope of it as a wild hallucination.

Some malevolent spirit, doing his utmost to drive Hepzibah mad, unrolled before her imagination a kind of panorama, representing the great thoroughfare of a city all astr with customers. So many and so magnificent shops as there were! Groceries, toy-shops, dry-goods stores, with their immense panes of plate-glass, their gorgeous fixtures, their vast and complete assortments of merchandise, in which fortunes had been invested, and those noble mirrors at the further end of each establishment, doubling all this wealth by a brightly burnished vista of unrealities! On one side of the street this splendid bazaar, with a multitude of perfumed and glossy salesmen, smirking, smiling, bowing, and measuring out the goods. On the other, the dusky old House of the Seven Gables, with the antiquated shop-window under its projecting story, and Hepzibah herself, in a gown of rusty black silk, behind the counter, scowling at the world as it went by! This mighty contrast thrust itself forward as a fair expression of the odds against which she was to begin her struggle for a subsistence. Success? Preposterous! She would never think of it again! The house might just as well be buried in an eternal fog while all other houses had the sunshine on them, for not a foot would ever cross the threshold, nor a hand so much as try the door!

But, at this instant, the shop-bell, right over her head, tinkled as if it were bewitched. The old gentlewoman's heart seemed to be attached to the same steel spring, for it went through a series of sharp jerks, in unison with the sound. The door was thrust open, although no human form was perceptible on the other side of the half-window. Hepzibah, nevertheless, stood at a gaze, with her hands clasped, looking very much as if she had summoned up an evil spirit, and were afraid, yet resolved, to hazard the encounter.

'Heaven help me!' she groaned, mentally. 'Now is my hour of need!'

The door, which moved with difficulty on its creaking and rusty hinges, being forced quite open, a square and sturdy little urchin became apparent, with cheeks as red as an apple. He was clad rather shabbily (but, as it seemed, more owing to his mother's carelessness than his father's poverty), in a blue apron, very wide and short trousers, shoes somewhat out at the toes, and a chip-hat, with the frizzles of his curly hair sticking through its crevices. A book and a small slate, under his arm, indicated that he was on his way to school. He stared at Hepzibah a moment, as an elder customer than himself would have been likely enough to do, not knowing what to make of the tragic attitude and queer scowl wherewith she regarded him.

10 'Well, child,' said she, taking heart at sight of a personage so little formidable,— 'well, my child, what did you wish for?'

'That Jim Crow there in the window,' answered the urchin, holding out a cent, and pointing to the gingerbread figure that had attracted his notice, as he loitered along to school, 'the one that has not a broken foot.'

20 So Hepzibah put forth her lank arm, and, taking the effigy from the shop-window, delivered it to her first customer.

'No matter for the money,' said she, giving him a little push towards the door, for her old gentility was contumaciously squeamish at sight of the copper coin, and, besides, it seemed such pitiful meanness to take the child's pocket-money in exchange for a bit of stale gingerbread. 'No matter for the cent. You are welcome to Jim Crow.'

30 The child, staring with round eyes at this instance of liberality, wholly unprecedented in his large experience of cent-shops, took the man of gingerbread, and quitted the premises. No sooner had he reached the sidewalk (little cannibal that he was!) than Jim Crow's head was in his mouth. As he had not been careful to shut the door, Hepzibah was at the pains of closing it after him, with a pettish ejaculation or two about the troublesomeness of young people, and particularly of small boys. She had just placed another representative of the renowned Jim Crow at the window, when again the shop-bell tinkled clamorously, and again the door being thrust open, with its characteristic jerk and jar, disclosed the same sturdy little urchin who, precisely two minutes ago, had made his exit. The crumbs and discoloration of 50 the cannibal feast, as yet hardly consummated, were exceedingly visible about his mouth.

'What is it now, child?' asked the maiden lady, rather impatiently, 'did you come back to shut the door?'

'No,' answered the urchin, pointing to the figure that had just been put up, 'I want that other Jim Crow.'

'Well, here it is for you,' said Hepzibah, reaching it down, but recognizing that this pertinacious customer would not quit her on any other terms, so long as she had a gingerbread figure in her shop, she partly drew back her extended hand, 'Where is the cent?'

The little boy had the cent ready, but, like a true-born Yankee, would have preferred the better bargain to the worse. Looking somewhat chagrined, he put the coin into Hepzibah's hand, and departed, sending the second Jim Crow in quest of the former one. The new shopkeeper dropped the first solid result of her commercial enterprise into the till. It was done! The sordid stain of that copper coin could never be washed away from her palm. The little school-boy, aided by the impish figure of the negro dancer, had wrought an irreparable ruin. The structure of ancient aristocracy had been demolished by him, even as if his childish gripe had torn down the seven-gabled mansion. Now let Hepzibah turn the old Pyncheon portraits with their faces to the wall, and take the map of her Eastern territory to kindle the kitchen fire, and blow up the flame with the empty breath of her ancestral traditions! What had she to do with ancestry? Nothing, no more than with posterity! No lady, now, but simply Hepzibah Pyncheon, a forlorn old maid, and keeper of a cent-shop!

Nevertheless, even while she paraded these ideas somewhat ostentatiously through her mind, it is altogether surprising what a calmness had come over her. The anxiety and misgivings which had tormented her, whether asleep or in melancholy day-dreams, ever since her project began to take an aspect of solidity, had now vanished quite away. She felt the novelty of her position, indeed, but no longer with disturbance or affright. Now and then, there came a thrill of almost youthful enjoyment. It was the invigorating breath of a fresh outward atmosphere, after the long torpor and monotonous seclusion of her life. So wholesome is effort! So miraculous the strength that we do not know of! The healthiest glow that Hepzibah had known for years had come now in the dreaded crisis, when, for the first time, she had put forth her hand to help herself. The little circlet of the school-boy's copper coin—dim and lustreless though it was, with the small services which it had been doing here and there about the world—had proved a talisman, fragrant with good, and deserving to be set in gold and worn next her heart. It was as potent, and perhaps endowed with the same kind of efficacy, as a galvanic ring! Hepzibah, at all events, was indebted to its subtle operation both in body and spirit, so much the more, as it inspired her with energy to get some breakfast, at which, still the better to keep up her courage, she allowed herself an extra spoonful in her infusion of black tea.

Her introductory day of shop-keeping did not run on, however, without many and serious interruptions of this mood of cheerful vigor. As a general rule, Providence seldom vouchsafes to mortals any more than just that degree of encouragement which suffices to keep them at a reasonably full exertion of their powers. In the case of our old gentlewoman, after the excitement of new effort had subsided, the despondency of her whole life threatened, ever and anon, to return. It was like the heavy mass of clouds which we may often see obscuring the sky, and making a gray twilight everywhere, until, towards nightfall, it yields temporarily to a glimpse of sunshine. But, always, the envious cloud strives to gather again across the streak of celestial azure.

Customers came in, as the forenoon advanced, but rather slowly, in some cases, too, it must be owned, with little satisfaction either to themselves or Miss Hepzibah, nor, on the whole, with an aggregate of very rich emolument to the till. A little girl, sent by her mother to match a skein of cotton thread, of a peculiar hue, took one that the near-sighted old lady pronounced extremely like, but soon came running back, with a blunt and cross message, that it would not do, and, besides, was very rotten! Then, there was a pale, care-wrinkled woman, not old but haggard, and already with streaks of gray among her hair, like silver ribbons, one of those women, naturally delicate, whom you at once recognize as worn to death by a brute—probably a drunken brute—of a husband, and at least nine children She wanted a few pounds of flour, and offered the money, which the decayed gentlewoman silently rejected, and gave the poor soul better measure than if she had taken it Shortly afterwards, a man in a blue cotton frock, much soiled, came in and bought a pipe, filling the whole shop, meanwhile, with the hot odor of strong drink, not only exhaled in the torrid atmosphere of his breath, but oozing out of his entire system, like an inflammable gas It was impressed on Hepzibah's mind that this was the husband of the care-wrinkled woman He asked for a paper of tobacco, and as she had neglected to provide herself with the article, her brutal customer dashed down his newly-bought pipe and left the shop, muttering some unintelligible words, which had the tone and bitterness of a curse Hereupon Hepzibah threw up her eyes, unintentionally scowling in the face of Providence!

No less than five persons, during the forenoon, inquired for ginger-beer, or root-beer, or any drink of a similar brewage, and, obtaining nothing of the kind, went off in an exceedingly bad humor Three of them left the door open, and the other two pulled it so spitefully in going out that the little bell played the very deuce with Hepzibah's nerves A round, bustling, fire-ruddy housewife of the neighborhood, burst breathless into the shop, fiercely demanding yeast, and when the poor gentlewoman, with her cold shyness of manner, gave her hot customer to understand that she did not keep the article, this very capable housewife took upon herself to administer a regular rebuke

'A cent-shop, and no yeast!' quoth she, 'that will never do! Who ever heard of such a thing? Your loaf will never rise, no more than mine will to-day You had better shut up shop at once'

'Well,' said Hepzibah, heaving a deep sigh, 'perhaps I had!'

Several times, moreover, besides the above instance, her lady-like sensibilities were seriously infringed upon by the familiar, if not rude, tone with which people addressed her They evidently considered themselves not merely her equals, but her patrons and superiors Now, Hepzibah had unconsciously flattered herself with the idea that there would be a gleam or halo, of some kind or other, about her person, which would insure an obedience to her sterling gentility, or, at least, a tacit recognition of it On the other hand, nothing tortured her more intolerably than when this recognition was too prominently expressed To one or two rather officious offers of sympathy, her responses were little short of acrimonious, and, we regret to say, Hepzibah was thrown into a positively unchristian state of mind by the suspicion that one of her customers was drawn to the shop, not by any real need of the article which she pretended to seek, but by a wicked wish to stare at her The vulgar creature was determined to see for herself what sort of a figure a mildewed piece of aristocracy, after wasting all the bloom and much of the decline of her life apart from the world, would cut behind a counter In this particular case, however mechanical and innocuous it might be at other times, Hepzibah's contortion of brow served her in good stead

'I never was so frightened in my life!' said the curious customer, in describing the incident to one of her acquaintances 'She's a real old vixen, take my word of it! She says little, to be sure, but if you could only see the mischief in her eye!'

On the whole, therefore, her new experience led our decayed gentlewoman to very disagreeable conclusions as to the temper and manners of what she termed the lower classes, whom heretofore she had looked down upon with a gentle and pitying complaisance, as herself occupying a sphere of unquestionable superiority But, unfortunately, she had likewise to struggle against a bitter emotion of a directly opposite kind a sentiment of virulence, we mean, towards the idle aristocracy to which it had so recently been her pride to belong When a lady, in a delicate and costly summer garb, with a floating veil and gracefully swaying gown, and, altogether, an ethereal lightness that made you look at her beautifully slippered feet, to see whether she trod on the dust or floated in the air,—when such a vision happened to pass through this retired street, leaving it tenderly and delusively fragrant with her passage, as if a bouquet of tea-roses had been borne along,—then again, it is to be feared, old Hepzibah's scowl could no longer vindicate itself entirely on the plea of near-sightedness.

'For what end,' thought she, giving vent to that feeling of hostility which is the only real abasement of the poor in presence of the rich,—'for what good end, in the wisdom of Providence, does that woman live? Must the whole world toil, that the palms of her hands may be kept white and delicate?'

Then, ashamed and penitent, she hid <sup>10</sup> her face.

'May God forgive me!' said she.

Doubtless, God did forgive her But, taking the inward and outward history of the first half-day into consideration, Hepzibah began to fear that the shop would prove her ruin in a moral and religious point of view, without contributing very essentially towards even her temporal welfare

*A subtle chain of countless rings
The next unto the farthest brings;
The eye reads omens where it goes,
And speaks all languages the rose,
And, striving to be man, the worm Mounts through all the spires of form*

INTRODUCTION

OUR age is retrospective It builds the sepulchres of the fathers It writes biographies, histories, and criticism The foregoing generations beheld God and nature face to face, we through their eyes Why should not we also enjoy an original relation to the universe? Why should not we have a poetry and philosophy of insight and not of tradition, and a religion by revelation to us, and not the history of theirs? Embosomed for a season in nature, whose floods of life stream around and through us, and invite us by the powers they supply, to action proportioned to nature, why should we grope among the dry bones of the past, or put the living generation into masquerade out of its faded wardrobe? The sun shines to-day also There is more wool and flax in the fields There are new lands, new men, new thoughts Let us demand our own works and laws and worship

<sup>1</sup> Nature was first published anonymously in 1836 In sending a copy to Carlyle, Emerson referred to it as 'an entering wedge, I hope, for something more worthy and significant' Norton, ed., The Correspondence of Thomas Carlyle and Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston, 1883), I, 99 Directly or by implication it contains nearly all of Emerson's idealization

Undoubtedly we have no questions to ask which are unanswerable We must trust the perfection of the creation so far as to believe that whatever curiosity the order of things has awakened in our minds, the order of things can satisfy Every man's condition is a solution in hieroglyphic to those inquiries he would put He acts it as <sup>20</sup> life, before he apprehends it as truth In like manner, nature is already, in its forms and tendencies, describing its own design Let us interrogate the great apparition that shines so peacefully around us Let us inquire, to what end is nature?

All science has one aim, namely, to find a theory of nature We have theories of races and of functions, but scarcely yet a remote approach to an idea of creation We are <sup>30</sup> now so far from the road to truth, that religious teachers dispute and hate each other, and speculative men are esteemed unsound and frivolous But to a sound judgment, the most abstract truth is the most practical Whenever a true theory appears, it will be its own evidence Its test is, that it will explain all phenomena Now many are thought not only unexplained but inexplicable, as language, sleep, madness, dreams, <sup>40</sup> beasts, sex

Philosophically considered, the universe is composed of Nature and the Soul Strictly speaking, therefore, all that is separate from us, all which Philosophy distinguishes as the NOT ME, that is, both nature and art, all other men and my own body, must be ranked under this name, NATURE In enumerating the values of nature and casting up their sum, I shall use the word in both senses,—in its common and in its philosophical import. In inquiries so general as our present one, the inaccuracy is not material, no confusion of thought will occur. Nature, in the common sense, refers to essences unchanged by man, space, the air, the river, the leaf. Art is applied to the mixture of his will with the same things, as in a house, a canal, a statue, a picture. But his operations taken together are so insignificant, a little chipping, baking, patching, and washing, that in an impression so grand as that of the world on the human mind, they do not vary the result.

I NATURE

To go into solitude, a man needs to retire as much from his chamber as from society. I am not solitary whilst I read and write, though nobody is with me. But if a man would be alone, let him look at the stars. The rays that come from those heavenly worlds will separate between him and what he touches. One might think the atmosphere was made transparent with this design, to give man, in the heavenly bodies, the perpetual presence of the sublime. Seen in the streets of cities, how great they are! If the stars should appear one night in a thousand years, how would men believe and adore, and preserve for many generations the remembrance of the city of God which had been shown! But every night come out these envoys of beauty, and light the universe with their admonishing smile.

The stars awaken a certain reverence, because though always present, they are inaccessible, but all natural objects make a kindred impression, when the mind is open to their influence. Nature never wears a mean appearance. Neither does the wisest man extort her secret, and lose his curiosity by finding out all her perfection. Nature never became a toy to a wise spirit. The flowers, the animals, the mountains, reflected the wisdom of his best hour, as much as they had delighted the simplicity of his childhood.

When we speak of nature in this manner, we have a distinct but most poetical sense in the mind. We mean the integrity of impression made by manifold natural objects. It is this which distinguishes the stick of timber of the wood-cutter, from the tree of the poet. The charming landscape which I saw this morning is indubitably made up of some twenty or thirty farms. Miller owns this field, Locke that, and Manning the woodland beyond. But none of them owns the landscape. There is a property in the horizon which no man has but he whose eye can integrate all the parts, that is, the poet. This is the best part of these men's farms, yet to this their warranty-deeds give no title.

To speak truly, few adult persons can see nature. Most persons do not see the sun. At least they have a very superficial seeing. The sun illuminates only the eye of the man, but shines into the eye and the heart of the child. The lover of nature is he whose inward and outward senses are still truly adjusted to each other, who has retained the spirit of infancy even into the era of manhood. His intercourse with heaven and earth becomes part of his daily food. In the presence of nature a wild delight runs through the man, in spite of real sorrows. Nature says,—he is my creature, and maugre all his impertinent griefs, he shall be glad with me. Not the sun or the summer alone, but every hour and season yields its tribute of delight, for every hour and change corresponds to and authorizes a different state of the mind, from breathless noon to grimmest midnight. Nature is a setting that fits equally well a comic or a mourning piece. In good health, the air is a cordial of incredible virtue. Crossing a bare common, in snow puddles, at twilight, under a clouded sky, without having in my thoughts any occurrence of special good fortune, I have enjoyed a perfect exhilaration. I am glad to the brink of fear. In the woods, too, a man casts off his years, as the snake his slough, and at what period soever of life, is always a child. In the woods is perpetual youth. Within these plantations of God, a decorum and sanctity reign, a perennial festival is dressed, and the guest sees not how he should tire of them in a thousand years. In the woods, we return to reason and faith. There I feel that nothing can befall me in life,—no disgrace, no calamity (leaving me my eyes), which nature cannot repair. Standing on the bare ground,—my head bathed by the blithe air, and uplifted into infinite space,—all mean egotism vanishes. I become a transparent eye-ball, I am nothing, I see all, the currents of the Universal Being circulate through me, I am part or parcel of God 'The name of the nearest friend sounds then foreign and accidental' to be brothers, to be acquaintances, —master or servant, is then a trifle and a disturbance I am the lover of uncontained and immortal beauty In the wilderness, I find something more dear and connate than in streets or villages In the tranquil landscape, and especially in the distant line of the horizon, man beholds somewhat as beautiful as his own nature

The greatest delight which the fields and woods minister is the suggestion of an occult relation between man and the vegetable I am not alone and unacknowledged They nod to me, and I to them The waving of the boughs in the storm is new to me and old It takes me by surprise, and yet is not unknown Its effect is like that of a higher thought or a better emotion coming over me, when I deemed I was thinking justly or doing right

Yet it is certain that the power to produce this delight does not reside in nature, but in man, or in a harmony of both It is necessary to use these pleasures with great temperance For nature is not always tricked in holiday attire, but the same scene which yesterday breathed perfume and glittered as for the frolic of the nymphs, is over-spread with melancholy to-day Nature always wears the colors of the spirit To a man laboring under calamity, the heat of his own fire hath sadness in it Then there is a kind of contempt of the landscape felt by him who has just lost by death a dear friend The sky is less grand as it shuts down over less worth in the population

2. COMMODITY

Whoever considers the final cause of the world will discern a multitude of uses that enter as parts into that result They all admit of being thrown into one of the following classes Commodity, Beauty, Language, and Discipline

Under the general name of commodity, I rank all those advantages which our senses owe to nature This, of course, is a benefit which is temporary and mediate, not ultimate, like its service to the soul Yet although low, it is perfect in its kind, and is the only use of nature which all men apprehend The misery of man appears like childish petulance, when we explore the steady and prodigal provision that has been made for his support and delight on this green ball which floats him through the heavens. What angels invented these splendid ornaments, these rich conveniences, this ocean of air above, this ocean of water beneath, this firmament of earth between? this zodiac of lights, this tent of dropping clouds, this striped coat of climates, this fourfold year? Beasts, fire, water, stones, and corn serve him The field is at once his floor, his work-yard, his play-ground, his garden, and his bed

'More servants wait on man Than he'll take notice of'

Nature, in its ministry to man, is not only the material, but is also the process and the result All the parts incessantly work into each other's hands for the profit of man The wind sows the seed, the sun evaporates the sea, the wind blows the vapor to the field, the ice, on the other side of the planet, condenses rain on this, the rain feeds the plant, the plant feeds the animal, and thus the endless circulations of the divine charity nourish man

The useful arts are reproductions or new combinations by the wit of man, of the same natural benefactors He no longer waits for favoring gales, but by means of steam, he realizes the fable of Æolus's bag, and carries the two and thirty winds in the boiler of his boat To diminish friction, he paves the road with iron bars, and, mounting a coach with a ship-load of men, animals, and merchandise behind him, he darts through the country, from town to town, like an eagle or a swallow through the air By the aggregate of these aids, how is the face of the world changed, from the era of Noah to that of Napoleon! The private poor man hath cities, ships, canals, bridges, built for him He goes to the post-office, and the human race run on his errands, to the book-shop, and the human race read and write of all that happens, for him, to the court-house, and nations repair his wrongs He sets his house upon the road, and the human race go forth every morning, and shovel out the snow, and cut a path for him

But there is no need of specifying pariculars in this class of uses. The catalogue is endless, and the examples so obvious, that I shall leave them to the reader's reflection, with the general remark, that this mercenary benefit is one which has respect to a farther good. A man is fed, not that he may be fed, but that he may work.

3 BEAUTY

A nobler want of man is served by nature, namely, the love of Beauty.

The ancient Greeks called the world κόσμος, beauty. Such is the constitution of all things, or such the plastic power of the human eye, that the primary forms, as the sky, the mountain, the tree, the animal, give us a delight in and for themselves, a pleasure arising from outline, color, motion, and grouping. This seems partly owing to the eye itself. The eye is the best of artists. By the mutual action of its structure and of the laws of light, perspective is produced, which integrates every mass of objects, of what character soever, into a well colored and shaded globe, so that where the particular objects are mean and uninteresting, the landscape which they compose is round and symmetrical. And as the eye is the best composer, so light is the first of painters. There is no object so foul that intense light will not make beautiful. And the stimulus it affords to the sense, and a sort of infinitude which it hath, like space and time, make all matter gay. Even the corpse has its own beauty. But besides this general grace diffused over nature, almost all the individual forms are agreeable to the eye, as is proved by our endless imitations of some of them, as the acorn, the grape, the pine-cone, the wheat-ear, the egg, the wings and forms of most birds, the lion's claw, the serpent, the butterfly, sea-shells, flames, clouds, buds, leaves, and the forms of many trees, as the palm.

For better consideration, we may distribute the aspects of Beauty in a threefold manner.

1. First, the simple perception of natural forms is a delight. The influence of the forms and actions in nature is so needful to man, that, in its lowest functions, it seems to lie on the confines of commodity and beauty. To the body and mind which have been cramped by noxious work or company, nature is medicinal and restores their tone. The tradesman, the attorney comes out of the din and craft of the street and sees the sky and the woods, and is a man again. In their eternal calm, he finds himself. The health of the eye seems to demand a horizon. We are never tired, so long as we can see far enough.

But in other hours, Nature satisfies by its loveliness, and without any mixture of corporeal benefit. I see the spectacle of morning from the hill-top over against my house, from day-break to sun-rise, with emotions which an angel might share. The long slender bars of cloud float like fishes in the sea of crimson light. From the earth, as a shore, I look out into that silent sea. I seem to partake its rapid transformations, the active enchantment reaches my dust, and I dilate and conspire with the morning wind. How does Nature deify us with a few and cheap elements! Give me health and a day and I will make the pomp of emperors ridiculous. The dawn is my Assyria, the sun-set and moon-rise my Paphos, and unimaginable realms of faerie, broad noon shall be my England of the senses and the understanding, the night shall be my Germany of mystic philosophy and dreams.

Not less excellent, except for our less susceptibility in the afternoon, was the charm, last evening, of a January sun-set. The western clouds divided and subdivided themselves into pink flakes modulated with tints of unspeakable softness, and the air had so much life and sweetness that it was a pain to come within doors. What was it that nature would say? Was there no meaning in the live repose of the valley behind the mill, and which Homer or Shakspeare could not re-form for me in words? The leafless trees become spires of flame in the sun-set, with the blue east for their background, and the stars of the dead calices of flowers, and every withered stem and stubble rined with frost, contribute something to the mute music.

The inhabitants of cities suppose that the country landscape is pleasant only half the year. I please myself with the graces of the winter scenery, and believe that we are as much touched by it as by the genial influences of summer. To the attentive eye, each moment of the year has its own beauty, and in the same field, it beholds, every hour, a picture which was never seen before, and which shall never be seen again. The heavens change every moment, and reflect their glory or gloom on the plains beneath. The state of the crop in the surrounding farms alters the expression of the earth from week to week. The succession of native plants in the pastures and roadsides, which makes the silent clock by which time tells the summer hours, will make even the divisions of the day sensible to a keen observer. The tribes of birds and insects, like the plants 10 punctual to their time, follow each other, and the year has room for all. By water-courses, the variety is greater. In July, the blue pontederia or pickerel-weed blooms in large beds in the shallow parts of our pleasant river, and swarms with yellow butterflies in continual motion. Art cannot rival this pomp of purple and gold. Indeed the river is a perpetual gala, and boasts each month a new ornament.

But this beauty of Nature which is seen and felt as beauty, is the least part. The shows of day, the dewy morning, the rainbow, mountains, orchards in blossom, stars, moonlight, shadows in still water, and the like, if too eagerly hunted, become shows merely, and mock us with their unreality. Go out of the house to see the moon, and 't is mere unseel, it will not please as 30 when its light shines upon your necessary journey. The beauty that shimmers in the yellow afternoons of October, who ever could clutch it? Go forth to find it, and it is gone, 't is only a mirage as you look from the windows of diligence.

2 The presence of a higher, namely, of the spiritual element is essential to its perfection. The high and divine beauty which can be loved without effeminacy, is that 40 which is found in combination with the human will. Beauty is the mark God sets upon virtue. Every natural action is graceful. Every heroic act is also decent, and causes the place and the bystanders to shine. We are taught by great actions that the universe is the property of every individual in it. Every rational creature has all nature for his dowry and estate. It is his, if he will. He may divest himself of it, he may 50 creep into a corner, and abdicate his kingdom, as most men do, but he is entitled to the world by his constitution. In proportion to the energy of his thought and will, he takes up the world into himself. 'All those things for which men plough, build, or sail, obey virtue', said Sallust. 'The winds and waves,' said Gibbon, 'are always on the side of the ablest navigators.' So are the sun and moon and all the stars of heaven. When a noble act is done,—perchance in a scene of great natural beauty, when Leonidas and his three hundred martyrs consume one day in dying, and the sun and moon come each and look at them once 10 in the steep defile of Thermopylae, when Arnold Winkelried, in the high Alps, under the shadow of the avalanche, gathers in his side a sheaf of Austrian spears to break the line for his comrades, are not these heroes entitled to add the beauty of the scene to the beauty of the deed? When the bark of Columbus nears the shore of America,—before it, the beach lined with savages, fleeing out of all their huts of cane, the sea behind, and the purple mountains of the Indian Archipelago around, can we separate the man from the living picture? Does not the New World clothe his form with her palm-groves and savannahs as fit drapery? Ever does natural beauty steal in like air, and envelope great actions. When Sir Harry Vane was dragged up the Tower-hill, sitting on a sled, to suffer death as the champion of the English laws, one of the multitude cried out to him, 'You never sate on so glorious a seat!' Charles II, to intimidate the citizens of London, caused the patriot Lord Russell to be drawn in an open coach through the principal streets of the city on his way to the scaffold. 'But,' his biographer says, 'the multitude imagined they saw liberty and virtue sitting by his side.' In private places, among sordid ob- 40 jects, an act of truth or heroism seems at once to draw to itself the sky as its temple, the sun as its candle. Nature stretches out her arms to embrace man, only let his thoughts be of equal greatness. Willingly does she follow his steps with the rose and the violet, and bend her lines of grandeur and grace to the decoration of her darling child. Only let his thoughts be of equal scope, and the frame will suit the picture. 50 A virtuous man is in unison with her works, and makes the central figure of the visible sphere. Homer, Pindar, Socrates, Phocion, associate themselves fitly in our memory with the geography and climate of Greece. The visible heavens and earth sympathize with Jesus. And in common life whosoever has seen a person of powerful character and happy genius, will have remarked how easily he took all things along with him,—the persons, the opinions, and the day, and nature became ancillary to a man.

3 There is still another aspect under which the beauty of the world may be viewed, namely, as it becomes an object of the intellect. Beside the relation of things to virtue, they have a relation to thought. The intellect searches out the absolute order of things as they stand in the mind of God, and without the colors of affection. The intellectual and the active powers seem to succeed each other, and the exclusive activity of the one generates the exclusive activity of the other. There is something unfriendly in each to the other, but they are like the alternate periods of feeding and working in animals, each prepares and will be followed by the other. Therefore does beauty, which, in relation to actions, as we have seen, comes unsought, and comes because it is unsought, remain for the apprehension and pursuit of the intellect, and then again, in its turn, of the active power. Nothing divine dies. All good is eternally reproductive. The beauty of nature re-forms itself in the mind, and not for barren contemplation, but for new creation.

All men are in some degree impressed by the face of the world, some men even to delight. This love of beauty is Taste. Others have the same love in such excess, that, not content with admiring, they seek to embody it in new forms. The creation of beauty is Art.

The production of a work of art throws a light upon the mystery of humanity. A work of art is an abstract or epitome of the world. It is the result or expression of nature, in miniature. For although the works of nature are innumerable and all different, the result or the expression of them all is similar and single. Nature is a sea of forms radically alike and even unique. A leaf, a sun-beam, a landscape, the ocean, make an analogous impression on the mind. What is common to them all,—that perfectness and harmony, is beauty. The standard of beauty is the entire circuit of natural forms,—the totality of nature, which the Italians expressed by defining beauty 'il piu nell' uno.' Nothing is quite beautiful alone, nothing but is beautiful in the whole. A single object is only so far beautiful as it suggests this universal grace. The poet, the painter, the sculptor, the musician, the architect, seek each to concentrate this radiance of the world on one point, and each in his several work to satisfy the love of beauty which stimulates him to produce. Thus is Art a nature passed through the alembic of man. Thus in art does Nature work through the will of a man filled with the beauty of her first works.

The world thus exists to the soul to satisfy the desire of beauty. This element I call an ultimate end. No reason can be asked or given why the soul seeks beauty. Beauty, in its largest and profoundest sense, is one expression for the universe. God is the all-fair. Truth, and goodness, and beauty, are but different faces of the same. All. But beauty in nature is not ultimate. It is the herald of inward and eternal beauty, and is not alone a solid and satisfactory good. It must stand as a part, and not as yet the last or highest expression of the final cause of Nature.

4 LANGUAGE

Language is a third use which Nature subserves to man. Nature is the vehicle of thought, and in a simple, double, and three-fold degree.

1. Words are signs of natural facts.

2. Particular natural facts are symbols of particular spiritual facts.

3. Nature is the symbol of spirit.

1. Words are signs of natural facts. The use of natural history is to give us aid in supernatural history, the use of the outer creation, to give us language for the beings and changes of the inward creation. Every word which is used to express a moral or intellectual fact, if traced to its root, is found to be borrowed from some material appearance. Right means straight, wrong means twisted. Spirit primarily means wind, transgression, the crossing of a line, supercilious, the raising of the eyebrow. We say the heart to express emotion, the head to denote thought, and thought and emotion are words borrowed from sensible things, and now appropriated to spiritual nature. Most of the process by which this transformation is made, is hidden from us in the remote time when language was framed, but the same tendency may be daily observed in children. Children and savages use only nouns or names of things, which they convert into verbs, and apply to analogous mental acts.

2 But this origin of all words that convey a spiritual import,—so conspicuous a fact in the history of language,—is our least debt to nature. It is not words only that are emblematic, it is things which are emblematic. Every natural fact is a symbol of some spiritual fact. Every appearance in nature corresponds to some state of the mind, and that state of the mind can only be described by presenting that natural appearance as its picture. An enraged man is a lion, a cunning man is a fox, a firm man is a rock, a learned man is a torch. A lamb is innocence, a snake is subtle spite, flowers express to us the delicate affections. Light and darkness are our familiar expression for knowledge and ignorance, and heat for love. Visible distance behind and before us, is respectively our image of memory and hope.

Who looks upon a river in a meditative hour and is not reminded of the flux of all things? Throw a stone into the stream, and the circles that propagate themselves are the beautiful type of all influence. Man is conscious of a universal soul within or behind his individual life, wherein, as in a firmament, the natures of Justice, Truth, Love, Freedom, arise and shine. This universal soul he calls Reason. It is not mine, or thine, or his, but we are its, we are its property and men. And the blue sky in which the private earth is buried, the sky with its eternal calm, and full of everlasting orbs, is the type of Reason. That which intellectually considered we call Reason, considered in relation to nature, we call Spirit. Spirit is the Creator. Spirit hath life in itself. And man in all ages and countries embodies it in his language as the FATHER.

It is easily seen that there is nothing lucky or capricious in these analogies, but that they are constant, and pervade nature. These are not the dreams of a few poets, here and there, but man is an analogist, and studies relations in all objects. He is placed in the centre of beings, and a ray of relation passes from every other being to him. And neither can man be understood without these objects, nor these objects without man. All the facts in natural history taken by themselves, have no value, but are barren, like a single sex. But marry it to human history, and it is full of life. Whole florae, all Linnæus' and Buffon's volumes, are dry catalogues of facts, but the most trivial of these facts, the habit of a plant, the organs, or work, or noise of an insect, applied to the illustration of a fact in intellectual philosophy, or in any way associated to human nature, affects us in the most lively and agreeable manner. The seed of a plant,—to what affecting analogies in the nature of man is that little fruit made use of, in all discourse, up to the voice of Paul, who calls the human corpse a seed,—'It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.' The motion of the earth round its axis and round the sun, makes the day and the year. These are certain amounts of brute light and heat. But is there no intent of an analogy between man's life and the seasons? And do the seasons gain no grandeur or pathos from that analogy? The instincts of the ant are very unimportant considered as the ant's, but the moment a ray of relation is seen to extend from it to man, and the little drudge is seen to be a monitor, a little body with a mighty heart, then all its habits, even that said to be recently observed, that it never sleeps, become sublime.

Because of this radical correspondence between visible things and human thoughts, savages, who have only what is necessary, converse in figures. As we go back in history, language becomes more picturesque, until its infancy, when it is all poetry, or all spiritual facts are represented by natural symbols. The same symbols are found to make the original elements of all languages. It has moreover been observed, that the idioms of all languages approach each other in passages of the greatest eloquence and power. And as this is the first language, so is it the last. This immediate dependence of language upon nature, this conversion of an outward phenomenon into a type of somewhat in human life, never loses its power to affect us. It is this which gives that piquancy to the conversation of a strong-natured farmer or backwoodsman, which all men relish.

A man's power to connect his thought with its proper symbol, and so to utter it, depends on the simplicity of his character, that is, upon his love of truth and his desire to communicate it without loss. The corruption of man is followed by the corruption of language. When simplicity of character and the sovereignty of ideas is broken up by the prevalence of secondary desires, the desire of riches, of pleasure, of power, and of praise,—and duplicity and falsehood take place of simplicity and truth, the power over nature as an interpreter of the will is in a degree lost, new imagery ceases to be created, and old words are perverted to stand for things which are not, a paper currency is employed, when there is no bullion in the vaults. In due time the fraud is manifest, and words lose all power to stimulate the understanding or the affections. Hundreds of writers may be found in every long-civilized nation who for a short time believe and make others believe that they see and utter truths, who do not of themselves clothe one thought in its natural garment, but who feed unconsciously on the language created by the primary writers of the country, those, namely, who hold primarily on nature.

But wise men pierce this rotten diction and fasten words again to visible things, so that picturesque language is at once a commanding certificate that he who employs it is a man in alliance with truth and God. The moment our discourse rises above the ground line of familiar facts and is inflamed with passion or exalted by thought, it clothes itself in images. A man conversing in earnest, if he watch his intellectual processes, will find that a material image more or less luminous arises in his mind, contemporaneous with every thought, which furnishes the vestment of the thought. Hence, good writing and brilliant discourse are perpetual allegories. This imagery is spontaneous. It is the blending of experience with the present action of the mind. It is proper creation. It is the working of the Original Cause through the instruments he has already made.

These facts may suggest the advantage which the country-life possesses, for a powerful mind, over the artificial and curtailed life of cities. We know more from nature than we can at will communicate. Its light flows into the mind evermore, and we forget its presence. The poet, the orator, bred in the woods, whose senses have been nourished by their fair and appeasing changes, year after year, without design and without heed,—shall not lose their lesson altogether, in the roar of cities or the broil of politics. Long hereafter, amidst agitation and terror in national councils,—in the hour of revolution,—these solemn images shall reappear in their morning lustre, as fit symbols and words of the thoughts which the passing events shall awaken. At the call of a noble sentiment, again the woods wave, the pines murmur, the river rolls and shunes, and the cattle low upon the mountains, as he saw and heard them in his infancy. And with these forms, the spells of persuasion, the keys of power are put into his hands.

3 We are thus assisted by natural objects in the expression of particular meanings. But how great a language to convey such pepper-corn informations! Did it need such noble races of creatures, this profusion of forms, this host of orbs in heaven, to furnish man with the dictionary and grammar of his municipal speech? Whilst we use this grand cipher to expedite the affairs of our pot and kettle, we feel that we have not yet put it to its use, neither are able. We are like travellers using the cinders of a volcano to roast their eggs. Whilst we see that it always stands ready to clothe what we would say, we cannot avoid the question whether the characters are not significant of themselves. Have mountains, and waves, and skies, no significance but what we consciously give them when we employ them as emblems of our thoughts? The world is emblematic. Parts of speech are metaphors, because the whole of nature is a metaphor of the human mind. The laws of moral nature answer to those of matter as face to face in a glass. 'The visible world and the relation of its parts, is the dial plate of the invisible.' The axioms of physics translate the laws of ethics. Thus, 'the whole is greater than its part', 'reaction is equal to action', 'the smallest weight may be made to lift the greatest, the difference of weight being compensated by time', and many the like propositions, which have an ethical as well as physical sense. These propositions have a much more extensive and universal sense when applied to human life, than when confined to technical use

In like manner, the memorable words of history and the proverbs of nations consist usually of a natural fact, selected as a picture or parable of a moral truth. Thus, A rolling stone gathers no moss, A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, A cripple in the right way will beat a racer in the wrong, Make hay while the sun shines, 'T is hard to carry a full cup even, Vinegar is the son of wine, The last ounce broke the camel's back, Long-lived trees make roots first,—and the like. In their primary sense these are trivial facts, but we repeat them for the value of their analogical import. What is true of proverbs, is true of all fables, parables, and allegories.

This relation between the mind and matter is not fancied by some poet, but stands in the will of God, and so is free to be known by all men. It appears to men, or it does not appear. When in fortunate hours we ponder this miracle, the wise man doubts if at all other times he is not blind and deaf,

'Can these things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud, Without our special wonder?'

for the universe becomes transparent, and the light of higher laws than its own shines through it. It is the standing problem which has exercised the wonder and the study of every fine genius since the world began, from the era of the Egyptians and the Brahmans to that of Pythagoras, of Plato, of Bacon, of Leibnitz, of Swedenborg. There sits the Sphinx at the roadside, and from age to age, as each prophet comes by, he tries his fortune at reading her riddle. There seems to be a necessity in spirit to manifest itself in material forms, and day and night, river and storm, beast and bird, acid and alkali, preexist in necessary Ideas in the mind of God, and are what they are by virtue of preceding affections in the world of spirit. A Fact is the end or last issue of spirit. The visible creation is the terminus or the circumference of the invisible world. 'Material objects,' said a French philosopher, 'are necessarily kinds of scoriae of the substantial thoughts of the Creator, which must always preserve an exact relation to their first origin, in other words, visible nature must have a spiritual and moral side.'

This doctrine is abstruse, and though the images of 'garment,' 'scoriae,' 'mirror,' &c., may stimulate the fancy, we must summon the aid of subtler and more vital expositors to make it plain. 'Every scripture is to be interpreted by the same spirit which gave it forth,'—is the fundamental law of criticism. A life in harmony with Nature, the love of truth and of virtue, will purge the eyes to understand her text. By degrees we may come to know the primitive sense of the permanent objects of nature, so that the world shall be to us an open book, and every form significant of its hidden life and final cause.

A new interest surprises us, whilst, under the view now suggested, we contemplate the fearful extent and multitude of objects, since 'every object rightly seen, unlocks a new faculty of the soul.' That which was unconscious truth, becomes, when interpreted and defined in an object, a part of the domain of knowledge,—a new weapon in the magazine of power.

5 DISCIPLINE

In view of the significance of nature, we arrive at once at a new fact, that nature is a discipline. This use of the world includes the preceding uses, as parts of itself.

Space, time, society, labor, climate, food, locomotion, the animals, the mechanical forces, give us sincerest lessons, day by day, whose meaning is unlimited. They educate both the Understanding and the Reason. Every property of matter is a school for the understanding,—its solidity or resistance, its inertia, its extension, its figure, its divisibility. The understanding adds, divides, combines, measures, and finds nutriment and room for its activity in this worthy scene. Meantime, Reason transfers all these lessons into its own world of thought, by perceiving the analogy that marries Matter and Mind.

I. Nature is a discipline of the understanding in intellectual truths. Our dealing with sensible objects is a constant exercise in the necessary lessons of difference, of likeness, of order, of being and seeming, of progressive arrangement, of ascent from particular to general, of combination to one end of manifold forces Proportioned to the importance of the organ to be formed, is the extreme care with which its tuition is provided,—a care pretermitted in no single case What tedious training, day after day, year after year, never ending, to form the common sense, what continual reproduction of annoyances, inconveniences, dilemmas; what rejoicing over us of little men; what disputing of prices, what reckonings of interest,—and all to form the Hand of the mind,—to instruct us that ‘good thoughts are no better than good dreams, unless they be executed!’

The same good office is performed by Property and its filial systems of debt and credit Debt, grinding debt, whose iron face the widow, the orphan, and the sons of genius fear and hate,—debt, which consumes so much time, which so cripples and disheartens a great spirit with cares that seem so base, is a preceptor whose lessons cannot be forgone, and is needed most by those who suffer from it most Moreover, property, which has been well compared to snow,—‘if it fall level to-day, it will be blown into drifts to-morrow,’—is the surface action of internal machinery, like the index on the face of a clock Whilst now it is the gymnastics of the understanding, it is hiving, in the foresight of the spirit, experience in profounder laws

The whole character and fortune of the individual are affected by the least inequalities in the culture of the understanding, for example, in the perception of differences Therefore is Space, and therefore Time, that man may know that things are not huddled and lumped, but sundered and individual A bell and a plough have each their use, and neither can do the office of the other Water is good to drink, coal to burn, wool to wear, but wool cannot be drunk, nor water spun, nor coal eaten The wise man shows his wisdom in separation, in gradation, and his scale of creatures and of merits is as wide as nature The foolish have no range in their scale, but suppose every man is as every other man What is not good they call the worst, and what is not hateful, they call the best

In like manner, what good heed Nature forms in us! She pardons no mistakes Her yea is yea, and her nay, nay

omy, Zoology (those first steps which the farmer, the hunter, and the sailor take), teach that Nature’s dice are always loaded, that in her heaps and rubbish are concealed sure and useful results.

How calmly and genially the mind apprehends one after another the laws of physics! What noble emotions dilate the mortal as he enters into the counsels of the creation, and feels by knowledge the privilege to BE! His insight refines him The beauty of nature shines in his own breast Man is greater than he can see this, and the universe less, because Time and Space relations vanish as laws are known

Here again we are impressed and even daunted by the immense Universe to be explored ‘What we know is a point to what we do not know’ Open any recent journal of science, and weigh the problems suggested concerning Light, Heat, Electricity, Magnetism, Physiology, Geology, and judge whether the interest of natural science is likely to be soon exhausted

Passing by many particulars of the discipline of nature, we must not omit to specify two

The exercise of the Will, or the lesson of power, is taught in every event From the child’s successive possession of his several senses up to the hour when he saith, ‘Thy will be done!’ he is learning the secret that he can reduce under his will, not only particular events but great classes, nay, the whole series of events, and so conform all facts to his character Nature is thoroughly mediate It is made to serve It receives the dominion of man as meekly as the ass on which the Saviour rode It offers all its kingdoms to man as the raw material which he may mould into what is useful Man is never weary of working it up He forges the subtle and delicate air into wise and melodious words, and gives them wing as angels of persuasion and command One after another his victorious thought comes up with and reduces all things, until the world becomes at last only a realized will,—the double of the man

2 Sensible objects conform to the premonitions of Reason and reflect the conscience All things are moral, and in their boundless changes have an unceasing reference to spiritual nature Therefore is nature glorious with form, color, and motion—that every globe in the remotest heaven, every chemical change from the rudest crystal up to the laws of life, every change of vegetation from the first principle of growth in the eye of a leaf, to the tropical forest and antediluvian coal-mine, every animal function from the sponge up to Hercules, shall hint or thunder to man the laws of right and wrong, and echo the Ten Commandments. Therefore is Nature ever the ally of Religion—lends all her pomp and riches to the religious sentiment. Prophet and priest, David, Isaiah, Jesus, have drawn deeply from this source. This ethical character so penetrates the bone and marrow of nature, as to seem the end for which it was made. Whatever private purpose is answered by any member or part, this is its public and universal function, and is never omitted. Nothing in nature is exhausted in its first use. When a thing has served an end to the uttermost, it is wholly new for an ulterior service. In God, every end is converted into a new means. Thus the use of commodity, regarded by itself, is mean and squalid. But it is to the mind an education in the doctrine of Use, namely, that a thing is good only so far as it serves, that a conspiring of parts and efforts to the production of an end is essential to any being. The first and gross manifestation of this truth is our inevitable and hated training in values and wants, in corn and meat.

It has already been illustrated, that every natural process is a version of a moral sentence. The moral law lies at the centre of nature and radiates to the circumference. It is the pith and marrow of every substance, every relation, and every process. All things with which we deal, preach to us. What is a farm but a mute gospel? The chaff and the wheat, weeds and plants, blight, rain, insects, sun,—it is a sacred emblem from the first furrow of spring to the last stack which the snow of winter overtakes in the fields. But the sailor, the shepherd, the miner, the merchant, in their several resorts, have each an experience precisely parallel, and leading to the same conclusion, because all organizations are radically alike. Nor can it be doubted that this moral sentiment which thus scents the air, grows in the grain, and impregnates the waters of the world, is caught by man and sinks into his soul. The moral influence of nature upon every individual is that amount of truth which it illustrates to him. Who can estimate this? Who can guess how much firmness the sea-beaten rock has taught the fisherman? how much tranquillity has been reflected to man from the azure sky, over whose unspotted deeps the winds forevermore drive flocks of stormy clouds, and leave no wrinkle or stain? how much industry and providence and affection we have caught from the pantomime of brutes? What a searching preacher of self-command is the varying phenomenon of Health!

Herein is especially apprehended the unity of Nature,—the unity in variety,—which meets us everywhere. All the endless variety of things make an identical impression. Xenophanes complained in his old age, that, look where he would, all things hastened back to Unity. He was weary of seeing the same entity in the tedious variety of forms. The fable of Proteus has a cordial truth. A leaf, a drop, a crystal, a moment of time, is related to the whole, and partakes of the perfection of the whole. Each particle is a microcosm, and faithfully renders the likeness of the world.

Not only resemblances exist in things whose analogy is obvious, as when we detect the type of the human hand in the flipper of the fossil saurus, but also in objects wherein there is great superficial unlikeness. Thus architecture is called 'frozen music,' by De Stael and Goethe. Vitruvius thought an architect should be a musician. 'A Gothic church,' said Coleridge, 'is a petrified religion.' Michael Angelo maintained that, to an architect, a knowledge of anatomy is essential. In Haydn's oratorios, the notes present to the imagination not only motions, as of the snake, the stag, and the elephant, but colors also, as the green grass. The law of harmonic sounds reappears in the harmonic colors. The granite is differenced in its laws only by the more or less of heat from the river that wears it away. The river, as it flows, resembles the air that flows over it, the air resembles the light which traverses it with more subtle currents, the light resembles the heat which rides with it through Space. Each creature is only a modification of the other, the likeness in them is more than the difference, and their radical law is one and the same. A rule of one art, or a law of one organization, holds true throughout nature. So intimate is this Unity, that, it is easily seen, it lies under the undermost garment of nature, and betrays its source in Universal Spirit. For it pervades Thought also. Every universal truth which we express in words, implies or supposes every other truth. Omne verum vero consonat. It is like a great circle on a sphere, comprising all possible circles, which, however, may be drawn and comprise it in like manner. Every such truth is the absolute Ens seen from one side. But it has innumerable sides.

The central Unity is still more conspicuous in actions. Words are finite organs of the infinite mind. They cannot cover the dimensions of what is in truth. They break, chop, and impoverish it. An action is the perfection and publication of thought. A right action seems to fill the eye, and to be related to all nature. 'The wise man, in doing one thing, does all, or, in the one thing he does rightly, he sees the likeness of all which is done rightly.'

Words and actions are not the attributes of brute nature. They introduce us to the human form, of which all other organizations appear to be degradations. When this appears among so many that surround it, the spirit prefers it to all others. It says, 'From such as this have I drawn joy and knowledge, in such as this have I found and beheld myself, I will speak to it, it can speak again, it can yield me thought already formed and alive.' In fact, the eye,—the mind,—is always accompanied by these forms, male and female, and these are incomparably the richest informations of the power and order that lie at the heart of things. Unfortunately every one of them bears the marks as of some injury, is marred and superficially defective. Nevertheless, far different from the deaf and dumb nature around them, these all rest like fountain-pipes on the unfathomed sea of thought and virtue whereto they alone, of all organizations, are the entrances.

It were a pleasant inquiry to follow into detail their ministry to our education, but where would it stop? We are associated in adolescent and adult life with some friends, who, like skies and waters, are coextensive with our idea; who, answering each to a certain affection of the soul, satisfy our desire on that side, whom we lack power to put at such focal distance from us, that we can mend or even analyze them. We cannot choose but love them. When much intercourse with a friend has supplied us with a standard of excellence, and has increased our respect for the resources of God who thus sends a real person to outgo our ideal, when he has, moreover, become an object of thought, and, whilst his character retains all its unconscious effect, is converted in the mind into solid and sweet wisdom,—it is a sign to us that his office is closing, and he is commonly withdrawn from our sight in a short time.

6 IDEALISM

Thus is the unspeakable but intelligible and practicable meaning of the world conveyed to man, the immortal pupil, in every object of sense. To this one end of Discipline, all parts of nature conspire.

A noble doubt perpetually suggests itself,—whether this end be not the Final Cause of the Universe, and whether nature outwardly exists. It is a sufficient account of that Appearance we call the World, that God will teach a human mind, and so makes it the receiver of a certain number of congruent sensations, which we call sun and moon, man and woman, house and trade. In my utter impotence to test the authenticity of the report of my senses, to know whether the impressions they make on me correspond with outlying objects, what difference does it make, whether Orion is up there in heaven, or some god paints the image in the firmament of the soul? The relations of parts and the end of the whole remaining the same, what is the difference, whether land and sea interact, and worlds revolve and intermingle without number or end,—deep yawning under deep, and galaxy balancing galaxy, throughout absolute space,—or whether, without relations of time and space, the same appearances are inscribed in the constant faith of man? Whether nature enjoy a substantial existence without, or is only in the apocalypse of the mind, it is alike useful and alike venerable to me. Be it what it may, it is ideal to me so long as I cannot try the accuracy of my senses.

The frivolous make themselves merry with the Ideal theory, as if its consequences were burlesque, as if it affected the stability of nature. It surely does not. God never jests with us, and will not compromise the end of nature by permitting any inconsequence in its procession. Any distrust of the permanence of laws would paralyze the faculties of man. Their permanence is sacredly respected, and his faith therein is perfect. The wheels and springs of man are all set to the hypothesis of the permanence of nature. We are not built like a ship to be tossed, but like a house to stand. It is a natural consequence of this structure, that so long as the active powers predominate over the reflective, we resist with indignation any hint that nature is more short-lived or mutable than spirit. The broker, the wheelwright, the carpenter, the tollman, are much displeased at the intimation.

But whilst we acquiesce entirely in the permanence of natural laws, the question of the absolute existence of nature still remains open. It is the uniform effect of culture on the human mind, not to shake our faith in the stability of particular phenomena, as of heat, water, azote, but to lead us to regard nature as phenomenon, not a substance, to attribute necessary existence to spirit, to esteem nature as an accident and an effect.

To the senses and the unrenewed understanding, belongs a sort of instinctive belief in the absolute existence of nature. In their view man and nature are indissolubly joined. Things are ultimates, and they never look beyond their sphere. The presence of Reason mars this faith. The first effort of thought tends to relax this despotism of the senses which binds us to nature as if we were a part of it, and shows us nature aloof, and, as it were, afloat. Until this higher agency intervened, the animal eye sees, with wonderful accuracy, sharp outlines and colored surfaces. When the eye of Reason opens, to outline and surface are at once added grace and expression. These proceed from imagination and affection, and abate somewhat of the angular distinctness of objects. If the Reason be stimulated to more earnest vision, outlines and surfaces become transparent, and are no longer seen, causes and spirits are seen through them. The best moments of life are these delicious awakenings of the higher powers, and the reverential withdrawing of nature before its God.

Let us proceed to indicate the effects of culture.

1 Our first institution in the Ideal philosophy is a hint from Nature herself.

Nature is made to conspire with spirit to emancipate us. Certain mechanical changes, a small alteration in our local position, apprizes us of a dualism. We are strangely affected by seeing the shore from a moving ship, from a balloon, or through the tints of an unusual sky. The least change in our point of view gives the whole world a pictorial air. A man who seldom rides, needs only to get into a coach and traverse his own town, to turn the street into a puppet-show. The men, the women,—talking, running, bartering, fighting,—the earnest mechanic, the loungee, the beggar, the boys, the dogs, are unrealized at once, or, at least, wholly detached from all relation to the observer, and seen as apparent, not substantial beings. What new thoughts are suggested by seeing a face of country quite familiar, in the rapid movement of the railroad car! Nay, the most wonted objects, (make a very slight change in the point of vision,) please us most. In a camera obscura, the butcher's cart, and the figure of one of our own family amuse us. So a portrait of a well-known face gratifies us. Turn the eyes upside down, by looking at the landscape through your legs, and how agreeable is the picture, though you have seen it any time these twenty years!

In these cases, by mechanical means, is suggested the difference between the observer and the spectacle,—between man and nature. Hence arises a pleasure mixed with awe, I may say, a low degree of the sublime is felt, from the fact, probably, that man is hereby apprised that whilst the world is a spectacle, something in himself is stable.

2 In a higher manner the poet communicates the same pleasure. By a few strokes he delineates, as on air, the sun, the mountain, the camp, the city, the hero, the maiden, not different from what we know them, but only lifted from the ground and afloat before the eye. He unfixes the land and the sea, makes them revolve around the axis of his primary thought, and disposes them anew. Possessed himself by a heroic passion, he uses matter as symbols of it. The sensual man conforms thoughts to things; the poet conforms things to his thoughts. The one esteems nature as rooted and fast, the other, as fluid, and impresses his being thereon. To him, the refractory world is ductile and flexible, he invests dust and stones with humanity, and makes them the words of the Reason. The Imagination may be defined to be the use which the Reason makes of the material world. Shakespeare possesses the power of subordinating nature for the purposes of expression, beyond all poets. His imperial muse tosses the creation like a bauble from hand to hand, and uses it to embody any caprice of thought that is uppermost in his mind. The remotest spaces of nature are visited, and the farthest sundered things are brought together, by a subtle spiritual connection. We are made aware that magnitude of material things is relative, and all objects shrink and expand to serve the passion of the poet. Thus in his sonnets, the lays of birds, the scents and dyes of flowers he finds to be the shadow of his beloved, time, which keeps her from him, is his chest, the suspicion she has awakened, is her ornament.

'The ornament of beauty is Suspect, A crow which flies in heaven's sweetest air.'

His passion is not the fruit of chance, it swells, as he speaks, to a city, or a state.

'No, it was builded far from accident, It suffers not in smiling pomp, nor falls Under the brow of thralling discontent, It fears not policy, that heretic, That works on leases of short numbered hours,
But all alone stands hugely politic.'

In the strength of his constancy, the Pyramids seem to him recent and transitory. The freshness of youth and love dazzles him with its resemblance to morning.

'Take those lips away Which so sweetly were forsworn;
And those eyes,—the break of day, Lights that do mislead the morn.'

The wild beauty of this hyperbole, I may say in passing, it would not be easy to match in literature.

This transfiguration which all material objects undergo through the passion of the poet,—this power which he exerts to dwarf the great, to magnify the small,—might be illustrated by a thousand examples from his Plays. I have before me The Tempest, and will cite only these few lines.

'ARIEL The strong based promontory Have I made shake, and by the spurs plucked up
The pine and cedar.'

Prospero calls for music to soothe the frantic Alonzo, and his companions.

'A solemn air, and the best comforter To an unsettled fancy, cure thy brains Now useless, boiled within thy skull.'

Again

'The charm dissolves apace,
And, as the morning steals upon the night, Melting the darkness, so their rising senses Begin to chase the ignorant fumes that mantle
Their clearer reason
Their understanding Begins to swell and the approaching tide Will shortly fill the reasonable shores That now lie foul and muddy.'

The perception of real affinities between events (that is to say, of ideal affinities, for those only are real), enables the poet thus to make free with the most imposing forms and phenomena of the world, and to assert the predominance of the soul.

3 Whilst thus the poet animates nature with his own thoughts, he differs from the philosopher only herein, that the one proposes Beauty as his main end, the other Truth. But the philosopher, not less than the poet, postpones the apparent order and relations of things to the empire of thought. 'The problem of philosophy,' according to Plato, 'is, for all that exists conditionally, to find a ground unconditioned and absolute.' It proceeds on the faith that a law determines all phenomena, which being known, the phenomena can be predicted. That law, when in the mind, is an idea. Its beauty is infinite. The true philosopher and the true poet are one, and a beauty, which is truth, and a truth, which is beauty, is the aim of both. Is not the charm of one of Plato's or Aristotle's definitions strictly like that of the Antigone of Sophocles? It is, in both cases, that a spiritual life has been imparted to nature, that the solid seeming block of matter has been pervaded and dissolved by a thought, that this feeble human being has penetrated the vast masses of nature with an informing soul, and recognized itself in their harmony, that is, seized their law. In physics, when this is attained, the memory disburthens itself of its cumbrous catalogues of particulars, and carries centuries of observation in a single formula.

Thus even in physics, the material is degraded before the spiritual. The astronomer, the geometer, rely on their irrefragable analysis, and disdain the results of observation. The sublime remark of Euler on his law of arches, 'This will be found contrary to all experience, yet is true', had already transferred nature into the mind, and left matter like an outcast corpse.

4 Intellectual science has been observed to beget invariably a doubt of the existence of matter. Turgot said, 'He that has never doubted the existence of matter, may be assured he has no aptitude for metaphysical inquiries.' It fastens the attention upon immortal necessary uncreated natures, that is, upon Ideas, and in their presence we feel that the outward circumstance is a dream and a shade. Whilst we wait in this Olympus of gods, we think of nature as an appendix to the soul. We ascend into their region, and know that these are the thoughts of the Supreme Being. 'These are they who were set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When he prepared the heavens, they were there, when he established the clouds above, when he strengthened the fountains of the deep. Then they were by him, as one brought up with him. Of them took he counsel.'

Their influence is proportionate. As objects of science they are accessible to few men. Yet all men are capable of being raised by piety or by passion, into their region. And no man touches these divine natures, without becoming, in some degree, himself divine. Like a new soul, they renew the body. We become physically nimble and lightsome, we tread on air, life is no longer irksome, and we think it will never be so. No man fears age or misfortune or death in their serene company, for he is transported out of the district of change. Whilst we behold unveiled the nature of Justice and Truth, we learn the difference between the absolute and the conditional or relative. We apprehend the absolute. As it were, for the first time, we exist. We become immortal, for we learn that time and space are relations of matter, that with a perception of truth or a virtuous will they have no affinity.

5 Finally, religion and ethics, which may be fitly called the practice of ideas, or the introduction of ideas into life, have an analogous effect with all lower culture, in degrading nature and suggesting its dependence on spirit. Ethics and religion differ herein; that the one is the system of human duties commencing from man, the other, from God. Religion includes the personality of God, Ethics does not. They are one to our present design. They both put nature under foot. The first and last lesson of religion is, 'The things that are seen, are temporal, the things that are unseen, are eternal.' It puts an affront upon nature. It does that for the unschooled, which philosophy does for Berkeley and Viasa. The uniform language that may be heard in the churches of the most ignorant sects is,—'Contemn the unsubstantial shows of the world, they are vanities, dreams, shadows, unrealities, seek the realities of religion.' The devotee flouts nature. Some theosophists have arrived at a certain hostility and indignation towards matter, as the Manichean and Plotinus. They distrusted in themselves any looking back to these flesh-pots of Egypt. Plotinus was ashamed of his body. In short, they might all say of matter, what Michael Angelo said of external beauty, 'It is the frail and weary weed, in which God dresses the soul which he has called into time.'

It appears that motion, poetry, physical and intellectual science, and religion, all tend to affect our convictions of the reality of the external world. But I own there is something ungrateful in expanding too curiously the particulars of the general proposition, that all culture tends to imbue us with idealism. I have no hostility to nature, but a child's love to it. I expand and live in the warm day like corn and melons.

Let us speak her fair I do not wish to fling stones at my beautiful mother, nor soil my gentle nest I only wish to indicate the true position of nature in regard to man, wherein to establish man all right education tends, as the ground which to attain is the object of human life, that is, of man's connection with nature Culture inverts the vulgar views of nature, and brings the mind to call that apparent which it uses to call real, and that real which it uses to call visionary Children, it is true, believe in the external world The belief that it appears only, is an afterthought, but with culture this faith will as surely arise on the mind as did the first

The advantage of the ideal theory over the popular faith is this, that it presents the world in precisely that view which is most desirable to the mind It is, in fact, the view which Reason, both speculative and practical, that is, philosophy and virtue, take For seen in the light of thought, the world always is phenomenal, and virtue subordinates it to the mind Idealism sees the world in God It beholds the whole circle of persons and things, of actions and events, of country and religion, not as painfully accumulated, atom after atom, act after act, in an aged creeping Past, but as one vast picture which God paints on the instant eternity for the contemplation of the soul Therefore the soul holds itself off from a too trivial and microscopic study of the universal tablet It respects the end too much to immerse itself in the means It sees something more important in Christianity than the scandals of ecclesiastical history or the niceties of criticism, and, very incurious concerning persons or miracles, and not at all disturbed by chasms of historical evidence, it accepts from God the phenomenon, as it finds it, as the pure and awful form of religion in the world It is not hot and passionate at the appearance of what it calls its own good or bad fortune, at the union or opposition of other persons No man is its enemy It accepts whatsoever befalls, as part of its lesson It is a watcher more than a doer, and it is a doer, only that it may the better watch

7 SPIRIT

It is essential to a true theory of nature and of man, that it should contain somewhat progressive Uses that are exhausted or that may be, and facts that end in the statement, cannot be all that is true of this brave lodging wherein man is harbored, and wherein all his faculties find appropriate and endless exercise. And all the uses of nature admit of being summed in one, which yields the activity of man an infinite scope. Through all its kingdoms, to the suburbs and outskirts of things, it is faithful to the cause whence it had its origin It always speaks of Spirit It suggests the absolute It is a perpetual effect It is a great shadow pointing always to the sun behind us

The aspect of Nature is devout Like the figure of Jesus, she stands with bended head, and hands folded upon the breast. The happiest man is he who learns from nature the lesson of worship

Of that ineffable essence which we call Spirit, he that thinks most, will say least. We can foresee God in the coarse, and, as it were, distant phenomena of matter, but when we try to define and describe himself, both language and thought desert us, and we are as helpless as fools and savages That essence refuses to be recorded in propositions, but when man has worshipped him intellectually, the noblest ministry of nature is to stand as the apparition of God It is the organ through which the universal spirit speaks to the individual, and strives to lead back the individual to it

When we consider Spirit, we see that the views already presented do not include the whole circumference of man We must add some related thoughts

Three problems are put by nature to the mind, What is matter? Whence is it? and Whereto? The first of these questions only, the ideal theory answers Idealism saith matter is a phenomenon, not a substance Idealism acquaints us with the total disparity between the evidence of our own being and the evidence of the world's being The one is perfect, the other, incapable of any assurance, the mind is a part of the nature of things, the world is a divine dream, from which we may presently awake to the glories and certainties of day Idealism is a hypothesis to account for nature by other principles than those of carpentry and chemistry Yet, if it only deny the existence of matter, it does not satisfy the demands of the spirit It leaves God out of me It leaves me in the splendid labyrinth of my perceptions, to wander without end. Then the heart resists it, because it balks the affections in denying substantive being to men and women. Nature is so pervaded with human life that there is something of humanity in all and in every particular. But this theory makes nature foreign to me, and does not account for that consanguinity which we acknowledge to it.

Let it stand then, in the present state of our knowledge, merely as a useful introductory hypothesis, serving to apprise us of the eternal distinction between the soul and the world.

But when, following the invisible steps of thought, we come to inquire, Whence is matter? and Whereto? many truths arise to us out of the recesses of consciousness. We learn that the highest is present to the soul of man, that the dread universal essence, which is not wisdom, or love, or beauty, or power, but all in one, and each entirely, is that for which all things exist, and that by which they are, that spirit creates, that behind nature, throughout nature, spirit is present, one and not compound; it does not act upon us from without, that is, in space and time, but spiritually, or through ourselves; therefore, that spirit, that is, the Supreme Being, does not build up nature around us but puts it forth through us, as the life of the tree puts forth new branches and leaves through the pores of the old. As a plant upon the earth, so a man rests upon the bosom of God; he is nourished by unfailing fountains, and draws at his need inexhaustible power. Who can set bounds to the possibilities of man? Once inhale the upper air, being admitted to behold the absolute natures of justice and truth, and we learn that man has access to the entire mind of the Creator, is himself the creator in the finite. This view, which admonishes me where the sources of wisdom and power lie, and points to virtue as to ‘The golden key Which opes the palace of eternity,’ carries upon its face the highest certificate of truth, because it animates me to create my own world through the purification of my soul.

The world proceeds from the same spirit as the body of man. It is a remoter and inferior incarnation of God, a projection of God in the unconscious. But it differs from the body in one important respect. It is not, like that, now subjected to the human will. Its serene order is inviolable by us. It is, therefore, to us, the present expositor of the divine mind. It is a fixed point whereby we may measure our departure. As we degenerate, the contrast between us and our house is more evident. We are as much strangers in nature as we are aliens from God. We do not understand the notes of birds. The fox and the deer run away from us, the bear and tiger rend us. We do not know the uses of more than a few plants, as corn and the apple, the potato and the vine. Is not the landscape, every glimpse of which hath a grandeur, a face of him? Yet this may show us what discord is between man and nature, for you cannot freely admire a noble landscape if laborers are digging in the field hard by. The poet finds something ridiculous in his delight until he is out of the sight of men.

8 PROSPECTS

In inquiries respecting the laws of the world and the frame of things, the highest reason is always the truest. That which seems faintly possible, it is so refined, is often faint and dim because it is deepest seated in the mind among the eternal verities. Empirical science is apt to cloud the sight, and by the very knowledge of functions and processes to bereave the student of the manly contemplation of the whole. The savant becomes unpoetic. But the best read naturalist who lends an entire and devout attention to truth, will see that there remains much to learn of his relation to the world, and that it is not to be learned by any addition or subtraction or other comparison of known quantities, but is arrived at by untaught sallies of the spirit, by a continual self-recovery, and by entire humility. He will perceive that there are far more excellent qualities in the student than preciseness and infallibility, that a guess is often more fruitful than an indisputable affirmation, and that a dream may let us deeper into the secret of nature than a hundred concerted experiments.

For the problems to be solved are precisely those which the physiologist and the naturalist omit to state. It is not so pertinent to man to know all the individuals of the animal kingdom, as it is to know whence and whereto is this tyrannizing unity in his constitution, which evermore separates and classifies things, endeavoring to reduce the most diverse to one form. When I behold a rich landscape, it is less to my purpose to recite correctly the order and superposition of the strata, than to know why all but weight of multitude is lost in a tranquil verse, of unity. I cannot greatly honor minuteness in details, so long as there is no hunt to explain the relation between things and thoughts, no ray upon the metaphysics of conchology, of botany, of the arts, to show the relation of the forms of flowers, shells, animals, architecture, to the mind, and build science upon ideas. In a cabinet of natural history, we become sensible of a certain occult recognition and sympathy in regard to the most unwieldy and eccentric forms of beast, fish, and insect. The American who has been confined, in his own country, to the sight of buildings designed after foreign models, is surprised on entering York Minster or St Peter's at Rome, by the feeling that these structures are imitations also,—faint copies of an invisible archetype. Nor has science sufficient humanity, so long as the naturalist overlooks that wonderful congruity which subsists between man and the world, of which he is lord, not because he is the most subtle inhabitant, but because he is its head and heart, and finds something of himself in every great and small thing, in every mountain stratum, in every new law of color, fact of astronomy, or atmospheric influence which observation or analysis lays open. A perception of this mystery inspires the muse of George Herbert, the beautiful psalmist of the seventeenth century. The following lines are part of his little poem on Man

'Man is all symmetry, Full of proportions, one limb to another,
 And to all the world besides Each part may call the farthest, brother, For head with foot hath private amity,
 And both with moons and tides

'Nothing hath got so far But man hath caught and kept it as his prey,

His eyes dismount the highest star
 He is in little all the sphere Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they Find their acquaintance there

'For us, the winds do blow, The earth doth rest, heaven move, and fountains flow,
 Nothing we see, but means our good,
 As our delight, or as our treasure,
 The whole is either our cupboard of food, Or cabinet of pleasure

'The stars have us to bed Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws
 Music and light attend our head
 All things unto our flesh are kind,
 In their descent and being, to our mind,
 In their ascent and cause

'More servants wait on man Than he'll take notice of. In every path, He treads down that which doth befriend him
 When sickness makes him pale and wan Oh mighty love! Man is one world, and hath Another to attend him'

The perception of this class of truths makes the attraction which draws men to science, but the end is lost sight of in attention to the means. In view of this half-sight of science, we accept the sentence of Plato, that 'poetry comes nearer to vital truth than history.' Every surmise and vaticination of the mind is entitled to a certain respect, and we learn to prefer imperfect theories, and sentences which contain glimpses of truth, to digested systems which have no one valuable suggestion. A wise writer will feel that the ends of study and composition are best answered by announcing undiscovered regions of thought, and so communicating, through hope, new activity to the torpid spirit.

I shall therefore conclude this essay with some traditions of man and nature, which a certain poet sang to me; and which, as they have always been in the world, and perhaps reappear to every bard, may be both history and prophecy

'The foundations of man are not in matter, but in spirit. But the element of spirit is eternity. To it, therefore, the longest series of events, the oldest chronologies are young and recent. In the cycle of the universal man, from whom the known individuals proceed, centuries are points, and all history is but the epoch of one degradation.

'We distrust and deny inwardly our sympathy with nature. We own and disown our relation to it, by turns. We are like Nebuchadnezzar, dethroned, bereft of reason, and eating grass like an ox. But who can set limits to the remedial force of spirit?'

'A man is a god in ruins. When men are innocent, life shall be longer, and shall pass into the immortal as gently as we awake from dreams. Now, the world would be insane and rabid, if these disorganizations should last for hundreds of years. It is kept in check by death and infancy. Infancy is the perpetual Messiah, which comes into the arms of fallen men, and pleads with them to return to paradise.

'Man is the dwarf of himself. Once he was permeated and dissolved by spirit. He filled nature with his overflowing currents. Out from him sprang the sun and moon, from man the sun, from woman the moon. The laws of his mind, the periods of his actions externalized themselves into day and night, into the year and the seasons. But, having made for himself this huge shell, his waters retired, he no longer fills the veins and veinlets, he is shrunk to a drop. He sees that the structure still fits him, but fits him colossally. Say, rather, once it fitted him, now it corresponds to him from far and on high. He adores timidly his own work. Now is man the follower of the sun, and woman the follower of the moon. Yet sometimes he starts in his slumber, and wonders at himself and his house, and muses strangely at the resemblance betwixt him and it. He perceives that if his law is still paramount, if still he have elemental power, if his word is sterling yet in nature, it is not conscious power, it is not inferior but superior to his will. It is instinct.' Thus my Orphic poet sang.

At present, man applies to nature but half his force. He works on the world with his understanding alone. He lives in it and masters it by a penny-wisdom, and he that works most in it is but a half-man, and whilst his arms are strong and his digestion good, his mind is imbruted, and he is a selfish savage. His relation to nature, his power over it, is through the understanding, as by manure, the economic use of fire, wind, water, and the mariner's needle, steam, coal, chemical agriculture, the repairs of the human body by the dentist as the surgeon. This is such a resumption of power as if a banished king should be restored to his territories inch by inch, instead of being at once into his throne. Meantime, in the thick darkness, there are not a few gleams of a better light,—occasional examples of the action of man upon nature with his entire force,—with reason as well as understanding. Such examples are the traditions of miracles in the earliest antiquity of all nations, the history of Jesus Christ, the achievements of a principle, as in religious and political revolutions, and in the abolition of the slave-trade, the miracles of enthusiasm, as those reported of Swedenborg, Hohenlohe, and the Shakers, many obscure and yet contested facts, now arranged under the name of Animal Magnetism, prayer, eloquence, self-healing, and the wisdom of children. These are examples of Reason's momentary grasp of the sceptre, the exertions of a power which exists not in time or space, but an instantaneous in-streaming causing power. The difference between the actual and the ideal force of man is happily figured by the schoolmen, in saying, that the knowledge of man is an evening knowledge, vespertina cognitio, but that of God is a morning knowledge, matutina cognitio.

The problem of restoring to the world original and eternal beauty is solved by the redemption of the soul. The ruin or the blank that we see when we look at nature, is in our own eye. The axis of vision is not coincident with the axis of things, and so they appear not transparent but opaque. The reason why the world lacks unity, and lies broken and in heaps, is because man is disunited with himself. He cannot be a naturalist until he satisfies all the demands of the spirit. Love is as much its demand as perception. Indeed, neither can be perfect without the other. In the uttermost meaning of the words, thought is devout, and devotion is thought. Deep calls unto deep. But in actual life, the marriage is not cele-

yet, in respect to him, secondaries and servants; as sitters or models in the studio of a painter, or as assistants who bring building materials to an architect

For poetry was all written before time was, and whenever we are so finely organized that we can penetrate into that region where the air is music, we hear those primal warblings, and attempt to write them down, but we lose ever and anon a word, or a verse, and substitute something of our own, and thus miswrite the poem. The men of more delicate ear write down these cadences more faithfully, and these transcripts, though imperfect, become the songs of the nations. For nature is as truly beautiful as it is good, or as it is reasonable, and must as much appear, as it must be done, or be known. Words and deeds are quite indifferent modes of the divine energy. Words are 10 also actions, and actions are a kind of words

The sign and credentials of the poet are, that he announces that which no man foretold. He is the true and only doctor, he knows and tells, he is the only teller of news, for he was present and privy to the appearance which he describes. He is a beholder of ideas, and an utterer of the necessary and causal. We do not speak now of men of poetical talents, or of industry 20 and skill in metre, but of the true poet. I took part in a conversation the other day concerning a recent writer of lyrics, a man of subtle mind, whose head appeared to be a music-box of delicate tunes and rhythms, and whose skill, and command of language, we could not sufficiently praise. But when the question arose, whether he was not only a lyrist, but a poet, we were obliged to confess that he is plainly a contemporary, 30 not an eternal man. He does not stand out of our low limitations, like a Chumborazo under the line, running up from the torrid base through all the climates of the globe, with belts of the herbage of every latitude on its high and mottled sides, but this genius is the landscape-garden of a modern house, adorned with fountains and statues, with well-bred men and women standing and sitting in the walks and terraces. We hear, through all the varied music, the ground-tone of conventional life. Our poets are men of talents who sing, and not the children of music. The argument is secondary, the finish of the verses is primary.

For it is not metres, but a metre-making argument, that makes a poem,—a thought so passionate and alive, that, like the spirit of a plant or an animal, it has an architecture of its own, and adorns nature with a new thing. The thought and the form are equal in the order of time, but in the order of genesis the thought is prior to the form. The poet has a new thought, he has a whole 10 new experience to unfold, he will tell us how it was with him, and all men will be the richer in his fortune. For, the experience of each new age requires a new confession, and the world seems always waiting for its poet. I remember, when I was young, how much I was moved one morning by tidings that genius had appeared in a youth who sat near me at table. He had left his work, and gone rambling none knew whither, and had written hundreds of lines, but could not tell whether that which was in him was therein told, he could tell nothing but that all was changed,—man, beast, heaven, earth, and sea. How gladly we listened! how credulous! Society seemed to be compromised. We sat in the aurora of a sun-rise which was to put out all the stars. Boston seemed to be at twice the distance it had the night before, or was much farther than that Rome,—what was Rome? Plutarch and Shakspeare were in the yellow leaf, and Homer no more should be heard of. It is much to know that poetry has been written this very day, under this very roof, by your side. What! that wonderful spirit has not expired! these stony moments are still sparkling and animated! I had fancied that the oracles were all silent, and nature had spent her fires, and behold! all night, from 20 every pore, these fine auroras have been streaming. Every one has some interest in the advent of the poet, and no one knows how much it may concern him. We know that the secret of the world is profound, but who or what shall be our interpreter, we know not. A mountain ramble, a new style of face, a new person, may put the key into our hands. Of course, the value of genius to us is in the veracity of its report. Talent may 30 frolic and juggle, genius realizes and adds. Mankind, in good earnest, have availed so far in understanding themselves and their work, that the foremost watchman on the peak announces his news. It is the truest word ever spoken, and the phrase will be the fittest, most musical, and the unerring voice of the world for that time.

All that we call sacred history attests that the birth of a poet is the principal event in chronology. Man, never so often deceived, still watches for the arrival of a brother who can hold him steady to a truth until he has made it his own. With what joy I begin to read a poem, which I confide in as an inspiration! And now my chains are to be broken, I shall mount above these clouds and opaque airs in which I live,—opaque, though they seem transparent,—and from the heaven of truth I shall see and comprehend my relations. That will reconcile me to life, and renovate nature, to see trifles animated by a tendency, and to know what I am doing. Life will no more be a noise, now I shall see men and women, and know the signs by which they may be discerned from fools and satans. This day shall be better than my birth-day: then I became an animal, now I am invited into the science of the real. Such is the hope, but the fruition is postponed. Oftener it falls that this winged man, who will carry me into the heaven, whirls me into mists, then leaps and frisks about with me as it were from cloud to cloud, still affirming that he is bound heavenward, and I, being myself a novice, am slow in perceiving that he does not know the way into the heavens, and is merely bent that I should admire his skill to rise, like a fowl or a flying fish, a little way from the ground or the water, but the all-piercing, all-feeding, and ocular air of heaven, that man shall never inhabit. I tumble down again soon into my old nooks, and lead the life of exaggerations as before, and have lost my faith in the possibility of any guide who can lead me thither where I would be.

But leaving these victims of vanity, let us, with new hope, observe how nature, by worthier impulses, has insured the poet's fidelity to his office of announcement and affirming, namely, by the beauty of things, which becomes a new and higher beauty when expressed. Nature offers all her creatures to him as a picture-language. Being used as a type, a second wonderful value appears in the object, far better than its old value, as the carpenter's stretched cord, if you hold your ear close enough, is musical in the breeze. 'Things more excellent than every image,' says Jamblichus, 'are expressed through images.' Things admit of being used as symbols, because nature is a symbol, in the whole, and in every part. Every line we can draw in the sand has expression, and there is no body without its spirit or genius. All form is an effect of character, all condition, of the quality of the life, all harmony, of health, and, for this reason, a perception of beauty should be sympathetic, or proper only to the good. The beautiful rests on the foundations of the necessary. The soul makes the body, as the wise Spenser teaches

'So every spirit, as it is most pure,
And hath in it the more of heavenly light,
So it the fairer body doth procure To habit in, and it more fairly dight, With cheerful grace and amiable sight For, of the soul, the body form doth take,
For soul is form, and doth the body make.'

Here we find ourselves, suddenly, not in a critical speculation, but in a holy place, and should go very warily and reverently. We stand before the secret of the world, there where Being passes into Appearance and Unity into Variety.

The Universe is the externalization of the soul. Wherever the life is, that bursts into appearance around it. Our science is sensual, and therefore superficial. The earth and the heavenly bodies, physics, and chemistry, we sensually treat, as if they were self-existent, but these are the retinue of that Being we have. 'The mighty heaven,' said Proclus, 'exhibits, in its transfigurations, clear images of the splendor of intellectual perceptions, being moved in conjunction with the unapparent periods of intellectual natures.' Therefore science always goes abreast with the just elevation of the man, keeping step with religion and metaphysics, or the state of science is an index of our self-knowledge. Since everything in nature answers to a moral power, if any phenomenon remains brute and dark, it is because the corresponding faculty in the observer is not yet active.

No wonder, then, if these waters be so deep, that we hover over them with a religious regard. The beauty of the fable proves the importance of the sense, to the poet, and to all others, or, if you please, every man is so far a poet as to be susceptible of these enchantments of nature for all men have the thoughts whereof the universe is the celebration I find that the fascination resides in the symbol Who loves nature? Who does not? Is it only poets, and men of leisure and cultivation, who live with her? No, but also hunters, farmers, grooms, and butchers, though they express their affection in their choice of life and not in their choice of words The writer wonders what the coachman or the hunter values in riding, in horses, and dogs It is not superficial qualities When you talk with him, he holds these at as slight a rate as you His worship is sympathetic, he has no definitions, but he is commanded in nature, by the living power which he feels to be there present No imitation, or playing of these things, would content him, he loves the earnest of the northwind, of rain, of stone, and wood, and iron A beauty not explicable is dearer than a beauty which we can see to the end of It is nature the symbol, nature certifying the supernatural, body overflowed by life, which he worships with coarse, but sincere rites

The inwardness and mystery of this attachment, drives men of every class to the use of emblems The schools of poets and philosophers are not more intoxicated with their symbols, than the populace with theirs In our political parties, compute the power of badges and emblems See the great ball which they roll from Baltimore to Bunker Hill! In the political processions, Lowell goes in a loom, and Lynn in a shoe, and Salem in a ship Witness the cider-barrel, the log-cabin, the hickory-stick, the palmetto, and all the cognizances of party See the power of national emblems Some stars, lilies, leopards, a crescent, a lion, an eagle, or other figure, which came into credit God knows how, on an old rag of bunting, blowing in the wind on a fort at the ends of the earth, shall make the blood tingle under the rudest or the most conventional exterior The people fancy they hate poetry, and they are all poets and mystics!

Beyond this universality of the symbolic language, we are apprised of the divineness of this superior use of things, whereby the world is a temple whose walls are covered with emblems, pictures, and commandments of the Deity, in this, that there is no fact in nature which does not carry the whole sense of nature; and the distinctions which we make in events and in affairs, of low and high, honest and base, disappear when nature is used as a symbol Thought makes every thing fit for use The vocabulary of an omniscient man would embrace words and images excluded from polite conversation What would be base, or even obscene, to the obscene, becomes illustrious, spoken in a new connection of thought The piety of the Hebrew prophets purges their grossness The circumcision is an example of the power of poetry to raise the low and offensive Small and mean things serve as well as great symbols The meaner the type by which a law is expressed, the more pungent it is, and the more lasting in the memories of men, just as we choose the smallest box or case in which any needful utensil can be carried Bare lists of words are found suggestive to an imaginative and excited mind, as it is related of Lord Chatham, that he was accustomed to read in Bailey's Dictionary when he was preparing to speak in Parliament The poorest experience is rich enough for all the purposes of expressing thought Why covet a knowledge of new facts? Day and night, house and garden, a few books, a few actions, serve us as well as would all trades and all spectacles We are far from having exhausted the significance of the few symbols we use We can come to use them yet with a terrible simplicity It does not need that a poem should be long Every word was once a poem Every new relation is a new word Also, we use defects and deformities to a sacred purpose, so expressing our sense that the evils of the world are such only to the evil eye In the old mythology, mythologists observe, defects are ascribed to divine natures, as lameness to Vulcan, blindness to Cupid, and the like, to signify exuberances

For as it is dislocation and detachment from the life of God that makes things ugly, the poet, who re-attaches things to nature and the Whole,—re-attaching even artificial things, and violations of nature, to nature, by a deeper insight,—disposes very easily of the most disagreeable facts Readers of poetry see the factory-village and the railway, and fancy that the poetry of the landscape is broken up by these, for these works of art are not yet consecrated in their reading, but the poet sees them fall within the great Order not less than the bee-hive or the spider's geometrical web. Nature adopts them very fast into her vital circles, and the gliding train of cars she loves like her own. Besides, in a centred mind, it signifies nothing how many mechanical inventions you exhibit. Though you add millions, and never so surprising, the fact of mechanics has not gained a grain's weight. The spiritual fact remains unalterable, by many or by few particulars, as no mountain is of any appreciable height to break the curve of the sphere. A shrewd country-boy goes to the city for the first time, and the complacent citizen is not satisfied with his little wonder. It is not that he does not see all the fine houses, and know that he never saw such before, but he disposes of them as easily as the poet finds place for the railway. The chief value of the new fact, is to enhance the great and constant fact of Life, which can dwarf any and every circumstance, and to which the belt of wampum, and the commerce of America, are alike.

The world being thus put under the mind for verb and noun, the poet is he who can articulate it. For though life is great, and fascinates, and absorbs,—and though all men are intelligent of the symbols through which it is named,—yet they cannot originally use them. We are symbols, and inhabit symbols, workmen, work, and tools, words and things, birth and death, all are emblems, but we sympathize with the symbols, and, being infatuated with the economical uses of things, we do not know that they are thoughts. The poet, by an ulterior intellectual perception, gives them a power which makes their old use forgotten, and puts eyes and a tongue into every dumb and inanimate object. He perceives the independence of the thought on the symbol, the stability of the thought, the accidentality and fugacity of the symbol. As the eyes of Lyncæus were said to see through the earth, so the poet turns the world to glass, and shows us all things in their right series and procession. For, through that better perception, he stands one step nearer to things, and sees the flowing or metamorphosis, perceives that thought is multiform, that within the form of every creature is a force impelling it to ascend into a higher form, and, following with his eyes the life, uses the forms which express that life, and so his speech flows with the flowing of nature. All the facts of the animal economy, sex, nutriment, gestation, birth, growth, are symbols of the passage of the world into the soul of man, to suffer there a change, and reappear a new and higher fact. He uses forms according to the life, and not according to the form. This is true science. The poet alone knows astronomy, chemistry, vegetation, and animation, for he does not stop at these facts, but employs them as signs. He knows why the plain or meadow of space was strown with these flowers we call suns and moons and stars, why the great deep is adorned with animals, with men, and gods, for in every word he speaks he rides on them as the horses of thought.

By virtue of this science the poet is the Namer or Language-maker, naming things sometimes after their appearance, sometimes after their essence, and giving to every one its own name and not another's, thereby rejoicing the intellect, which delights in detachment or boundary. The poets made all the words, and therefore language is the archives of history, and, if we must say it, a sort of tomb of the muses. For, though the origin of most of our words is forgotten, each word was at first a stroke of genius, and obtained currency, because for the moment it symbolized the world to the first speaker and to the hearer. The etymologist finds the deadest word to have been once a brilliant picture. Language is fossil poetry. As the limestone of the continent consists of infinite masses of the shells of animalcules, so language is made up of images, or tropes, which now, in their secondary use, have long ceased to remind us of their poetic origin. But the poet names the thing because he sees it, or comes one step nearer to it than any other. This expression, or naming, is not art, but a second nature, grown out of the first, as a leaf out of a tree. What we call nature is a certain self-regulated motion or change, and nature does all things by her own hands, and does not leave another to baptize her, but baptizes herself, and this through the metamorphosis again. I remember that a certain poet described it to me thus —

Genius is the activity which repairs the decays of things, whether wholly or partly of a material and finite kind Nature, through all her kingdoms, insures herself Nobody cares for planting the poor fungus so she shakes down from the gills of one agaric countless spores, any one of which, being preserved, transmits new billions of spores to-morrow or next day. The new agaric of this hour has a chance which the old one had not This atom of seed is thrown into a new place, not subject to the accidents which destroyed its parent two rods off She makes a man, and having brought him to ripe age, she will no longer run the risk of losing this wonder at a blow, but she detaches from him a new self, that the kind may be safe from accidents to which the individual is exposed So when the soul of the poet has come to ripeness of thought, she detaches and sends away from it its poems or songs,—a fearless, sleepless, deathless progeny, which is not exposed to the accidents of the weary kingdom of time a fearless, vivacious offspring, clad with wings (such was the virtue of the soul out of which they came), which carry them fast and far, and infix them irrevocably into the hearts of men These wings are the beauty of the poet's soul The songs, thus flying immortal from their mortal parent, are pursued by clamorous flights of censures, which swarm in far greater numbers, and threaten to devour them, but these last are not winged At the end of a very short leap they fall plump down, and rot, having received from the souls out of which they came no beautiful wings But the melodies of the poet ascend, and leap, and pierce into the deeps of infinite time

So far the bard taught me, using his freer speech But nature has a higher end, in the production of new individuals, than security, namely, ascension, or, the passage of the soul into higher forms I knew, in my younger days, the sculptor who made the statue of the youth which stands in the public garden He was, as I remember, unable to tell, directly, what made him happy, or unhappy, but by wonderful indirections he could tell He rose one day, according to his habit, before the dawn, and saw the morning break, grand as the eternity out of which it came, and, for many days after, he strove to express this tranquillity, and, lo! his chisel had fashioned out of marble the form of a beautiful youth, Phosphorus, whose aspect is such that, it is said, all persons who look on it become silent The poet also resigns himself to his mood, and that thought which agitated him is expressed, but alter idem, in a manner totally new The expression is organic, or, the new type which things themselves take when liberated As, in the sun, objects paint their images on the retina of the eye, so they, sharing the aspiration of the whole universe, tend to paint a far more delicate copy of their essence in his mind Like the metamorphosis of things into higher organic forms, is their change into melodies Over everything stands its daemon, or soul, and, as the form of the thing is reflected by the eye, so the soul of the thing is reflected by a melody The sea, the mountain-ridge, Niagara, and every flower-bed, pre-exist, or super-exist, in pre-cantations, which sail like odors in the air, and when any man goes by with an ear sufficiently fine, he overhears them, and endeavors to write down the notes, without diluting or depraving them And herein is the legitimation of criticism, in the mind's faith that the poems are a corrupt version of some text in nature, with which they ought to be made to tally A rhyme in one of our sonnets should not be less pleasing than the iterated nodes of a sea-shell, or the resembling difference of a group of flowers The pairing of the birds is an idyl, not tedious as our idyls are, a tempest is a rough ode without falsehood or rant, a summer, with its harvest sown, reaped, and stored, is an epic song, subordinating how many admirably executed parts. Why should not the symmetry and truth that modulate these, glide into our spirits, and we participate the invention of nature?

This insight, which expresses itself by what is called Imagination, is a very high sort of seeing, which does not come by study, but by the intellect being where and what it sees, by sharing the path, or circuit of things through forms, and so making them translucent to others. The path of things is silent. Will they suffer a speaker to go with them? A spy they will not suffer, a lover, a poet, is the transcendency of their own nature,—him they will suffer. The condition of true naming, on the poet's part, is his resigning himself to the divine aura which breathes through forms, and accompanying that

It is a secret which every intellectual man quickly learns, that, beyond the energy of his possessed and conscious intellect, he is capable of a new energy (as of an intellect doubled on itself), by abandonment to the nature of things, that, beside his privacy of power as an individual man, there is a great public power, on which he can draw, by unlocking, at all risks, his human doors, and suffering the ethereal tides to roll and circulate through him. Then he is caught up into the life of the Universe, his speech is thunder, his thought is law, and his words are universally intelligible as the plants and animals. The poet knows that he speaks adequately, then only when he speaks somewhat wildly, or, 'with the flower of the mind', not with the intellect, used as an organ, but with the intellect released from all service, and suffered to take its direction from its celestial life, or, as the ancients were wont to express themselves, not with intellect alone, but with the intellect inebriated by nectar. As the traveller who has lost his way, throws his reins on his horse's neck, and trusts to the instinct of the animal to find his road, so must we do with the divine animal who carries us through this world. For if in any manner we can stimulate this instinct, new passages are opened for us into nature, the mind flows into and through things hardest and highest, and the metamorphosis is possible.

This is the reason why bards love wine, mead, narcotics, coffee, tea, opium, the fumes of sandal-wood and tobacco, or whatever other procurers of animal exhilaration. All men avail themselves of such means as they can, to add this extraordinary power to their normal powers, and to this end they prize conversation, music, pictures, sculpture, dancing, theatres, travelling, war, mobs, fires, gaming, politics, or love, or science, or animal intoxication, which are several coarser or finer quasi-mechanical substitutes for the true nectar, which is the ravishment of the intellect by coming nearer to the fact. These are auxilaries to the centrifugal tendency of a man, to his passage out into free space, and they help him to escape the custody of that body in which he is pent up, and of that jail-yard of individual relations in which he is enclosed. Hence a great number of such as were professionally expressers of Beauty, as painters, poets, musicians, and actors, have been more than others wont to lead a life of pleasure and indulgence, all but the few who received the true nectar, and, as it was a spurious mode of attaining freedom, as it was an emancipation not into the heavens, but into the freedom of baser places, they were punished for that advantage they won, by a dissipation and deterioration. But never can any advantage be taken of nature by a trick. The spirit of the world, the great calm presence of the Creator, comes not forth to the sorceries of opium or of wine. The sublime vision comes to the pure and simple soul in a clean and chaste body. That is not an inspiration, which we owe to narcotics, but some counterfeit excitement and fury. Milton says that the lyric poet may drink wine and live generously, but the epic poet, he who shall sing of the gods, and their descent unto men, must drink water out of a wooden bowl. For poetry is not 'Devil's wine,' but God's wine. It is with this as it is with toys. We fill the hands and nurseries of our children with all manner of dolls, drums, and horses, withdrawing their eyes from the plain face and sufficing objects of nature, the sun, and moon, the animals, the water and stones, which should be their toys. So the poet's habit of living should be set on a key so low that the common influences should delight him. His cheerfulness should be the gift of the sunlight, the air should suffice for his inspiration, and he should be tipsy with water. That spirit which suffices quiet hearts, which seems to come forth to such from every dry knoll of sere grass, from every pine-stump and half-imbedded stone, on which the dull March sun shines, comes forth to the poor and hungry, and such as are of simple taste. If thou fill thy brain with Boston and New York, with fashion and coverousness, and wilt stimulate thy jaded senses with wine and French coffee, thou shalt find no radiance of wisdom in the lonely waste of the pinewoods.

If the imagination intoxicates the poet, it
